they? I think it will be found, upon a careful examination, that not one out of twenty are sustained by a jury of the country. And if this be true—and, so far as my observation goes, it certainly is—the general rule is obviously against the continuance of so dangerous a system in a government founded upon the will of the governed, and for the protection of life and liberty, as well as to secure the peace and prosperity of the people. But other defects, incident to, and peculiar only to this institution, crowd upon the mind.

In a large number of indictments for the higher offenses, there are technical defects by which the worse class of criminals often escape the just condemnation of the law; or the cases are continued from term to term, to correct these errors, thereby increasing the burdens of the county, and also rendering it inconvenient and expensive to the witnesses.

But, say the friends of the system, cannot this acknowledged defect be remedied? We answer, no; and hazard nothing in declaring that it is an incurable evil—one that all the learning of the legal profession, for centuries, has not been able to eradicate; and for the reason of the great discrepancy in the testimony given before the Grand Inquest, and that introduced upon the trial of the case, under a most searching cross-examination by the counsel for the accused. And add to this the evidence for the criminal—frequently contradicting that of the prosecution, in part or in whole—often weakening it in one or more of the essential allegations of the indictment, and almost always rendering it less reliable for conviction, and is it any wonder so few of the many indictments found are sustained by a trial in open court, and before a jury of the country. But the evil stops not here.

The system imposes upon no inconsiderable number of citizens in every county in the State, and particularly in those where they have a large criminal docket, most onerous duties. In much the largest number of indictments, particularly those for the smaller offenses, all the witnesses for the prosecution are compelled to be in attendance at two terms of the court—at one for the finding of the indictment, and at the succeeding one for the trial of the case. It frequently happens, too, that the witnesses are detained for several days before the trial comes on, or the case is continued until the next term of the court, when the witnesses are compelled again to be in attendance. Now, if these hardships are but seldom imposed, they might be endured without complaint. But it is otherwise. They are not only frequent, but general; and what makes it still more oppressive is, that these services are mostly required of a class of our fellow-citizens who are the least able to make the sacrifice. Besides these, demanded but unpaid for requirements, mostly growing out of the character of this educational, liberty expounding tribunal, (as its admirers represent it to be,) the citizen is subjected to others, that if less burdensome, are still obnoxious to justice and a wholesome public sentiment. How often is it the case that persons are called before the Grand Jury, perhaps from the remotest corner of the county, upon a mere rumor, which has reached the ear of one of the jurymen, that some petty offense has been committed, or that a supervisor has neglected the discharge of his duty in some unimportant particular. I have known more than three hundred witnesses called before the Grand Jury at a single term, under the belief that they could give information of persons who had been guilty of minor misdemeanors.

At the April term of the Floyd Circuit Court, 1848, over three hundred and fifty indictments were found; and out of this whole number, there were not to exceed twenty convictions, and those were for the most frivolous offenses.

In large counties bordering on the Ohio river, and especially in cities where they have a large fluctuating population, the present system is very expensive, and frequently operates with great hardship, and sometimes most unjustly, too, against a class of persons who are unable, either from pecuniary disability, or from being comparative strangers in the county, to give security for their appearance at court. These persons are generally committed to jail, where they remain several months at a serious expense to the county; and, if innocent, which is frequently the case, at the loss of reputation, which, to an honorable man, is dearer than life itself. I have known, in the last several years, a number of cases, where innocent persons have been indicted, committed to jail, and before they were released by a verdict of acquittal, the hard earnings of years of toil have been consumed. It was only a few months since, in mid-winter, that a citizen of New Albany was arrested for larceny, said to have been committed in an interior county. Having resided there but a short time, he was unable to find security for his appearance at court, and was committed to jail, where he remained several days, when he was taken to the county where the indictment was found, and where he had formerly resided. On his arrival there, he had no difficulty in obtaining the required bail, and returned home with the sheriff, in whose custody he had been.

True to his integrity, he was punctual in his attendance at court, had his trial, and was acquitted; the prosecution having totally failed in creating the slightest suspicion that he was guilty of the charge alleged against him. But for the full particulars of this iniquitous case, as they were disclosed at the trial, I refer to the honorable delegate from the county of Jackson.

However revolting this case may appear, the consequences to the man and his family are still more so.

In New Albany, he was among strangers, employing a capital of about five hundred dollars in a laudable business. Thus situated, he is arrested, thrown into prison, and from thence taken to Jackson county, where he is finally released upon bail. He returns home to witness a wretched family, the loss of business, and to know and feel that he is the object of general suspicion. Besides all these painful reminiscences, we find that in a few short months, the savings of years of honest industry are wasted away.

Yet we are told that this institution is "a shield to the weak," that its abrogation "will be a violation of the great charter of our liberties—the bill of rights, of the habeas corpus act, and, in short, of that divine right bestowed upon man by his maker—the right to govern himself."

But, say the friends of the system, and those who favor it in a modified form, what do the movers of this reform propose, instead of this time honored institution? Is it not the duty of those who advocate the abolition of the Grand Jury, to suggest for the consideration of the Convention, a better and more acceptable tribunal in its place?

These may be proper questions; quite likely they are. But it certainly must have occurred to those who put them, that in this, as well as all other reforms, there is a common responsibility; and that it is neither violent opposition to wholesome reforms, or a blind adherence to old usages, that will stay the onward progress of the people in establishing the former by the abolition of the latter.

Thus far, the discussion of this question, with one or two exceptions, has been marked by a most commendable spirit—a spirit of earnest inquiry, not only into the character of the present institution, but that of the proposed substitute. I will not pretend to say that the advocates of the discontinuance of the system, have been so fortunate in the suggestions which have been made for a substitute, as a more thorough examination of the subject might suggest; nor do I flatter myself that the one I may offer will meet with more favor.

I think it is generally understood that the important judicial duties imposed upon the court of probate, demand higher legal attainments; and that to secure this, there must be a change in the system. What this change should be, is a matter not yet determined. Some favor the surrogate system, others the circuit, while many advocate the election in each county, of a judge, with legal qualifications. For one, I am not tenacious of the name, but shall favor the best and most efficient tribunal. And it is to this judicial officer, whether a Surrogate, Judge of Probate, or Court of Common Pleas, that I would impose certain criminal proceedings. Upon this Court I would also confer the power to hear and determine writs of habeas corpus, injunctions, and have concurrent jurisdiction in other such legal proceedings, as may require prompt judicial action.

Criminal offenses are usually divided, by statutory enactments, under three heads. The first are petty misdemeanors, punishable by fine only. The second are misdemeanors of a higher grade, which are punishable by fine and imprisonment in the county jail. And the third are felonies, punished by confinement in the penitentiary.

Now, sir, however much we may differ upon the subject under discussion, our highest ambition should be, to adopt the best policy to suppress crime, and promptly to punish the guilty. But measures which I may believe would best secure these essential elements in government, others would look upon with doubt, while many would oppose them under the highest convictions of duty. How, then, shall we secure these important objects of government—the suppression of crime, and the prompt punishment of the offender?

To justices of the peace, I would give exclusive jurisdiction in all cases of petty misdemeanors. But here I am admonished by some of the friends of the Grand Jury system, that many of this class of officers are either corrupt or ignorant, sometimes both, and with little qualification for the discharge of the duties imposed upon them by law. For one I am not prepared to admit the correctness of these sweeping declarations. I believe, as a general rule, they are as competent officers, in the sphere of their official duties, as are the higher judicial officers of the State. I believe, too, they are as honest, and as free from corrupting influences, as any other class of officers charged with the execution of the laws. While, however, these are my firm convictions, I am free to admit, they sometimes err, and occasionally act corruptly. But are your circuit judges entirely free from error and corruption? Have these secondary judicial tribunals always decided correctly, and according to justice? I think it will be found, upon examination, that the Supreme Court has reversed more cases, in proportion to the number taken up on appeal and writs of error from circuit courts, than the latter courts have of appeals from justices' dockets. Whence, then, let me ask, this assault upon this class of officers? Is it because they sometimes, frequently if you please, decide wrong? This certainly, as we have seen, is not peculiar to this tribunal, and therefore should be no valid objection to it. Besides, I cannot but believe that others are equally culpable, perhaps more so, for these erroneous decisions. Generally speaking, this class of officers are not very familiar with law, or legal proceedings; and as there are decisions of a contradictory character upon almost every conceivable question, is it surprising that these minor courts should now and then mistake what the law is, and decide incorrectly? And in addition to this perplexity, they generally have the advice of counsel on both sides of the case, coming to opposite conclusions as to what the judgment of the court should be, and each contending that he is right, beyond all dispute.

Now, sir, I think it will be found upon examination, that this much abused class of judicial officers, generally speaking, are more likely to do substantial justice between man and man, than the higher courts of the country. And for this reason: the former courts decide cases upon the principles of justice, irrespective of the nicety of law proceedings, while the latter tribunals are tied up by the forms and technicalities of special pleadings.

To the county court, however constituted, I would give exclusive jurisdiction of all secondary offenses; and make it also the examining court, in cases of felonies. And it is my firm conviction, that if this plan is adopted, it would entirely obviate the dangers gentlemen apprehend from enlarging the duties of justices of the peace, in criminal proceedings; while it would secure to persons charged with secondary misdemeanors, a more speedy trial; and, if innocent, immediate acquittal; but, if guilty, more certainty of conviction. But what is still more desirable, is, that when a person is charged with an infamous crime, he should first have a public opportunity to offer rebutting testimony, and repel the charge made against him. So obvious to my mind is the justice and humanity of this policy—a policy—in contradistinction to that of a secret and ex parte examination of witnesses—founded upon an unalterable law of our being, that, were it not for the prejudice of education, and the great reluctance in the human mind to discard old usages, the opposition to the abolition of the system would be a matter of serious surprise. But this very characteristic of our being, is, by the action of this secret tribunal, often made the unwilling instrument of injustice and inhumanity; not because there is an inherent desire in man to do wrong, but from that acknowledged law of mind, that if evidence is heard on one side, and excluded on the other, a prejudgment is almost certain to follow. So controlling is this principle, that I question whether it would be possible for a stranger to enter a court house during the sitting of the court, witness the criminal in the box, and hear the indictment read, without at once becoming prejudiced against him. Yet this prejudice is of little moment when compared with that created by a secret and ex parte examination.

But, sir, adopt the section before the Convention, and you at once, and forever, close the door against that class of criminal cases, originating in malice and revenge. And is not this desirable? Can any question of more importance engage the attention of this Convention, than the protection of the innocent, against the malevolence of the depraved? The benign policy of the law declares, that it is far better that ninety and nine guilty persons should escape punishment, than that even one, who is innocent, should suffer. But this just and gracious principle in the administration of criminal proceedings, is almost entirely disregarded by Grand Juries; and it is impossible for it to be otherwise, so long as their examinations are ex parte and in secret.

But, is the question asked, how these evils can be remedied? or what do I propose as a substitute for indictments? and whether the contemplated change will secure a more prompt execution of the criminal laws of the country, and at the same time give greater protection to the innocent, and more certain punishment to the guilty? Sir, these are important questions—questions of serious import, and deserving the calm and scrutinizing investigation of the Convention. And with this spirit, uninfluenced by the desire and ambition of success, only for the glory of triumph, it is my firm belief that a change may be made that will more fully secure these great ends in the administration of the penal laws of the State.

I have already remarked, that in nearly all criminal cases for the higher offenses, incipient proceedings are had before a competent judicial tribunal, upon an affidavit being filed before such court.

Now, sir, I would make the affidavit, in all cases, whether in preliminary examinations, or upon final trial, the foundation of the charge against the accused party. And, if upon hearing the evidence in such examinations, both for and against the State, it was found there was an essential variation between the evidence and the charge in the affidavit, an opportunity would be afforded to correct it, with little delay, and no additional expense to the county. This, then, would at once obviate the difficulty, delay, and expense often resulting by the finding of indictments from a partial, prejudiced, and ex parte examination of the testimony in the case.

Another great benefit that will result from open examinations, and the hearing of the evidence for and against the criminal, would be the formation of a correct public judgment of the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Sir, this discussion has not only been fruitful in appeals to imaginary evils which may befall the country by the abolition of grand juries, but gentlemen have fallen into the greatest possible absurdities in relation to restricting its duties.

Gentlemen tell us that this judicial system, in many particulars, works badly, and that all cases of petty misdemeanors should be disposed of without its intervention. Now it will be seen that this modification of the powers of this tribunal will cut off nine-tenths, at least, of all the business now imposed upon it, and that its only remaining duties will be to inquire into the higher criminal offenses.

Then, sir, what force, or even meaning, is there in the remark, that the gambler, the horse-racer, the retailer of spirituous liquors without license, and that numerous class of petty offenders found in every community, are the advocates of the abolition of this system. If, in the language of an honorable delegate, we "take from the grand jury their jurisdiction over petty misdemeanors," what reason, I ask, is there to suppose that those who are guilty of these offenses will join in the cry, "Down with the monster!"

It has been stated, and several times repeated, during this discussion, that it seldom happens, in cases of felonies, that incipient proceedings are commenced before the grand inquest; but that, almost invariably, the charge is first made and examined before a justice, or other officer, and the accused party either released, or recognized to appear at the next term of the court, or for want of bail, committed to jail. So general is this rule that the exceptions will not exceed one in twenty; and in the Floyd Circuit Court, only one in fifty-three. Yet we are told by the friends of this tribunal, that those who are "accused of the most heinous and infamous crimes," are most interested and clamorous for its abolition. But the reason for this opposition is equally as mysterious as that petty offenders should desire its immediate discontinuance.

Again: It has been more than intimated by gentlemen that if you abolish this system the influence and power of the great, and strong and rich, who commit crime, will shield them from exposure and punishment. This, sir, is an assumption, contradicted by numerous facts and the uniform criminal proceedings against these influential classes. The truth is, there is hardly a case to be found on record, of a great, a strong, or a rich man, having been guilty of a crime, where he was not first arrested upon a warrant issued by a justice, or some other competent judicial officer. I have no knowledge of a single exception to this rule, where a conviction followed; and if gentlemen will examine the criminal proceedings of our courts, from the organization of the government to the present time, they will find but few cases of this class, where the incipient proceedings were had before a grand jury.

Fortunately, Mr. President, those who advocate the abolition of the system, have many examples, clearly showing that its continuance is not necessary to secure the just and faithful administration of the criminal laws of the country against this class of offenders.

The memorable case of Aaron Burr for treason, the case of the Crowningshields and Knapps for the murder of White, the case of Monroe Edwards for forgery, the case of General Keene for robbing the mail, the late case of Professor Webster for the murder of

Dr. Parkman, the case of the great speculator Rathbun for forgery, the quite recent case of General Hinton—a leading and influential member of one of the great political parties of the country—for robbing the mail, and the case in Philadelphia where a merchant of high standing and several persons of respectability obtained insurance for a large amount upon a cargo destined for the southern ports, but which was discovered, when at sea, to be nothing but rubbish, and that a quantity of the oil of vitriol was so arranged that it should communicate with other articles which would create spontaneous combustion. I say, sir, that in all these cases arrests were made and examinations had, before they were presented to the grand jury for a secret and ex parte re-examination of the evidence only on the part of the State. I might go on and enumerate hundreds, and even thousands of criminal cases, where the incipient proceedings were had before the minor judicial courts of the country; but I think it will require great research to find even a small number where the proceedings were first had before grand juries. In the great State of New York, where they have a large criminal docket, they do not exceed one in one hundred and nineteen, while in this State there has been but few cases, and in many counties not a single case has occurred since the formation of the State government.

Sir, the great name of the sage of Monticello has been invoked to bolster up this odious institution. Yes, gentlemen have stated on this floor that the immortal Jefferson, the ripe scholar and able statesman, declared "that no nation could ever be enslaved where the grand and petit jury systems prevailed." When this bold statement was first made I doubted its correctness; and I now say to this Convention and to those gentlemen who called to their aid this model patriot, that there is not the slightest foundation in all his writings for this declaration; that he never was the author of such a sentiment.

Again: The argument that the secrecy of Grand Juries is necessary to screen the timid, and ensure immunity to the cowardly, is of little force. Moral courage is essential to the due administration of any form of government. Without it the powerful and daring break through all law. And moral courage, like physical courage, grows by exercise. In a neighboring State, Kentucky, in all primary elections, the viva voce system prevails; and you will scarcely find a Kentuckian who is not wedded to it. Yet the same argument may be adduced against it, as in favor of the Grand Jury. It might be said, that the timid, governed by fear, might give his vote against his conscience; and that the brave, by dint of intimidation, might control the votes of his weaker neighbor, who would not dare to incur his hatred or ill will. In practice this is not found to be the case. That which men are accustomed to dare they do not shrink from. We have been accustomed to avail ourselves of the mysteries which shrouds the doings of Grand Juries, until we come to imagine that we cannot dispense with it. If the system of secret accusation were done away, the wonder would soon be, that we had ever regarded it as necessary.

But, Mr. President, in the course of this discussion, the question of economy has been alluded to; and the relative cost of Grand Juries, and the proposed system, has been made. From this estimated calculation, the expense of the new, over that of the old tribunal, is greatly lessened. It is true, that this is of little moment, compared with an efficient system; but, if by the change, we secure both, it is certainly desirable, and should have its proper influence upon the members of this Convention.

Sir, I have taken some pains to ascertain the cost of the Grand Jury system for the county of Floyd, during the years 1848 and '49, and the annexed table is the result of such investigation:

|---------------------------------------|----------|
| Expenses of the Grand Jury . . . . .  | $605 00 |
| Subpoenaing of witnesses . . . . .    | 260 00   |
| Bailiffs . . . . .                    | 60 00    |
| Other necessary expenses . . . . .    | 56 00    |
| Jail fees in minor offenses . . . . . | 670 00   |
| Petit Juries . . . . .                | 595 00   |

Making a total of . . . . . $2,246 00
Add to this the loss arising from over two thousand witnesses called before the Grand Jury, and the finding of over five hundred indictments, and their appearance the second, and frequently the third time, before the court, and if time is money, we have a large additional item, exceeding over four thousand dollars, which added to the above, makes the large sum of six thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars, most of which is a useless expenditure of money, justly chargeable to the palpable defects of this institution.

Now these expenses and burdens, great as they are, do not include the fees of the Clerk, who receives little or nothing for these onerous services—nor the Sheriff's fees, for which he gets, comparatively speaking, no remuneration.

But, Mr. President, I am admonished, if not by the impatience of the Convention, by a just sense of its indulgence, to hasten to a conclusion.

The best interests of society, the highest claims of humanity, are involved in the decision of the question before us. If there be doubt as to how it shall be decided, that doubt arises solely out of the fact, that prejudice often bears ruling sway over the heart of man, and that ancient customs are wont to endure long after their utility has been disproved and their injustice made apparent.

What are the words we are required to endorse or condemn? "No person shall be put on trial on any criminal charge, without public opportunity first had, to offer rebutting testimony and repel the charge in its inception." If this were an original proposition, now first presented, it would pass as unquestioned as the assertion of the right of trial by jury, or the declaration that all courts shall be open. Take, for a moment, the converse of the proposition, and see how it will read. "The citizen put on trial on a criminal charge, shall have no previous public opportunity to offer rebutting testimony; nor shall he be allowed to repel any charge brought against him in its inception." Is not the sentiment monstrous, on the face of it? As an original proposition, not bolstered up by the time honored name of the Grand Jury System, what voice in this Convention would be raised in its favor—what vote given in its support? Ancient vestments have shrouded flagrant abuse. A respected title has covered up a legal enormity. Let us penetrate the falacious veil; let us look through a specious name to an odious reality; and the fate of the Grand Jury System will be decided now and forevermore.

Pending the question,

On motion of Mr. MOWRER the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section relating to Grand Juries.

Mr. LOCKHART requested the gentleman from Ripley to withdraw his amendment, for the purpose of enabling him to offer a substitute for the section, in lieu of his former amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would like to accommodate the gentleman, if I was sure that I should have an opportunity of offering my amendment again.

Mr. SMITH withdrew his amendment.

Mr. LOCKHART then withdrew his former amendment, and offered the following as a substitute for the original section:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury; and all offenses, the punishment of which is by fine or imprisonment in the county jail, shall be prosecuted in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley renewed his amendment as an amendment to the substitute.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Crawford.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I understand that the gentleman from Vanderburgh has modified his amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the gentleman from Crawford is to amend the original section, and consequently takes precedence over a motion to strike out the section and insert a different one.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to know if my amendment is considered as being renewed?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

The question being about to be put on the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford,

Mr. PETTIT said he hoped the vote would not be taken now. It was an important question, and the Convention was far from being full. He believed that the gentleman from Lagrange contemplated addressing the Convention, and he had anticipated hearing him, although the gentleman was on the opposite side of the question. He would move that there be a call of the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT. It is not the usual practice to debate a motion for a call of the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN. Is there a quorum present?

The PRESIDENT. That will be ascertained when the call is made.

Mr. BORDEN. I was under the impression that the Chair ascertained that fact before calling the Convention to order.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has not thought it necessary to count the members.

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The names of the members were then called, and the Secretary reported that there were 94 delegates present. The result having been announced,

Mr. PETTIT said: A great many of the members, I suppose, are this afternoon listening to the Governor's address. I am not willing that the vote shall be taken upon the section until they are here. And I therefore suggest that we pass it by until the day after to-morrow.

The question being put, the section was postponed until Thursday by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the following section on its second reading.

The Secretary read the section, which provides that criminals shall have the right to a public trial by a jury, the right to be heard by counsel, &c.

The question being on the engrossment of the section,

Mr. STEVENSON proposed to amend by striking out the words, "of his peers."

This is a new phrase, said Mr. STEVENSON, that has been here inserted. There is nothing of the kind in the old Constitution. It merely requires that the party shall be tried by a jury. I think we had better strike out the word "peers."

Mr. PETTIT. This word simply means his equals in political standing—persons having equal rights in the community. I take it that the purpose of this clause is to prevent such an anomaly as a white man being tried by negroes, for instance. I do not suppose that gentlemen wish to bring about such a result. It is merely a guard against putting a citizen of Indiana upon his trial before those who are not his equals.

A VOICE—"How will it be if free negroes are to be regarded as citizens?"

Mr. PETTIT. It is not intended that they shall have political rights.

Mr. STEVENSON. One word in reference to this matter. This word "peers" is not found in any of the Constitutions of the States. It is a new phrase, and one that must produce some difficulty. A man is put upon his trial; the question is, who are his peers—who are his equals? Must it be men of equal wealth?—is a poor man not to be upon the jury which tries a rich man?

Mr. PETTIT. There must be political equality.

Mr. STEVENSON. What is political equality? Are you going to require that democrats shall be tried by democrats, and whigs by whigs? I have no idea that any such thing is intended, but I say the question is, who is to be considered the peer of the accused? If you say that a man shall be tried by his equals, are not all men equal? Our Constitution declares that all men are born free and equal? If that be the case, what is the object of this provision? Is it put there without an object? I presume not. I presume that the men who drafted it had an object in view. Then what is that object?—is it to keep the negro from trying the white man? No, sir, that is not it, because such a provision is not necessary. Well, then, what is the object? There can be none unless it be to prevent a poor man sitting upon the jury where a rich man is to be tried; or, to prevent a learned man from trying an unlearned man—or a man of a particular occupation in life, from trying a man of a different occupation. I say that I can see no object in it. We have not this word in our old Constitution—nor in our laws; and I should be glad before I am called upon to vote for it, to know for what purpose it is introduced. If gentlemen can give a satisfactory reason for it, I will go for it; until then I shall go against it.

Mr. OWEN. I would not talk five minutes for the sake of keeping the phrase in, or putting it out. But there is not a word in the whole range of the common law that is better understood—every one understands it perfectly. The provision is, that a man shall be tried by his equals. We have expressly declared that all men are created equal; this declaration stands in the very same article. It means that, and can mean nothing else. No other construction can be given to it; but it is not worth talking about. If the Convention think it is better to strike it out, I have no objection that it shall be stricken out.

Mr. RARIDEN favored the motion to strike out; although the meaning of the phrase, he said, was perfectly clear and would be readily understood by everybody. There could be no doubt as to what the decisions of the courts would be in regard to persons of color serving on juries. No such thing was contemplated. The phrase was in common use. In England the signification was, that noblemen shall be tried by noblemen; commoners by commoners, peasants by peasants. He thought it would be as well to leave out the phrase, and leave the matter to be regulated by the Legislature.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said he was prepared to vote for the motion to strike out; but he would like to have a recognition of the composition of the jury. He would, therefore, move to amend the motion by inserting the words, "composed of a jury of the State." [A Voice—"a jury of the county."]

Mr. STEVENSON accepted the amendment as a modification of his motion.

The question was then taken on the amendment of gentleman from Putnam, to strike out the words "of his peers," and insert "composed of a jury of the country," and it was agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN. I propose now to insert after the word "county," the following words; "unless for cause shown, the judge shall direct a change of venue to some other county."

Mr. HALL. It appears to me that the section is precisely as it should be after the striking out of the word "peers." I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMILEY moved to amend by inserting the words "licensed or unlicensed" after the word "counsel."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. COLFAX proposed to amend the section by adding a provision authorizing a change of venue in criminal prosecutions upon the application of the accused.

Mr. OWEN suggested that it would be better to strike out the words which restrict the trial to the county in which the offense is committed, and leave it to the Legislature to make the necessary provision on the subject.

Mr. GIBSON remarked that, if that restriction were stricken out, it would give the State the right to remove the trial, whereas it ought to be the privilege of the accused.

Mr. RARIDEN agreed with the gentleman from Clark, that this is a right that should not be given to the State, because it might operate oppressively upon the individual. It was the right of the criminal to be tried in the county where the offense is committed; but the courts had held that, if he chose to surrender that right, they might exercise the power of removing the trial to another county.

Mr. PETTIT said he did not think that, upon a judicial construction, there would be an absolute necessity for amending the section as proposed. But it could do no harm. He agreed with the gentleman from Wayne, that it was the right of the accused to be tried in the county where the offense is committed; but if he should see fit to waive his right, the State could not object. But, for the purpose of making it more certain, he had drawn up an amendment similar to that which had been proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph, and had intended to offer it, if the gentleman had not anticipated him. He hoped the amendment would be adopted.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on the engrossment of the section,

Mr. RISTINE moved to amend by adding, at the close of the section, a provision giving to the accused, or his counsel, the closing argument before the court or jury trying the case.

The question was taken, and, by ayes 32, noes 33, the amendment was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that no man shall be put twice in jeopardy for the same offense, was read a second time.

Mr. MARCH moved to amend by adding the words "in any criminal prosecution."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. NEWMAN, the word "man" was stricken out, and "person" inserted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that offenses, other than capital, shall be bailable by sufficient securities, and that capital offenses shall not be bailable when the proof is evident, or the presumption great, was read a second time.

Mr. THORNTON moved to strike out the section; and substitute in lieu thereof a provision to the effect that all cases shall be bailable when security of a sufficient amount is given, according to the magnitude of the offense and the circumstance of the accused.

I have had, said Mr. T., some little experience in criminal trials, and I have seen difficulty arising from the refusal of the courts to suffer an individual, charged with crime to give bail. I was recently engaged in a case of this character in our circuit, in which the right of an individual charged with murder, to be let to bail, was brought in question.

So far as my opinion is concerned, I have for many years entertained the belief that no person should be subjected to a forfeiture of life for any offense whatever. I have sincerely doubted the right, as well as the policy, of taking life as a punishment for crime; and I am not prepared to say but this Convention may come to the same conclusion. I hope, at least, that the Legislature will ere long do so. I dislike the use of the phrase "capital offense." It implies that the punishment must be death. If gentlemen agree with me, they will say that this is not the language that ought to be inserted in the Constitution.

In the case above referred to, the accused, as before remarked, was charged with murder; and upon the question, whether he should be admitted to bail, the president judge seemed to hesitate whether he had a right to such privilege under the provisions of our present Constitution, arising simply from the fact of his being charged with the crime of murder. But, I would ask, how is the proof to be assumed as evident, or the presumption great? Is it to be predicated on the circumstance, merely, that the accused stands charged with murder in an indictment, without adducing any proof of the fact? Or must it first be shown, on the part of the prosecution, that the case is such as to preclude the accused from asking the benefit of bail? The latter is the only rational conclusion; to assume any other would be involving a monstrous absurdity, and tend to oppression. This, although the only one reconcilable with reason, common sense, and the plain rights of the accused, would subject his case to pre-judgment, as the Court, whose province it is to settle the question of bail, must have some legitimate and satisfactory proof of the circumstances attending the transaction, to enable it to decide understandingly.

I have been retained sometimes in cases where it has become my painful duty to defend a man on trial for his life, and I have ever contended that it was the duty of the court to require, on the part of the prosecution, the requisite proofs which went to establish the guilt of the accused, before the court could refuse to admit the prisoner to bail; but the practice seems to be, just to charge an individual with murder, and the court, instead of following the maxim of the common law, which presumes that every man accused of crime is innocent until the contrary is proved, acts upon the presumption of the guilt of the accused, and refuses bail. Well, sir, I do not like the words "capital punishment," because it recognizes the infliction of the odious and abhorrent death-penalty, and this must be the case as long as the Constitution, which contains such a provision, continues in existence. It seems to me, then, that some other language ought to be used. I am, therefore, for striking out the section and inserting the words which I have suggested.

I have seen, with great pleasure, during the period of our deliberations in this Convention, gentlemen advocating the rights of man, and for the protection of our citizens, in the enjoyment of their liberty. I have seen the utmost jealousy evinced here at the idea, even, of imprisonment for debt. But under this provision, a man may be charged with an offense of which he is wholly innocent, and yet he is to be liable to incarceration in a jail, without having an opportunity afforded him to show his innocence, or to demand proof of his guilt—without the privilege of being admitted to bail. I call upon gentlemen to come to the rescue. I know that when an aggravated offense is charged against an individual, a clamor is raised, and the prejudices of the community excited against him. In the case to which I above alluded, the accused person had the misfortune, in self-defense, as he believed, to take the life of a fellow man; and I believe, conscientiously, that the circumstances of his case were such, that if ever there was a case of justifiable homicide, it was that case. It was proposed that he should give bail in any amount the Court might prescribe; yet the judge hesitated whether he had the right to admit him to bail, and no other reason seemed to be assigned, except the fact that he stood indicted for murder. The presumption should be, that the accused should be deemed innocent, until the contrary is shown. And I want to know how a judge is going to find out, before hand, that the man is guilty. It is a violation of the great principle just mentioned, that every person accused of the commission of crime, even upon indictment, is presumed to occupy the platform of innocence until that presumption is overcome by proofs of his guilt. Then I contend that no danger can grow out of the proposition I have had the honor to submit. It may be said, that if the offender be let to bail, facilities for escape will be afforded, and the ends of justice may be defeated. But, notwithstanding this, I cannot but believe that the rights of the citizen would be placed on safer ground, as, instead of the accused being incarcerated in prison, upon the mere presumption of guilt, often to the ruin of his health and character, he would be permitted to enjoy his liberty, and have the opportunity of preparing for his defense.

I know that gentlemen feel more or less attachment for old established usages, but I never could perceive how the language here used, and which is but a transcript from the old Constitution, is to be practically applied; and owing to the various constructions it may receive, it appears to me it would be much safer to adopt language less equivocal, and more clear and positive in its terms. I admit, that before an original court of examination into the nature of the charge alleged against an accused person, it can have a sensible application, perhaps; but when the accused has been indicted and is brought before the court, upon an application to be admitted to bail, it appears to me to be doing violence to every presumption in favor of human liberty, as understood under our free institutions, for the court to assume, that because an indictment has been returned by a grand jury against him, there exists such "great presumption" of guilt, as to close the door to giving bail. This consideration is strengthened by reflecting that as under an indictment for murder, the accused may be found guilty of a minor offense, grand juries often return indictments for the more aggravated offense, when the evidence only conduces to establish the less one.

There is another consideration to which I wish to call attention, and it is this: I have seen the same amount of bail exacted from a poor man, as from a rich one. When the Court makes an order to hold a man to bail, no matter what his circumstances may be, although poor, he is required to give bail in the same amount as if he were the richest man in the State. This amendment contemplates that bail shall be proportionate to the magnitude of the offense and the circumstances of the party arrested. I would not advocate making invidious distinctions between men, but what I mean is this: when a man is called upon to give bail, if he be wealthy it is much more proper to require that he should give larger bail than if he were a poor man. It seems to me, therefore, that some provision of this kind should be adopted.

Mr. GIBSON inquired of the Chair if it was in order to amend so as to perfect the original section before striking out the entire section?

The PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative.

Mr. GIBSON then proposed to amend by striking out the words "capital offenses," and inserting the words "murder and treason." It was a matter that was, at least, questionable, he said, whether there ought to be such a thing as capital punishment in this State. If offenses were capital, they must necessarily be punished with death; but he doubted the propriety of declaring that any offenses should be regarded as capital offenses. With regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Floyd, he considered it one of the most startling innovations that had ever been introduced into our system. What was it? It was that a man who was willing to pay a sufficient price, might commit murder with impunity. The only question he would have to ask himself would be. Am I willing to pay the price? Having settled that question he might commit murder, and then walk abroad at noon-day. All he has to do was to pay the price at which the bail was fixed, and then he might quietly put up his goods and leave the country. It appeared to him that it would be much better to insert the particular crime instead of saying "capital offense," because the Legislature might, at some future day, abolish the punishment of death. They might say that no man shall forfeit his life for any offense. He thought that the Convention ought to adopt the amendment that he had proposed. It would accomplish the object that was contemplated by the gentleman from Floyd.

Mr. LOCKHART said he could see no advantage that could arise from amending the section as proposed. The amendment of the gentleman from Floyd was very objectionable, and that of the gentleman from Clark was scarcely less objectionable. He would move that they be laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN requested the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. LOCKHART withdrew the motion.

Mr. OWEN said he thought the object of the amendment of the gentleman from Clark was certainly a good one, and that it ought to be adopted. It was not at all improbable that the death punishment would hereafter be abolished, and in that case there would be nothing to which the provision would apply.

Mr. HOWE moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "murder," the words "in the first degree."

Mr. GIBSON accepted the amendment.

Mr. BORDEN said he was desirous of making a distinction between murder and treason. He hoped that a provision would be inserted declaring that treason should not be punishable by death. So far as the crime of murder was concerned it was correct and proper that it should be punishable by death. He saw no difficulty in the matter; but he thought the Convention would do well to abolish the death penalty for political offense, and reserve it for murder in the first degree.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Clark and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd.

Mr. THORNTON. I never for my part submit a proposition that I have not some doubts that I may be wrong. But it seems that I am not fortunate enough to make any proposition that is agreeable to the intellectual palate of the gentleman from Clark. I have for years bestowed some attention upon this subject, and my observations have conducted me to the conclusion that the infliction of the death-penalty is intrinsically wrong in principle, and contrary to sound policy.

Had I the formation of a code of criminal law for this community, I would not incorporate in it a provision subjecting any person to a forfeiture of life for the commission of any offense whatever. I would feel disposed to imitate the course of Mr. Livingston, when appointed to frame a criminal code for Louisiana, who omitted to insert therein any penalty for the crime against nature; as he said he would not recognize the possibility that such an offense could be committed. In accordance with such views, it seems to me that to prescribe a punishment for the crime of treason against the State is time and paper thrown away, as no such offense is likely ever to be committed.

I cannot yet understand how a court can undertake to say that they can refuse bail because the merits of the case are of such a character, that bail ought to be refused. If there is anything that should be studiously kept out of view, it is commenting on the merits of the case of an individual, which is pending for trial in a court of justice. It tends to deprive the party accused of his just rights. It prevents him from having a fair trial. I never did believe in this thing of suspending a human being in the air, like a dog. It is revolting to my mind, and I am glad to witness indications unfavorable to the continuance of it as a punishment for crime in several of the States, especially those which have been revising their Constitutions and criminal code recently. Great changes have been wrought within the last quarter of a century throughout the civilized Christian world. The scenes recently occurring at New Albany are enough to convince any one of the impropriety of countenancing the execution of criminals. I am now sixty-six years of age and I never saw but one man executed, and I trust in God I never shall see another.

I do not wish to be found experimenting on untried ground. I am no experimenter, no Jacobin. I believe the proposition that I have offered is right in itself, and that experience will prove it.

The gentleman from Clark, has put an extreme case. But admitting the happening of such a contingency as he suggests, which is not very likely, and the rich man bailed should pay the forfeiture, it seems to me that the community would derive more benefit from that, than hanging him. Taking his life upon the gallows will not restore the murdered individual to life again. It also strikes out of existence a member of society, who if suffered to live, and undergo suitable punishment by imprisonment in the State Prison, might be able in some degree, to atone for the wrong he had inflicted on society, by rendering services in labor or otherwise, and at the same time would have the opportunity of repenting his crime, and becoming reformed. On the contrary, let his life be forfeited, and you deprive society of his services, and at the same time consign him with all his sins upon his head to meet the dread consequences wholly unprepared. The sole object of criminal punishment, after securing society, is to reform, not to exterminate the offender. The mild precepts of the Gospel is "that no pleasure is taken in the death of a sinner, but rather that he should return and live." It is enjoined upon us also to forgive our brother although his offenses may amount to seventy times seven.

I insist upon it, therefore, that the case presented by the gentleman from Clark, is an extreme one. I do not think that such is likely soon to happen in Indiana. I say to the Convention, that I shall not feel mortified if they reject my proposition, but it strikes me that it is in unison with those principles of philanthropy which religion and philosophy inculcate. The other parts of the proposition, I hold are calculated to advance the cause of personal liberty. If an individual shall have committed a crime of a very high and aggravated character, let the amount of the bail be augmented accordingly. So far as I am concerned I must adhere to the principle that is contained in my proposition; and I should be glad to have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and they were taken with the following result—yeas 9, nays 90:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chapman, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Foster, Hawkins, McClelland, Mooney Thornton, and Zenor—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gregg, Hadson, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hendricks, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, and Mr. President—90.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to amend the section by striking out habeas corpus, and inserting "have the body."

Mr. PETTIT. How absurd it is!

Mr. GIBSON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "have his carcass." It will be found just like the original. [Much laughter.]

Mr. McCLELLAND. That is Norman French, I suppose.

Mr. GIBSON (laughing). I withdraw it.

The question was taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Randolph, and it was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MAY. I was not so fortunate as to catch the eye of the President before the section was declared by the Chair to be passed. If I had succeeded in doing so, it was my intention to have said a few words in reference to the change of phraseology of the section.

Mr. GIBSON moved that the vote by which the section was ordered to be engrossed, be reconsidered for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Steuben to address the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then being, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. MAY. If my recollection is correct, Mr. President, some two or three weeks since, this Convention passed a section substantially as follows:

"In the enactment of laws by the Legislature, all technical terms in the Latin language shall be avoided as far as is practicable."

I have not that section before me, nor can I turn to it without detaining the Convention longer than I am willing to do. I believe, however, I have correctly stated the substance of it. If not, I shall be pleased to have any gentleman correct me.

Now, Mr. President, it is a matter of little or no consequence to this Convention, whether that section was voted for by me or not. For our present purpose, it is sufficient for us to know that the section was passed, and it may, of course, be presumed to have received a majority of the votes of the members present. Whatever may have been my opinion of the wisdom of the Convention in making it a part of the Constitution, it is certain that I did not participate in the discussion that was then had, nor should I now do so, did I not think that we are, by the course we are pursuing, involving ourselves in an inconsistency, which is, to say the least, discreditable.

I believe, Mr. President, that, thus far, there have occurred, since we entered upon the work of revising the Constitution, only three instances of these technical Latin words which we have declared to be odious and deserving to be expunged from our laws. The first instance occurred in that section which has for its subject the manner of elections and in which the term "viva voce" occurs. When that section was under consideration, an attempt was made by some gentleman to have that term stricken out, and some English word or words of equivalent import inserted in its place. The second instance occurred in that section which we have passed and in which the words "ex post facto" are found. As in the first instance, so also in this, an attempt was made to have these Latin words stricken out, and English words substituted. And now, sir, we have in the section before us the third instance of these objectionable Latin terms, namely, the term "habeas corpus," and the question is, shall we again do as we have twice before done, by ordering its engrossment, vote to retain this phrase, and thus, a third time, violate a rule of our own making; or shall we endeavor to avoid it, and use in its stead English words of equivalent meaning?

Now, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I do not very much care whether this Convention retains these technical Latin terms, or substitute English words. I make no pretension to an intimate acquaintance with the Latin or any other language, but sir, from what I have heard from the lips of gentlemen who have so profoundly discussed this question, I am well satisfied that I can soon learn all that they know about the matter, and, with a reasonable amount of diligence in study shall be able to work my way through these obstructions, at least as successfully as some other gentlemen. I am, however, desirous, that in making this Constitution, we shall not stultify ourselves. Having laid down the rule that technical terms in the Latin language ought not to be used, I desire that we should live up to this rule, which is of our own making. Especially, sir, do I desire that we ourselves shall abide by every rule that we have laid down for others. By the section which we have passed, we have made it imperative upon the Legislature, that they shall never use Latin terms, except where it is absolutely necessary; and yet we continue to use them ourselves, as if we had never established any such rule.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask this Convention if it is anything else than the fear of making ourselves ridiculous, which restrains us from doing as we have ordered the Legislature hereafter to do! Is it anything else which deters us from marching up to the line which we have chalked out, and which we have required our future legislators to stand up to? I certainly can think of no other reason, unless gentlemen say that in the instances which have thus far occurred, it has not been practicable to insert English words in place of the Latin terms.

With all due deference, however, Mr. President, to those learned gentlemen, who evidently are perfectly at home in this discussion respecting the meaning of Latin words, I must be permitted to give it as my opinion, that for every one of these technical Latin phrases which have thus far occurred, it is entirely practicable to substitute equivalent English words.

Let us take for instance, the first example which occurred—the one occurring in that section which reads, "all elections in the Legislature shall be by a 'viva voce' vote," and which we passed almost upon the very same day we established the rule that Latin terms should no longer be used. Gentlemen surely cannot have forgotten the motion which was then made, to strike out "viva voce," and insert their English meaning, "living voice." That motion did not prevail. If it had prevailed, the section would have read as follows: "All elections in the Legislature shall be by a 'living voice' vote." Why did not that motion prevail? Not because one sentence does not convey the same meaning as the other, but evidently because it sounds awkwardly, and looks ridiculously.

Now, sir, I confess that I do not altogether like the term "living voice," myself. I do not fully admire the use of the word "living" in connection with the word "voice." I am not certain that I know fully the difference between a living voice and any other kind of voice. But why not use the word "voice?"

alone, omitting the term "living?" It seems to me amply sufficient. The section would then read: "All elections shall be by a voice vote." Is not this, Mr. President, as intelligible as "viva voce vote?" It certainly is as easily and quickly spoken, if that is of any consequence. It seems to me that the most fastidious English scholar we have here (and, sir, we have some confessedly brilliant ones) might by an effort bring himself to use such a phrase. But if that should not suit him, let him designate some other term. I would suggest, for instance, the word "audible." There is abundance of them. So that, in this instance, at least, there was no reason why we should have hesitated to walk up to the line we marked out for the Legislature to stand up to.

Let us now, Mr. President, turn to the next phrase—the term "ex post facto"—that we have encountered, and see if that, too, may not somehow be avoided. This, sir, like the last, is a Latin phrase, but, unlike the last, is so miserably put together, if I may use that term, that if it were not sanctioned by an immemorial usage, a man using it would only excite mirth and contempt. The gentlemen from Randolph (Mr. McClelland) in his speech the other day, characterized this phrase as "dog Latin,"—I have elsewhere heard it styled "hog Latin." It is enough for our purpose here to know that in itself it is a perfectly meaningless phrase, one which can plead for its use nothing but custom. But we have decided that we will not perpetuate the custom, unless in cases where it is absolutely necessary. Now sir, I ask, is it necessary in this case? Is there no English word which can be substituted in its stead? I assert that such a word exists. The word "retro-active" is synonymous with the phrase "ex post facto," as any one can satisfy himself by turning to the larger edition of Webster's English Dictionary. It will there be found that the same definition is given to this term, when applied to a statute law, that is given to the term "ex post facto" in our law books. There is also the word "retrospective"—a word of more familiar use, but one not, as it seems to me, sufficiently corresponding to this Latin phrase, to justify its substitution for it. The word first named, however, does correspond in meaning sufficiently to take the place of this barbarism—for it is nothing less—the term "ex post facto."

Now, Mr. President, I can anticipate that some learned members may say that this very word itself is a Latin word, and is therefore to the full as objectionable as the original phrase. Should they say so, I shall beg leave to differ with them, and though I should be an unequal match for any of them in such a contest as this, I yet, sir, should hardly hesitate to try to make good my assertion as against theirs. And in passing I may perhaps be permitted to say that it seems to me hardly sufficient for a gentleman seeking to prove words to be Latin words, to prove them to be of Latin origin, as the learned gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) gravely undertook a day or two since to do. Not much learning is needed to convince any man that our language is a composite one—a language made up of words derived from many other languages, the Latin language with the rest. This however is far from establishing that words of foreign origin, but which have been subsequently adapted to our own language, are still foreign words.

Let us now turn, Mr. President, to the third and last instance of technical Latin term which we have encountered—the term contained in the section now under consideration—the words "habeas corpus." And I must here again ask gentlemen to remember that my position is not so much, that this and the like phrases shall never be used by any one, as it is that they ought not to be used by us so long as we retain the section prohibiting the Legislature from using them. I am now only urging gentlemen to live up to their own rule.

What we desire to ascertain now is whether some English words may not be found corresponding in meaning to the Latin words in the sentence: "The writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended."

I confess, Mr. President, that I do not altogether like the words which the gentleman from Randolph (Mr. McClelland) proposed to us as a substitute. They sounded harshly and unpleasantly to me when first proposed, and perhaps appeared to others equally undesirable. But may not some others be found less objectionable?

While the gentleman who preceded me was speaking, a friend upon my left who seldom obtrudes his views upon the Convention, drew up as a substitute for the original section the following, which, with his permission, I will read to the Convention:

"No person illegally imprisoned, or restrained of his liberty under any pretence whatever, shall ever be deprived of the right to be personally brought before some tribunal or officer, for the purpose of having the cause of such imprisonment or restraint examined into."

What objection, I would ask, can be raised against such a phraseology of the section? It seems to me to be only objectionable on account of its length, its circumlocution. This certainly is no terrible evil, to avoid which we are required to sacrifice consistency.

Another phraseology of the section occurs to me, Mr. President, by which we may escape from these Latin technicalities, if we really desire to do so, half so much as we profess. Let the section be amended to read as follows:

"The writ of freedom, heretofore styled the writ of habeas corpus shall never be suspended except, &c."

Now, sir, I can imagine that this proposition may excite a smile with some gentlemen, for the reason that it retains the very phrase which we seek to avoid. True it is retained; but it is only retained that it may be identified with the new name henceforth proposed to be given to it, and be then dismissed among things to be forgotten.

The "writ of freedom," or, if gentleman prefer it, the writ of liberty. I ask if such a term may not properly take the place of habeas corpus, without any very violent shock to gentlemen with over-sensitive nerves, to say nothing of ears. What we seek is some brief English phrase to take the place of the Latin phrase. So that it express substantially the same idea, and does not offend against correct taste and grammar, the rest is of but little consequence. The commissioners appointed to revise the New York code, under instructions to avoid these Latin technicalities, decided to style the writ of habeas corpus the "writ of deliverance"—deliverance from imprisonment a gentleman tells me, and by that name it is now known and used in that State. Surely, Mr. President, liberty has suffered no such shock there, in consequence of the change, that gentlemen need be frightened from their consistency. As between the phrase "writ of freedom" proposed by myself, and the phrase "writ of deliverance," as used in New York, I do not know that there is any great choice. I certainly would not argue long for either. Both are brief, and both substantially express the same idea which is contained in their Latin substitute.

But, Mr. President, I am detaining the Convention too long on this question. I have not attempted in these few remarks, to convince gentlemen of the propriety of establishing the rule to avoid Latin technicalities. That rule they have established for themselves. I have only endeavored to show them that there is no particular necessity for violating it—at least none as yet. Why then, I ask, is it repeatedly violated? I can conceive of no other reason than the very simple one that arises from a fear lest we make ourselves ridiculous by adhering to it.

The question was then put and the section was ordered to be engrossed by unanimous consent.

The section which declares that excessive bail shall not be required—that excessive fines shall not be imposed—that cruel and unusual punishment shall not be inflicted, &c., was read a second time, and no amendment being offered, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which declares that no law shall restrict the right of the people to bear arms, whether in defense of themselves or of the State, was read a second time.

Mr. RARIDEN said he would like to know from the gentlemen who reported this section whether it was the intention to permit or prohibit the wearing of concealed weapons. He preferred the language of the old Constitution. He would move to strike out the section and insert the corresponding section of the old Constitution.

Mr. OWEN said he would suggest to the gentleman from Wayne that if he wished to prohibit the carrying of weapons it would be necessary to change the language of the old Constitution. For if it were declared by Constitutional provision that the people should have the right to bear arms, no law of the Legislature could take away that right.

Mr. RARIDEN. I will change my motion so as to strike out the word "restrict" and insert the word "restrain."

Mr. OWEN. Had it not better be, "no law shall deprive the people of the right," &c.

Mr. RARIDEN. Yes, sir, that will be better.

The question being taken upon the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. MILROY moved to strike out all after the word "arms."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to strike out the whole section and insert the corresponding section in the old Constitution.

The motion did not prevail.

Mr. SHOUP moved to amend by inserting the words, "in an open and unconcealed manner."

The amendment was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which declares that the Legislature shall not bestow any title of nobility, nor confer hereditary distinctions, nor grant extraordinary privileges, was read a second time.

Mr. READ of Monroe moved to amend by striking out the words, "grant extraordinary privileges," and inserting the following:

"Nor grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges and immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not belong equally to all citizens."

Mr. READ said that his object in offering this amendment was to render the section more distinct and definite in its signification. It was not designed to interfere with the rights of corporations, and had no reference whatever to a State Bank, nor would it affect any of the institutions of the State. He was convinced that such a principle as that embraced in the amendment should find a place in the Constitution. He had consulted a number of legal gentlemen on the subject, and they all agreed that it was a sound principle. It was merely intended to prevent that which had been much complained of in this country, and which might be called class legislation.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "citizen" and inserting the word "inhabitant."

Mr. BADGER moved to lay the amendments upon the table.

A division of the question was asked for and the question was first taken on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Allen on the table, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe on the table,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 39, nays 85—as follows:

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—85.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. DAVIS of Madison moved to amend the amendment by inserting the following proviso:

“Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to prevent the Legislature from establishing a State Bank.”

Mr. BUTLER moved that the amendment to the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was, upon a division, ayes 69, noes 53, agreed to.

Mr. RARIDEN moved that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. WALPOLE moved that the section be re-committed to the committee on rights and privileges.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe,

Mr. RARIDEN demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. RITCHEY said he was afraid there was something covered up in this amendment. He was afraid there was something intended by it that was not apparent upon its face. He moved that, for the present, it be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT remarked that the motion to lay on the table was not now in order, a similar motion having been decided in the negative.

Mr. KILGORE said, that in order to afford time to reflect upon the proposition, he would move that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. PETTIT. Is it in order to move to adjourn over until Thursday? If so, I will make that motion; for I can assure gentlemen that I shall not work on New Year's day.

Mr. RITCHEY rose to a point of order. He desired to know whether the question could be taken upon adjourning to any other than the usual hour, upon a mere motion?

Mr. PETTIT withdrew his motion.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Monroe,

Mr. MATHER moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded by the Convention, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The yeas and nays having been previously ordered, were taken, with the following result—yeas 69, nays 52—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—69.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Snook, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—52.

So the amendment was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the Governor, Auditor, and Treasurer of State, stating that the agreement for the use of the Masonic Hall by the Convention, was for the day time only, and if occupied at night there would be an extra charge.

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. TAYLOR,

Of Laporte, on the "Rights of married women," delivered Tuesday Morning, December 17, 1850.

MR. TAYLOR. I have waited with great patience, Mr. President, for an opportunity to participate in this debate, and I therefore, with the indulgence of the Convention, embrace the present occasion to make a few remarks.

It is well known that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has presented for our consideration, this proposition, the object of which is to keep separate, as the sole estate of the wife, all the property owned or received by her before or during the marriage. He presented it, doubtless, because in his judgment, it is better calculated to promote human happiness generally, than any other that has been submitted to this body.

Yet there are other gentlemen equally anxious to promote the general happiness, as far as it can be done by our action, who entirely differ with him in opinion, as to the effects of the measure proposed.

That men, equally honest, should entertain different views and arrive at opposite conclusions, is neither unusual nor surprising. Yet the gentleman, whose sincerity I am ready to acknowledge, has wrought himself into a passion on this subject. He has had it so long upon his mind, that he cannot listen with common forbearance to any argument in opposition to his view of it. He looks upon it almost as treason for any gentleman to differ with him as to the mode of protection which the law shall afford to the wife respecting her property.

I do not think, sir, that gentlemen should be hasty in making up their minds upon this question. They may be inflicting an injury, where they seek to confer a benefit. I will not yield to any gentleman on this floor, in a sincere desire to protect those to whose kindness and affection we are so much indebted. I too, have had a kind mother, and have yet sisters, a good and affectionate wife, and confiding children, and it is for their protection, that I would sustain the present system of law.

I sincerely regret that the gentleman from Posey, brought forward this proposition, for the reason that its agitation will do no good, and its adoption would create discord and disunion in the family circle, and strike down the happy relation existing between man and his wife. What, sir, can be more delightful than the happiness which meets at the family altar, and nestles around the fireside, when all are united by the sweet ties of affection and a common interest? What more painful than to see those whom God and nature have made one, drawn apart and rendered unhappy by a diversity of interests, engaged in a foolish and wicked struggle to keep their property from the enjoyment of one another, forever sacrificing domestic peace on the altar of cupidity? Even if, in springing this question, you persuade the wife that she is opposed by the laws of the land, you render her discontented and miserable, and wound the keenest sensibilities of the human heart.

I do not think, sir, that the women of this country are slaves. I believe that on the contrary, they have much to do with training us from our boyhood, and preparing us for usefulness in life; and that our conduct as statesmen and as patriotic citizens, is greatly influenced by their counsels.

I have been astonished in hearing the unjustifiable attacks made on our present system of laws, a system which had been in existence here more than seventy years. Is it possible that our revolutionary fathers and their descendants have for seventy years, been engaged in passing laws only to enslave the kind partners of their bosoms? It is a stigma upon those great men who have long since passed away. Did Washington, and Adams, and Franklin, and Jackson love their wives less than we do ours? Never let it be said, sir, that men of such wisdom, principle, and kindness of heart as were the founders of this government, enacted laws to oppress those whose consolations and sympathy cheered and supported them in the darkest hours of misfortune, and whose smiles gave a brightness to the triumphs they achieved in the cause of their country.

But can it be that the females of this State, desire a change in those laws under which they have lived so long without inconvenience or injury? Do they wish to engage in commerce or in the other various employments of men? I think not, sir. I believe they have no anxiety to engage in pursuits so foreign to their gentle nature. They feel that the hard toil of the laborer, the anxieties of business, the greedy strife for wealth, or fame, or power, are not for them. If, however, any young lady, unlike the majority of her sex, has a taste for the occupations of men, she has only to remain single, and as the law now stands, she may follow any of the trades or professions, to her entire satisfaction. The opportunity is afforded her and the law will grant her protection. There can be no manner of doubt, however, that if the young ladies do make such a choice, there will be many single men who will regret it. [Laughter.] But should they prefer to regard with favor, the worthy young men of the country, and give to them the charge of their welfare, as those have done who have gone before them, I imagine that all parties will be much better pleased.

No doubt the motives of the gentleman were honest, in introducing this section; but if he had viewed it as I do, he never would have brought it before this body. He appears to think that happiness in the conjugal relation is connected with dollars and cents, but I maintain that the institution of marriage is based on a stronger and more durable foundation. It is founded on the difference between the sexes, and established by the laws of nature, which have given to man, strength, hardihood, and courage; to woman, weakness, delicacy, and tenderness; which, in a word, have made man the father, protector, and head of the family; woman the mother, nurse, and bosom companion. Money is only useful as an assistant to add to the comfort of man and wife, where it is made the principal object of marriage, it becomes a curse. I have known married couples as happy without any property whatever, as those who possess it in abundance. And, sir, where they have property, it is abused to talk about the pecuniary rights of the wife, when a faithful and affectionate husband has the charge of that wife.

But, sir, there is another view of this subject which I would commend to the attention of gentlemen. Suppose this section permanently adopted, and its provisions in full operation, what would be the effect in a social and political point of view? Woman would not all at once take the lead in commerce, but in numberless cases where the husband had been unfortunate, the property would pass into the hands of the wife, and all the gains of trade would accrue to her. She would begin to feel a sex pride and ambition, and her property would be left to her daughters. The infection would spread from one to another, until, in the course of time, all the large landed estates, the bulk of the property, would belong to the females, and I maintain that, at length, men would be reduced to comparative insignificance, and we would have a new kind of aristocracy, a great landed female aristocracy. Those who are in favor of such a state of things and the numberless evils which would grow out of it, may vote for this proposition, but I trust that they would pause and consider well before they do so.

When gentlemen desire action with reference to drunken and profligate husbands, the case is different. To protect a wife from the oppression of such a husband, I am as ready as the gentleman from Posey. If that gentleman will present a proposition restricting the power and privileges of such husbands, I will go as far as the farthest in sustaining him. And whatever measure of a liberal and just character may be presented for the protection of the widow, of her who has lost her only earthly support, I will sustain, with all the powers I possess. I desire that she should have a comfortable subsistence reserved to her from her husband's property. Let such cases be specially provided for, but let them not be made an excuse for the sweeping measure before us.

It the gentleman from Posey will offer a section to bind closer the husband and wife, instead of dividing them, to promote the peace, and harmony, and happiness of the domestic circle, instead of destroying them, he will obtain for it my hearty co-operation and support.

Perhaps the position I make may not meet with the approval of all the ladies. If so, I regret it, for in assuming that position, I am actuated only by a most sincere desire to improve their condition, and to administer to their welfare.

These briefly, are my views upon this question, and I have only to say that I shall be compelled to vote against the adoption of this section now under consideration.

REMARKS OF MR. HITT,

Delivered on Monday Morning, Dec. 23, 1850.

MR. HITT presented a memorial from citizens of Kuox county, praying for a clause in the Constitution, that no persons be permitted the right of suffrage until they have paid a tax.

He said: These memorialists are mostly farmers of the county I have the honor in part, to represent. I know them personally, and can testify to their industry, intelligence and respectability.

I heartily concur in the sentiments expressed in the memorial. They complain of a grievance which no doubt pervades every county in the State, more or less. They are very willing to bear their legitimate share of the burden of taxation for the support of government, but are not willing that a certain class of citizens, who make the most noise and bustle on election days, should enjoy equal rights and privileges with themselves, and pay nothing into the Treasury. They think that every voter should be required to pay some tax, (if only a poll tax,) before voting. Although this involves a principle, which to some, might appear rather too much anti-republican, nevertheless, I think it a true one and should be incorporated in the Constitution.

Every true American should feel proud to acknowledge it a privilege as well as a duty, to aid in support of a government which guarantees to him the greatest political rights and privileges of any other on earth. Better far abolish the poll tax entirely, if the burden be not equally borne,

I hope the Convention will duly consider this matter, and at the proper time, give it a calm and respectful consideration. I move to lay it upon the table for the present.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 1, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. STEELE.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Sec. 1 of report No. 30, providing that no law restraining the free interchange of thoughts or opinions, &c., should be passed, was taken up, read a third time and passed.

LIBEL.

The second section, declaring that in all prosecutions for libel, the truth of the matter alleged to be libellous, may be given in justification; and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts, was then taken up and read a third time.

Mr. THORNTON. I desire, sir, to submit a motion to re-commit the section under consideration, with certain instructions, to which I wish to call the attention of the Convention. It will be recollected that, several years ago, our Supreme Court decided that the court had a right to give the law to a jury, even in criminal as well as in civil cases. Afterwards they modified that decision, by saying that jurors should be the judges of the law as well as of the facts. The section now about to pass, it seems to me, is hardly full enough. It guards the rights of individuals who are prosecuted for libel criminally, but I have doubts if an individual who is sued for libel, in a civil action, can, under its provisions, be permitted to give the truth in evidence as a defense.

The celebrated Lord Mansfield, the most distinguished jurist who ever graced the English bench, held the monstrous doctrine, that the greater the truth the greater the libel. It is well known that a decision of this character, pronounced by him, in the great case of the King vs. Woodfill, gave rise to the pungent and terrible philippics of Junius, and eventually brought about the passage of an act of Parliament, securing to the individual who might be prosecuted for libel, the right to give the truth in evidence.

I have no doubt but that the draftsman of this section, had it in view to make it cover civil as well as criminal cases; but I am apprehensive, if left in its present form, it will be liable to misconstruction, and its import may be so frittered away by the action of the courts, as to preclude a defendant, in a civil action, from giving the truth in evidence as a defense. We have abundant examples of the tendency of some of our American courts, as well as those of Great Britain formerly, to adopt a construction, which has the effect to deprive a defendant of the benefit of it. The whole current of the recent New York cases of libel, especially the Cooper cases, go to show this, and very recently, under the improved system there adopted, decisions have been given which clearly indicate that the truth of the alleged libel will not always serve as a shield to a defendant. It is now admitted to be well settled law, that, in a criminal case, the jury has an unquestionable right to decide upon questions of law as well as of fact, although they may differ from the court in so doing. It has even been held that if a juror, whose convictions of the law lead him to a different conclusion from the opinion propounded by the court, should, through a false difference to such opinion, surrender his own, he would be obnoxious to the imputation of having committed moral perjury; and it would not change the character of the case, if, in entertaining such conviction, he should differ from all his fellow-jurors, as well as the court.

But I understand, sir, that in civil cases the court has a right to propound the law, and the jury to find the facts. In a civil action, then, might not such a construction obtain, as might have a tendency to preclude the defendant from giving the truth in evidence, unless we provide some sufficient guard here for that purpose.

I propose to re-commit, with the following instructions: To insert after the word "libel," in the 5th line, the following: "as with any criminal so with any civil case;" and also after the word "right," in the 6th line, insert the following: "in all criminal cases."

I am indebted to my friend on my right, (Mr. McClelland,) of Randolph; indeed, I may well say it his proposition, instead of mine—in the well known hackneyed phrase so often used here, "his thunder"—for this proposition. It has struck my mind seriously, however, that there is something in it. I believe that we ought to make provision in the new Constitution, that parties should have the right to give the truth in evidence as a defense in civil actions as well as criminal prosecutions. The proposed amendment will secure the object.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The third section, making provision for remedy by law in courts for injury of character or person, and the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections, referring to the manner in which criminals shall be tried, were severally read a third time and passed.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. ALLEN moved to re-commit the eighth section, in relation to writs of habeas corpus, with instructions to strike out and insert—

"No person, unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of his liberty, under any pretence whatever, shall ever be deprived of the right of being personally brought before some tribunal or officer, for the purpose of having the cause of such imprisonment or restraint inquired into, and justice done in the premises."

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 45, nays 69:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alien, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Borden, Bright, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hitt, Keiso, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Robinson, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Watts, and Work—45.

PUNISHMENT FOR OFFENSES.

The ninth section, declaring that excessive bail and fines shall not be permitted, and cruel and unnecessary punishments inflicted, was taken up and read a third time.

Mr. MILROY moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to add: "the penalty of death shall in no case be inflicted."

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend: "except it be for cool, deliberate, and premeditated murder."

Mr. B. said that he did not believe that a man should be put to death for political offenses. A man ought only to be executed, in his opinion, where he deliberately formed the design to commit murder. If a man was only to be sentenced to the penitentiary for life when he committed a murder, a burglar, for instance, would commit murder, in order to remove the evidence against him, if he should be disturbed in his depredations. He would reason to himself that, if caught, he would have to go the penitentiary, and if he killed the individual who might discover him in the act of burglary, there would be no evidence against him; and if the deed were found out, he would only have to go to jail. He was in favor, then, of inflicting the penalty of death upon all who coolly and premeditatively committed murder, but for no other offense.

Mr. KELSO remarked that he was opposed to capital punishment in any form. He considered that, when, by the operation of law, the life of a human being, charged with murder, was taken in the form of an execution, it was no more nor less than committing another murder right over for the murder the criminal had committed. Surely, a murder could not be committed more coolly than it was by law. A court investigated the case of a man charged with committing murder, and counsel were employed to seek out evidence to convict him, so that he might be punished if guilty; and this, in his estimation, was as cool and deliberate attempt to murder the accused, as he himself could ever have been guilty of in the murder of anybody else.

The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) had stated that a burglar, if the law provided simply for incarceration in the penitentiary for murder, would thereby be encouraged to kill an individual who might catch him in the act of committing burglary, because he would thus get rid of the evidence that would send him to the penitentiary. Now, he thought that the argument was on the other side, and that, in seven cases out of ten, if a man could enter a house for the purpose of robbing it, he would not destroy life if he were caught in the act, for fear of going to the penitentiary for life, as a murderer would be tracked much more closely than a mere thief; and there would be some difference between a chance between two and fourteen years in the one case, and imprisonment for life in the other. He saw no good reason whatever for destroying life for any offense whatever.

The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) wished men hanged for cool and deliberate murder. This, he said, would, unfortunately for him, destroy the force of all his argument upon the case of burglary, which he has just put. If a man enter a house with burglarious intent, and, upon being surprised, should, to effect his escape, kill his pursuers, this would be neither cool or deliberate; it would be a hasty killing upon the spur of an emergency, and would not come within his own rule of cool and deliberate murder.

They had, he said, a penitentiary, and they might apportion a dozen different wards, in proportion to the magnitude of the offense. They might prepare a dungeon for the murderer, from whence the light of day should be forever excluded.

Some gentlemen took the ground that, public executions would tend to awe the populace and repress murders; but he was satisfied that facts proved the contrary, and that executions tended more to encourage the crime of murder than to repress it. And why? Because the murderer became an individual of note; thousands would come to witness his execution; and his crime and probable execution would be the common talk of the day. Pride, then, would come to his aid, to enable him to walk to the scaffold apparently unawed, and to brave death, even with its icy hand upon his shoulder, and he thus becomes the hero of the day. The best thing, he thought, that could be done in relation to this matter was, to wipe from the statute book of Indiana this barbarism of hanging, for which no reasonable excuse could be offered.

Mr. BORDEN said that, at the request of several friends, he would modify his amendment as follows:

"Except it be for the crime of cool and premeditated murder."

Mr. HOWE said this was a question of very grave importance; and as he did not consider this the proper time for its discussion, he would move that the section and pending amendments be made the special order of the day for Friday week.

The motion was agreed to.

CONCEALED WEAPONS.

The twelfth section, providing that no law should restrict the right of the people to bear arms, whether in defense of themselves or of the State, next came up in order.

Mr. MILROY moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out, and insert "No person shall be restricted in the right to carry visible arms."

As the section now stood, Mr. M. thought that it gave a direct license to every desperado and ruffian in the State to carry concealed weapons. He did not think, however, that this was the opinion of the Convention, or that they would restrict the Legislature from passing any law for carrying concealed weapons.

A MEMBER. I hope the gentleman will modify his amendment, by adding after the word "arms" the words "or eyes." [Great laughter.]

The motion to re-commit was not agreed to.

Mr. NILES moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out, and insert the words, "That the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and the State," which was the precise language of the provision in the old Constitution upon the subject. He, Mr. N., was desirous whenever the words of the old Constitution were unobjectionable, and had received judicial construction, to retain them in the old form. He was opposed to the reported section from a fear it might possibly be so construed as to deprive the Legislature of power to prohibit the carrying of concealed weapons. The practice of carrying concealed weapons was one of the most dastardly, odious, and murderous practices that was ever tolerated in the civilized world, and unquestionably there was not a gentleman on that floor who would not feel shocked at the idea that no such prohibition could be passed.

Mr. COOKERLY (in his seat) The section has never yet been so construed.

The section was re-committed, with the instructions offered by the gentleman from LaPorte.

MILITARY.

Section thirteen, relating to the subordination of the military, and section fourteen, having reference to the quartering of soldiers, were read a third time, and passed.

TITLES OF NOBILITY.

Section fifteen, originally providing that "The Legislature shall not bestow any title of nobility, nor confer hereditary distinctions, nor grant extraordinary privileges," was then taken up for consideration.

This section, as amended on yesterday by Mr. Read of Monroe, was ordered to be engrossed, as follows:

"The Legislature shall not bestow any title of nobility, nor confer hereditary distinctions, nor grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges and immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens."

Mr. NILES said that he understood there were strenuous objections to the passage of this section, and he therefore hoped the vote upon the engrossment would be re-considered, so that opportunity might be afforded for showing whether these objections were just or not.

Mr. NAVE said that he had voted in the affirmative on the engrossment of this section last evening, as amended, having given the amendment offered by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) but a cursory examination at that time. He had since examined the amendment more thoroughly, and was satisfied that it was extremely objectionable. He would move, therefore, that the vote upon the engrossment of the section as amended be re-considered, and he would give his reasons for that re-consideration in a very few words.

The language of the amendment adopted last evening, "nor grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges and immunities which upon the same terms shall not equally belong to all citizens," he looked upon as of an extremely doubtful character, and which might have different constructions placed upon it. It might be so construed as that if a certain number of individuals in Indiana should organize themselves into a company to construct a railroad, a plank-road, or a ferry across a river, every citizen of Indiana would be entitled to enjoy the privileges of the road equally with those who had constructed it, and every citizen might receive a portion of the profits arising therefrom. But he understood that the amendment went even further than this, and that it was a direct attack upon every corporation in the State, private and public, upon State and individual banking. Many other reasons might be given. [Mr. N. was here compelled, owing to an affection, to cease his remarks.]

The question was then taken upon the motion to re-consider, and the yeas and nays being demanded were ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result:

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Graham of Miami, Howe, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Mowrer, Murray, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Trimble, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—54.

So the vote upon the engrossment of the section was re-considered.

Mr. HALL moved to amend, by striking out the entire section and inserting that "The Legislature shall not grant any title of nobility or hereditary distinctions."

Mr. DUNN of Perry moved to lay the amendment upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 43, nays 72:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Mather, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Trimble, Wiley, and Wunderlich—43.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—72.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

Mr. BERRY moved to amend the amendment by adding "nor grant any extraordinary privileges."

Upon this motion a division was called for, and by ayes 54, noes 40, the amendment was adopted.

The amendment as amended was adopted; and the section was ordered to be engrossed.

TERMS OF OFFICE.

The sixteenth section, providing that the Legislature shall create no office, the term of which shall be longer than four years, was taken up and read a second time.

Mr. READ of Clark moved to except the pilots at the falls of the Ohio river.

Mr. R. said he knew but little of these pilots, but he was satisfied from what he had heard in regard to them, that the longer they held their offices, the better they were qualified to perform their necessary duties. Some had held their situations for thirty and forty years; and he thought, as so much depended upon their skill and experience in the transportation of men and property, their term of office should be an exception. Five years would hardly enable a man to learn the hazardous duties of a pilot.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to strike out the word "five," immediately before the word "years," in the 47th line, and insert the word "four."

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I move to lay the pending amendments on the table.

Mr. COOKERLY called for a division of the question.

The question being first on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Jay (Mr. Milligan) on the table,

It was decided in the negative.

The question then being on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) on the table,

It was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "four" and inserting "three."

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "four" and inserting the word "six."

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Upon this motion, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 63, nays 56:

So the amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "four" and inserting the word "two."

Mr. BASCOM. Mr. President, I call for the previous question.

The call having been seconded by the Convention, the main question was ordered to be put.

The PRESIDENT. The question is first upon the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was not concurred in.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Jay, (Mr. Milligan,) to strike out "five," and insert "four."

The amendment was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RIGHTS AND IMMUNITIES.

Mr. READ of Monroe offered the following additional section:

Mr. R. said, I think the Convention will bear me witness, that I have not hitherto been pertinacious in advocating a principle when there has been a disposition in the Convention to reject it. I have always willingly abided by the result. But it is well known that on last evening the principle contained in the section I have just offered was adopted in the form of an amendment to the fifteenth section of Art. 20, by a large vote. This morning the gentleman from Hendricks made objection to the section as amended, and a motion to re-consider the vote prevailed. The section was then so amended, as that the principle I desired to have incorporated in it, did not come directly before the Convention. I have therefore brought forward the present section, in order that we may have the opportunity of voting directly upon the principle itself. I had supposed that the language of my former amendment was so plain that it would be impossible to misunderstand it; and I must say to the gentleman from Hendricks, (Mr. Nave,) that I was surprised at the conclusions he drew from the language of the amendment.

Mr. HOVEY moved to amend, so that where rights or immunities have been or may hereafter become vested by law in any company, citizen, or citizens, the General Assembly shall have no power to impair the same.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. There is a great deal of plausibility in the section offered by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) and because of the plausibility of the principle it contains, I voted yesterday for the engrossment of the fifteenth section, with an amendment embodying this principle. I desire to vote for the present section if I can have my mind fully satisfied as to its extent and bearing. I desire to have the gentleman's own understanding of it, and therefore will ask him a question. Suppose the Legislature of the State of Indiana or this Convention grants the power to establish a State Bank and branches—there is now a limited number of these institutions under the present Constitution—would not the amendment of the gentleman conclude that power?

Mr. READ of Monroe. Suppose the Legislature or this Convention should authorize the establishment of a State Bank and branches, upon the principle of the proposed section; in that case every branch would have to come in on the same terms. For example, if there was a sufficient amount of capital in a town or village, it would be in the power of the capitalists of that place to commence the business of banking as a branch of the State Bank, and upon the same conditions with other branches, and no one set of individuals in the business of banking could claim exclusive privileges. This destroys the monopoly principle, and I think that there are not twenty gentlemen even among those who are in favor of the State Bank, who would be in favor of this principle of monopoly. The doctrine of the section carried out in the laws and the Constitution would destroy monopoly State banking, but not prevent every system of State banking which might be devised.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I thank the gentleman for the explanation. I understand from it that this proposition is conclusive against the State Bank upon the plan on which it is now organized, and I regret exceedingly, therefore, that I must vote against it. But, sir, I am committed on this point. I am a State Bank man. The State of Indiana has got stock in the State Bank, and has fixed limitations upon it and its branches; but if the principle of my friend from Monroe is carried, there will be no limitations upon banking at all. He goes to the fullest extent for free banking, and for digging the present State Bank up by the roots.

Mr. BIDDLE. I desire to say a word or two in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) which meets with my cordial approval in every respect; and I think when it comes to be clearly understood in its effects by the members of the Convention, it will meet with the approbation of every gentleman in favor of equal rights.

One word in regard to this proposition as it stands connected with the State Bank question. I do not attempt to conceal my opinions on that subject; I shall vote against a State Bank. But allowing that a majority here are in favor of a State Bank that will not preclude them from providing for the application of this principle as a general rule, with the exception in favor of a State Bank. This is the way to settle the Bank question, so far as it is connected with this proposition. Much has been said in regard to the application of this principle to rail and plank roads and ferries. The position taken by the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) I consider a very unjustifiable one: that any corporation enjoying a certain monopoly, if you please, shall divide its profits with every citizen in the State. On the same principle, one individual who makes a contract with another must give the benefits of that contract to all his fellow citizens. The position, sir, is not a correct one. Gentlemen have put the case of a ferry, most frequently, as a case in point. Let us examine it. There is a case now pending in the Supreme Court, of a right to the exclusive use of a ferry which has been granted from year to year upon the conditions precedent, as prescribed in the Statute of Indiana, which is claimed to be held in fee simple. I will not speak of the judicial decision which should be made in the case, as it was my duty to decide it. But I undertake to say that this proposition interferes with no such right, or with the legislative power to grant the privilege of the use of the ferry from year to year as it is now granted. It does not mean that every citizen of Indiana has a right to a ferry license before granted to another; it only means that every citizen may apply under the same circumstances and on similar terms. Of course when once granted it belongs to the recipient. Would it not be absurd to say that if there was a contract made with A and B for a year, C, D, and E could come in and have equal privileges with A and B after the contract was made? It means that C, D, and E have an equal chance with A and B in obtaining the contract.

Sir, the proposition is a plain one, that there shall be no exclusive monopolies—no privileges granted to one man which shall not, under the same circumstances, belong to all men.

It is a sound judicial principle, that may be applied safely and justly to the rights of all men. This principle leaves men of capital precisely where it leaves men in their natural condition—equal. If the majority of this Convention will not grant to all men equal rights, let them vote against the proposition. If they do not desire to leave the road of capital, of skill, of enterprise, of talent, of industry, of worth, open alike to every citizen of Indiana, let them vote against it. And if gentlemen on this floor, in the middle of the nineteenth century, wish to declare before the world that all men are not created with equal rights, then, I say again, let them vote against this proposition.

Mr. NILES. I would not rise to make a remark, except that from the motion which I proposed to submit this morning my position may be misunderstood. I have been disposed to believe, from the first, and have not been able to change my mind, that this section embodies a sound principle, and that it may be safely incorporated in the Constitution. From fears which I had heard expressed, not only in but out of this Hall, as to the effect of the section, I was desirous to listen to all the objections which could be urged against it. But the more I have listened to others and reflected upon the subject, the more strongly I have become confirmed in my first impressions.

Surely no man would take a stand in favor of the opposite doctrine, or be prepared to contend that exclusive privileges ought to be granted. Present the question in that light and who would be found to vote for it? Who would be willing to occupy such a position?

This section does not prevent the creation of a State Bank, as some have seemed to fear; for if banking, under the old system of one or more special charters is adopted, the exception will be specially provided for. If exclusive privileges be permitted to any number of men over all others, it can be justified only on the ground of some over-ruling public necessity, and for the sake of the public interests. And would it not be better to make such cases exceptions to the general rule? But I apprehend that the cases are extremely rare, and in my judgment they never exist, in which the public interests are best promoted by the creation of monopolies, though I would not use that word in its odious sense. I am no enemy to corporations, but I would have all laws upon such subjects general, and the door for competition open to all alike.

The case of ferries has been referred to as one requiring exclusive privileges, but I have no fears that ferries cannot be sustained under general laws, and without tolerating burthensome monopolies. There are ferries in this State that have earned to their owners, over and above expenses, one hundred thousand dollars in a few years—an almost insupportable tax upon the people. [Here Mr. Kent spoke to Mr. Niles, in a voice not distinctly audible to the reporter.] My friend from Floyd informs me that one ferry at his town, has been worth a quarter of a million of dollars. Ought such burthens to be imposed upon the many for the benefit of the few? Had this idea of no exclusive privileges been incorporated in the unwritten Constitution of Great Britain five hundred years ago, how different would have been the subsequent history of that country. And even if they may have been useful in the earlier stages of civilization, the necessity for their existence has nearly if not altogether disappeared. A time has arrived when, from the more general diffusion of intelligence and the pervading spirit of enterprise, free competition under equal laws, can meet the demands of the public interest.

There may be some casual evils grow out of this section, but they are evils which will work out their own cure. It is objected to as a mere abstraction. But if it is an abstraction it expresses a wholesome sentiment. If it be only an abstraction it can do little harm, but if its spirit is carried faithfully into our legislation, I apprehend it will be useful.

Pending the question, on motion the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section introduced by Mr. READ of Monroe, in relation to class legislation.

The pending question being on Mr. HOVEY'S amendment,

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. The section proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, is intended to prohibit the Legislature from establishing monopolies, or granting special privileges. I am in favor of it; and I want gentlemen of this Convention who are in favor of giving such power to the Legislature to put their names upon the record. I want to bring the Convention to a test vote. If gentlemen are willing to empower the Legislature to grant special privileges and monopolies, let them so declare. If there is any member of this Convention who is disposed to favor such a doctrine, I desire that he shall distinctly avow it. If there be such, they will, of course, decline to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe. Who are they who are in favor of granting special privileges and monopolies to individuals? I ask, who? Sir, there is no party here in favor of any such doctrine. If it were a whig doctrine, I know that my friend from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) and my friend from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) would not have been found voting against it. Is it true that the democratic party are in favor of it? I think not. I think that the doctrine is anti-republican. I think there is no party in this country—no respectable portion of the inhabitants of the State, who are in favor of any such doctrine; and I feel quite sure, if the proposition were plainly put to this Convention, that power shall be granted to the Legislature to establish monopolies, there would be but few voices in favor of it. Sir, I want to leave it distinctly impressed upon the record, what is the sentiment of this Convention in relation to this matter. I want to have on record my own view of it, as a legacy to my sons, and my sons' sons, to the fourth generation. And I here enter my protest against any proposition that will leave it in the least degree doubtful whether the Legislature may grant such special privileges and monopolies.

Mr. HALL. The gentleman from Monroe showed me the amendment that he has offered, previous to offering it: and at first view I was inclined to go for it. It was certainly quite plausible, and I thought it might be safe for the Convention to adopt it. But, sir, upon reflection, I am constrained to come to a different conclusion. I asked myself what was the object to be attained by the adoption of the amendment? If the object to be reached by it, was, that the Legislature should be deprived of the power to create monopolies or grant exclusive privileges—if that was the object, it was certainly a good one, and the proposition ought to be adopted.

But, when I reverted to the report made by the gentleman from Monroe, some days ago, as chairman of the committee on corporations, I find a section which reads as follows:

"Corporations shall not be created by special acts, but may be formed under general laws. All laws conferring corporate powers, may be altered from time to time, or repealed."

This section prohibits the Legislature from granting special charters in future. Then, looking at the amendment of the gentleman as an additional restriction upon the Legislature, the question necessarily arises, what is the object to be attained by it?

Now, sir, if I understood the remarks of the gentleman from Cass, he says he is in favor of allowing the Legislature, where they grant a charter to one individual or company to do a certain work, to grant a charter to another individual or to another company to do a work, beside the former, if they see fit.

Mr. BIDDLE assented.

Mr. HALL. Well, then, I am not mistaken. The gentleman would allow a second company to be chartered to construct a road alongside of the first.

Now, sir, if that be the object of the amendment, I want it understood that I am decidedly opposed to it.

When men have undertaken a work, and have expended a sum of money towards its accomplishment, I hold that it is wrong to empower others to construct a work that will interfere with their interests.

Now, so far as corporations are concerned, there is a sufficient prohibition in the report of the committee which I have just read. That, I think, is as far as we ought to go.

Mr. BIDDLE said he desired merely to make an explanation. The gentleman had reported him a little to strong.

I said, continued Mr. B., that I was in favor of allowing equal privileges. I am opposed to corporate power that operates injuriously to the interests of the public. But I do not say that where, for instance, a ferry is granted to an individual, it would be proper to interfere with the right thus vested in him, by granting identically the same privilege to another. But, in the construction of a road, I can see no more injustice in allowing another road to be opened by the side of the first, than there is in a professional man opening his office by the side of another.

In regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, I have no very great objection to it, although I consider it entirely useless. I am in favor, however, of the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, because it recognizes a principle of justice, a departure from which would inevitably result in injury to some person or persons. There is no danger of its interfering with the rights of individuals.

Mr. DOBSON said that the strange turn that this matter had taken had rendered it necessary that he should say a word in regard to the section.

Now, sir, said Mr. D., gentlemen talk a great deal about the rights of corporations. What is a corporation? It can be nothing but a mere artificial person. It enables individuals to operate with aggregated wealth under one general head. It is in reality an artificial person. Then, I ask you if this artificial person should have rights that are not granted to natural persons. I think not. For one, I go for the broad doctrine, that all men who have arrived at years of discretion should have equal rights, and that artificial persons should not be created, having rights beyond those which every man has in his individual capacity.

There is a great deal said about the individual liability of corporations. Now, sir, view that matter in connection with what has been said in regard to artificial persons. A man is protected in the enjoyment of his property. But is not the property of a natural person liable for the payment of his debts? Certainly. I ask you, then, why artificial persons or corporations should not be placed upon the same footing? There is no reason that I can discover why they should not. I hold the doctrine, that the rights of individuals and of corporations should be protected and regulated under general laws. There should be no difference made in this respect between natural and artificial persons. I believe in the doctrine of universal competition.

Mr. HOVEY. I have a few remarks to make in regard to the amendment I have offered. It will be remembered that on yesterday evening I voted for the section now proposed, though I requested at that time that the matter should be deferred, in order that we might have an opportunity further to investigate the subject. But gentlemen were not disposed to defer action upon it. I like the general idea that is embraced in the section; but leave the section as it is at present worded, and it will abolish all corporations of every kind or description throughout Indiana. There is no question of that. For one I am not disposed to go that length. I wish to see this young and vigorous State checkered over with railroads, and I say boldly and emphatically, if you establish the principle contained in the instructions moved by the gentleman from Monroe, you, in effect, veto all public improvements hereafter to be made. Gentlemen appear to be indisposed to trust any body but themselves. We have declared that the General Assembly shall pass no law unless such law shall have received the votes of a majority of all the members elected. We have declared also that they shall pass no special laws or laws of a local nature.

These are prudent reforms, but when we have placed these restrictions upon legislation, I think we have gone far enough. I am one who thinks there is some virtue outside of these walls—some honesty and integrity to be found beyond the limits of this Hall. I believe the people can be trusted, and I believe the more you trust them the more they deserve to be trusted. I hope the Convention will reflect calmly and dispassionately upon this matter. I say again, that if you adopt the resolution as it stands, you will cripple the energies of the State.

Mr. COOKERLY. The gentleman has made the sweeping declaration that if you pass this section, it will prevent all internal improvements in future.

Mr. HOVEY. I say it will prevent men from investing their capital in works of internal improvement hereafter to be made, because it will allow rival works to be established side by side.

Mr. COOKERLY. In reply to that, I say that the construction of a work of that kind requires an outlay of capital; and there never will be two works constructed side by side unless the business of the country is sufficient to justify the expense of the construction. Sir, there is no danger that a provision of this kind will break down internal improvements. On the contrary, it will build them up. It will encourage the construction of public works, and I do trust that delegates upon this floor will pass the section. It is in accordance with the spirit of the age. It is in strict accordance with republicanism, and I think we ought not to hesitate a moment about adopting it.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley said, that the object that he had in view in making the remarks that he had made this morning, was to elicit explanations from gentlemen, and he confessed that he had been somewhat edified by the discussion that had taken place. The proposition appeared to him, at first, to be a plausible one, and he had now come to the conclusion that the principle it embodied was a correct one.

In reference to the argument of the gentleman from Posey in opposition to the proposition, he had only to say that that very argument induced him to go for it. He thought it was a most conclusive argument in favor of the proposition.

The argument of the gentleman from Posey, said Mr. S., is that it will destroy the system of internal improvements, because privileges will be given to all persons to construct works where they please. That, sir, is just the privilege that the people should have. Suppose I am engaged in the construction of a plank road, and another person proposes to construct a road in the neighborhood of mine—have I any right to prevent it? I had supposed that the privilege existed under our present laws? If it does not, it should exist. There should be no such thing as monopoly or exclusive privilege. It has been very properly said that it requires capital to construct works of improvement, and such works will only be constructed where the business of the country is sufficient to make them profitable; and where this is the case, they should be constructed, and no restriction should be placed upon them, no obstacle should be placed in the way of their construction.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I voted yesterday against this proposition because I did not understand it. I voted for it this morning because I think it means nothing at all. Now I have listened to this discussion to learn from gentlemen who advocate the measure what is the precise purpose they have in view; what restrictions they would impose on legislation. But we have been favored with nothing but dissertations upon abstract principles.

Mr. DOBSON. I will state to the gentleman, that the objection I had to the proposition is this: It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, that a State cannot take back or revoke a privilege granted, when rights have been acquired under it.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. Gentlemen have not satisfactorily explained to my mind, that such a provision as this will have any such effect. It provides that if the Legislature grant to one set of persons a privilege, it shall grant the same privilege to all other persons. If they grant a privilege to a corporation, they shall grant the same privilege to all other persons who ask for the privilege.

Now I say I voted for it, simply because I think it means nothing. If it does mean anything, I have been unable to perceive it; and it was because I did not understand what was meant by it, that I did not vote for it at first. It is right, in my judgment, that all corporations should be individually liable for the debts of the company, and that all corporations should be formed by general, and not by special laws. But there may be something more in the proposition—something which is not apparent. I agree with the gentleman from Gibson. I think there are cases in which it would be right to grant monopolies—in the case of a ferry, if you choose. I would grant a monopoly, so far as a ferry is concerned, by providing that there should not be another within a certain distance, so as to make it the interest of the party to whom the privilege is granted, to invest a necessary amount of capital, to provide for the public convenience.

Now if it be necessary that monopolies should be granted, I see no reason why we should tie the hands of the Legislature in reference to the subject. It is not like the case where one professional man opens an office by the side of another, because he charges such fees as he pleases. But where we grant to an individual a ferry, it is upon the condition that he shall be prepared with the necessary accommodations for the public, and not charge beyond a certain price. It is done for the public good, and not for private benefit. Upon the same principle it is provided by law that a miller shall take only a certain amount of toll. It appears to me that this is a subject for legislation—a subject that requires to be legislated upon according to the circumstances of the case, so as to provide for the public interest.

It was because I entertained these views, that I voted against the proposition in the first instance, and because I could not see the precise effect that the proposition would have upon future legislation; and gentlemen who have attempted to explain, have not made the matter more clear to my mind. They have not told us what legislation it will prohibit, and what it will permit.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the amendment of the gentleman from Posey be laid upon the table.

The motion prevailed, and the amendment was accordingly laid upon the table.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to amend by providing that nothing contained in the section should be so construed as to authorize the Legislature to enact a law in favor of free banking.

Mr. KENT moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 67, nays 56—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Gordon, Gregg, Hamilton, Helm, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—67.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. KELSO said, that before taking a vote upon the section, it certainly ought to be made distinctly plain, one way or the other. He would, therefore, move to amend so as to provide that nothing in the section contained, shall be so construed as to prevent the Legislature from establishing a State bank and branches.

Mr. CHANDLER moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 64, nays 59—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Thornton, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, and Wunderlich—64.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to amend, by adding the following: "and it is understood that this section is intended to incorporate free banks, and none others."

Mr. BRACKEN moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Davis,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 13, nays 105—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Blythe, Brookbank, Carter, Clements, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Farrow, Frisbie, Gootee, Huff, Kelso, and Mathis—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—105.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The question then being on the adoption of the section proposed by the gentleman from Marion,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 80, nays 41—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Johnson, Kent, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—80.

YAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Blythe, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Fisher, Frisbie, Gootee, Hall, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Spann, Tannehill, Thomas, Watts, Wolfe, and Zenor—41.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SHOUP moved the following, as an additional section:

“SEC. —. The business of banking shall be free to all, upon such terms and under such restrictions as the Legislature shall impose.”

Mr. KELSO. That would break up the whole banking question, and I do not wish that it should be adopted now. I will move, therefore, that its consideration be postponed until a week from next Monday.

Mr. HAMILTON. The question of banking will come up in a few days; I regret that the gentleman has introduced his proposition at this time. The committee on banking have reported a section very much like this, and when that subject comes up I have an amendment to offer to the section reported by the committee. In the mean time, I move that the section proposed by the gentleman be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to. And,
On motion by Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe,
The Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, JAN. 2, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe, in pursuance of notice, introduced an amendment to the standing rules, to the effect, that after a section has been re-committed with instructions, it shall not be in order to move additional instructions.

After a few remarks in relation to the propriety of adopting the proposed amendment,

The question being put, a division was asked for, and by ayes 52, noes 31, the amendment was adopted.

GRAND JURIES.

The Convention then took up the special order, being the section in relation to Grand Juries.

On motion by Mr. LOCKHART, its consideration was postponed until next Tuesday week.

MILITIA.

The article reported from the committee on the militia, by the chairman, Mr. PEPPER of Ohio, providing for organizing the militia, and providing for sedentary and active militia, was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. MILROY made a minority report, embracing a provision for a volunteer corps.

CLASS LEGISLATION.

The section in relation to class legislation, offered by Mr. READ of Monroe, was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to commit the section to the committee on the legislative department, with instructions to add the following:

“Nor authorize, in any manner, a monopoly of the college and school lands, to promote the higher branches of education; but the same shall be distributed for the benefit of common schools.”

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said he had serious objections to this mode of proceeding. He could see no propriety in attaching irrelevant matter to a section; and in this case it appeared to him to be peculiarly improper. It was going out of the way to make a personal attack upon the gentleman who had introduced the section, and who happened to be connected with the Indiana State University, because, forsooth, he had had the temerity to offer a section to be inserted in the Constitution! He for one was in favor of the principle embodied in the section. He believed it to be, abstractly considered, a principle of right and justice.

He thought, moreover, that such an amendment should not be adopted, after what had been done by the Convention in regard to the State University. There had been a report adopted, acknowledging the right of the University to the land set apart for its support, and he had supposed the gentleman from Wayne was peculiarly tenacious of vested rights. This fund was set apart expressly for the use of the University, and he held that if it were diverted from that purpose, the General Government would be absolved from the obligation to continue the investment to the State of Indiana, in any shape.

He did not think it would be a proper course of action, to blend two such subjects together. He hoped, for the reasons that he had adduced, and for many others which might be adduced, that the section might be permitted to pass, without being embarrassed with any extraneous matter.

Mr. RARIDEN said he could not conceive that this was extraneous, by any means. While they were limiting the power of the Legislature in reference to one subject, he thought it was very proper to limit it in regard to other subjects. There was nothing personal in the matter. The gentleman from Marion did him great injustice in supposing any such thing. There were a great many gentlemen in the Convention, who, like "my Uncle Toby," had their favorite hobbies. The hobby of the gentleman from Marion was the technical phrases of the law. The gentleman had ridden that hobby through the Convention. And now the gentleman from Monroe had mounted his hobby—a recognition of the broadest abstract rights of individuals. It was all catering to the appetites of the multitude—it was a mere race for popularity, and in that race he had no idea of allowing himself to be distanced. [A laugh.] The Supreme Court had decided, at the present term, that the proceeds of these lands belonged to the State of Indiana, to be disposed of according to the will of the people of the State, expressed through the law-making power; and yet gentlemen were contending that the fund should be devoted exclusively to one object, making it as much a monopoly as if the Almighty had decreed it. If gentlemen were determined to be pertinacious in riding their favorite hobbies, he had as much right to his hobby, as they to theirs. They might tell the people of the State, that a representative from Wayne county—they might tell them that Rariden of Wayne, was in favor of taking away the fund from the wealthy class, and giving it to the poor. They might make what capital they could out of that. [A laugh.]

Mr. BASCOM said he thought there had been discussion enough in relation to this matter. He would, therefore, move the previous question.

The Convention refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. McCLELLAND said he merely wished to vindicate the position that he occupied in regard to this matter. If the gentleman from Wayne would bring up his proposition in a separate and distinct form, he would support it. He believed that the Government owed to every person a home and education; that that home and education should be limited in value and quantity. He saw no reason why money should be given to high schools in preference to the common schools of the country. He believed in the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Wayne; but he did not coincide with the gentleman in the propriety of bringing forward his proposition, for the purpose of obstructing that of the gentleman from Monroe.

He says, continued Mr. M., that he is afraid that gentleman will get ahead of him; that they will crowd him off the track. Why did not the gentleman from Wayne, then—who stands, I believe, at the head of the bar of the whole country—who sets himself up a model for all men to imitate—why did he not show us that it was necessary to retain the technical phrases of the law, instead of riding his own hobby, and arguing long and loud about niggerology, and quarreling with editors of newspapers all over the country? Why did he not do this? Now, he tells us that gentlemen are riding their favorite hobbies, and that he is afraid they will crowd him off the track. I do not believe there is any danger of crowding him off the right track; for I do not think he is on the track. But when he brings forward a proposition for the purpose of breaking down another proposition, I shall most decidedly vote against it. But let him bring forward his measure as a separate and distinct proposition, and I shall be found supporting it.

Mr. KELSO said he should vote for the recommitment, with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, because he conceived there was no more appropriate place for such a provision than to connect it with this section. Like the gentleman from Randolph, he was in favor of the principle contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne, and he would go for inserting it in this place, not for the purpose of breaking down the proposition of the gentleman from Monroe, but to give it strength. He had voted yesterday against the section introduced by the gentleman from Monroe, and he had done so because he thought the proposition was intended to do away with any but free banking. But if its effect would be to make all privileges free and common, he would go for the section.

Now, sir, continued Mr. K., I hold that the whole object of the General Government, in making this donation of land, may be couched in the single word "education," and it is left to the people of Indiana to appropriate it in such way as they think will redound to their greatest good. And I say there is no more justice in putting the land within a certain compass, or in possession of a particular institution in Indiana, than there is in saying that there shall be special privileges granted to a particular portion of the community, or to a particular part of the State. I say we might grant extraordinary privileges to a few—privileges not common to the whole people—just as well in the one case as in the other. If the donation be confined to the higher institutions of learning, it will inure practically to the benefit of the wealthy classes in the community to the exclusion of the poor. Now, if we can make a more just and proper application of the fund, why not do it? And why not do it now? Why not make it part and parcel of the section which the gentleman himself acknowledges is intended to break down monopolies. If such be the object of the section, I shall vote for it.

Mr. BORDEN said it would be recollected that this subject had been brought up some time since and referred to a select committee. That committee had not acted, in consequence of the absence of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). He was glad that the distinguished gentleman from Wayne had taken up the subject. He was glad to have his co-operation. He was for giving the fund to common schools; and if that could not be done, he was for distributing it among the colleges; and if it could not be so disposed of, then he was in favor of appealing to the General Government for a change of the terms of the donation. As the subject had gone to a committee, however, he thought it should not be acted upon by the Convention at this time.

Mr. PETTIT said, that the section under consideration which had been engrossed and was now upon its passage, and the motion to re-commit and amend, as proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, were very different.

The section introduced by the gentleman from Monroe, that was yesterday engrossed, and is now upon its passage, continued Mr. P., is a plain, simple, unequivocal declaration of equal rights and privileges. It is a direct and unequivocal prohibition upon the Legislature against giving any advantages to one class of persons over another. It reads as follows:

"The General Assembly shall not grant to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which upon the same terms shall not belong equally to all citizens."

I could not have doubted, sir, that if we had been about to establish for the first time, a law for a civilized community—if it had been our first effort to lay a platform or form a declaration of personal and political rights—I could not for a moment have doubted that this would have been one of the first declarations adopted by acclamation—that it would have met with universal approbation.

This section applies to the future action of the Legislature. It declares that the Legislature shall not hereafter place one class of citizens upon a pedestal of fame and wealth, and trample another in the dust of ignominy and poverty. [Applause.]

That is what this section provides for. But the proposition of the gentleman from Wayne seeks to do a positive wrong. It directs the Legislature that they shall hereafter do a positive wrong—that they shall take away from the State University of Indiana that which the law of the land has conferred upon that institution.

Well, sir, the section before us provides that no rights shall be given to one class of the community that are not given, upon the same terms, the same conditions, and under the same circumstances, to all. Sir, this land was granted to this State for the erection and maintenance of high schools, or colleges, or an university, where the higher branches of education should be taught. It was contemplated that there should be a regular gradation from the common schools of the country to institutions where those who are able to educate their children might find a place within our own borders, where all the sciences and languages are taught. By the acceptance on the part of the State of Indiana of the donation, it has become settled, permanent, and fixed.

The object now appears to be to level this institution of learning—an institution where the accomplished scholar may be formed, where a man may receive a finished education, where education may be made complete, and to distribute the funds which have been devoted to the support of such an institution amongst the minor schools of the State—or I may say to scatter them, to the winds of heaven—to throw them out in a thousand different channels, to make them more diversified than the sands on the sea shore, where their benefits cannot be felt, where they would be but a drop in the bucket.

Sir, the section as it now stands, proposes not to interfere with vested rights, whereas, the instructions offered by the gentleman from Wayne propose to abrogate vested rights.

If a proposition were now here that the State Bank should be abolished, together with all rights claimed under it, the gentleman from Wayne would be the first to say, here are vested rights. This is holy ground. You cannot disturb this ground—you cannot trample upon these rights. And I advise the friends of the section that has been introduced by the gentleman from Monroe, that was engrossed yesterday, if this proposition is insisted on, to come in with an amendment declaring that the State Bank of Indiana shall cease to exist. ["Consent."] If we surrender or interfere with vested rights in one instance, let us lay the leveling axe to them all. Let us put our hands upon every right, upon every institution that claims any right, monied institutions and all—real or fancied, imaginary or substantial. Let them all come within the action of the Convention at once.

Mr. OWEN. There are two modes of legislating. One is to let a proposition stand by itself, upon its own merits, to act upon it singly and simply—to vote aye or no upon it without reference to any other matter: and the other is to patch together incongruous matters, and either carry a bad proposition by connecting it with a good one, or destroy a good proposition by connecting it with a bad one. Now, sir, to this last mode of proceeding I am utterly opposed. It reminds me of a story of a school boy who was very fond of fruit. He walked into the room of the schoolmaster, and found there a magnificent bunch of grapes. He coveted the grapes, and his mouth began to water to taste them. Said he, "If anybody knows any just cause or impediment why these grapes and my mouth should not be joined together in the holy bonds of matrimony, let him declare it, or henceforth forever hold his peace." No response being heard he proceeded to devour the grapes. The schoolmaster happened at that moment to be entering the room, and having heard what had been said by his pupil, he proceeded to adopt the same formula. Seizing a rod he said: "If any body knows any just cause or impediment why this rod and this boy's back should not be joined together in holy matrimony, he will now declare it." Said the boy, "I do," "What is the reason," demanded the master? "Because," said the boy "the parties do not agree." [Laughter.] Now it is exactly so in regard to this amendment and the section. The parties do not agree. If the parties do not agree to marry then according to all principles, human and divine, they should not be joined together.

Mr. BIDDLE. Mr. President, I do not rise to debate this question. I expressed my views on the subject yesterday. I would remark, however, that this Convention cannot divest the college fund without the consent of Congress. It is granted for a specific purpose, and is guarantied by a contract. No power can abrogate or change it, except the power that made it. The State of Indiana, and the Congress of the United States, can change it by their joint consent; not otherwise. That fund is safe with the courts.

Mr. RARIDEN (interposing.) Does the gentleman from Cass remember the late decision of our Supreme Court?

Mr. BIDDLE. He does; but that case does not involve the same point.

I was about to add, Mr. President, that I had found an additional reason why equal rights should be granted to all men. If rumor speaks correctly, two of our most distinguished members are candidates for the United States Senate. Now if either of these gentlemen should be elected, why, you see, we shall all be senators! [Laughter.] Who of us, then, would not vote for the proposition?

Mr. READ of Monroe. I have had the rashness to introduce upon this floor a proposition which I thought right in itself. It is a proposition so just, so consistent with the sound principles of political economy, so consistent with the great principles of liberty, that it is difficult for any man to meet it with direct opposition.

I have uttered hardly a word in support of the principle. I had, from the first, resolved to leave it to its own fate. If, upon its own simple, naked merits, it cannot succeed, let it go. It has been most ably supported by others.

Gentlemen need not disguise that in the amendment now pending there is intended a direct personal thrust at myself. This is palpable in the very thing. How far, by any conduct of mine, since I have been a member of this body, I have merited such an attempted rebuke, others must judge. In no single instance, I think I may say, have I been guilty of a discourtesy to a single member of this body. But let that pass. My principles I must support at whatever expense.

Upon yesterday, when it was attempted to connect with the proposition the State Bank question and the Free Bank question, without any reference to my own individual opinions on these subjects, I voted against any such connection.

When we reach, in the course of a few days, the proper report, I may, perhaps, if need be, have occasion to express my opinion on the subject now attempted to be lugged in.

Mr. KENT demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was, upon a division, ayes 52, noes 48, seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being upon the re-commitment of the section with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Wayne,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. COOKERLY. I would like to be excused from voting upon this amendment.

The PRESIDENT put the question: Shall the gentleman from Vigo be excused from voting?

It was decided by acclamation in the negative.

Mr. COOKERLY. I don't like to be gagged down upon such a question as this. I do not want to be compelled to vote without having an opportunity to give my reasons.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is out of order.

The yeas and nays were then taken, with the following result—yeas 45, nays 72—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Farrow, Frisbie, Gootee, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Huff, Kelso, Mathis, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Zenor—45.

So the section was not re-committed.

The question then being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken under the rule, with the following result—yeas 89, nays 30:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Trimby, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—89.

So the section was passed and referred to the committee on revision.

The section which declares that emigration from the State shall not be prohibited, was read a second time and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford (addressing the Chair). Is it in order to introduce an additional section?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I offer for adoption the following additional section:

"SECTION — No distinction shall be made by law between resident aliens and citizens, in the possession, enjoyment, or descent of property."

It must be obvious to all, said Mr. Pepper, that we ought to have some such provision as this in the organic law of the State.

It will be recollected that at common law, aliens cannot own a foot of real estate in this country. A few of the States have changed the common law, in this particular, by constitutional enactment, while most of the other States, including Indiana, have provided by Legislative action that aliens may purchase and possess real estate. The right to purchase, enjoy, and transmit property, should be guaranteed to them, beyond all contingency, by constitutional provision, the same as it is guaranteed to native born citizens. We have by almost unanimous vote, extended to foreigners the right of suffrage and the right to hold office on very just and liberal terms, and while we thus invite them to our State, we should take the necessary steps to secure them in the right to own and transmit property in its fair and liberal sense.

Besides, sir, this is emphatically an agricultural State; her soil and climate make her such, and not until her dense forests and vacant lands are brought into active cultivation, by the sturdy arm of industry, will all her resources be developed. To accomplish this she needs a greater increase of population—more tillers of the soil. She is capable of sustaining more than ten times her present population, and the more liberal you make the laws in reference to obtaining and enjoying property, greater will be the inducement for the emigrants in search of homes, to make Indiana their permanent abiding place, and the sooner will your young and growing State attain that high and enviable position which she is ultimately destined to fill.

Mr. BORDEN remarked that such a provision had been introduced into the Constitution of some of the new States, and the effect of it had been to induce immigration to those States. They had been rapidly filling up with an industrious population. He thought it was the very best policy that a State having large tracts of unoccupied lands could adopt.

Mr. RARIDEN said he would prefer to have a slight amendment made to the proposition of the gentleman from Crawford, and it was that a declaration of intention to become citizens, should be required of aliens before extending to them the privilege proposed by the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Madison moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford by adding the words "provided that such aliens have declared their intentions to become citizens of the State."

Mr. FOSTER said he was not quite sure that the section was altogether right, and he could not consent to vote for it unless the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Madison were adopted. He was not one of those who had mounted the hobby of Native Americanism, or any other hobby; but it did seem to him that they were carrying this matter to too great a length when they proposed to put foreigners on the same footing with American citizens. In his county there were aliens who had been there for several years, and they had shown no inclination to become citizens; on the contrary they were in the habit of treating the institutions of the country with derision. The laws of this country they were wont to say, were not in consonance with the law of Moses. [A laugh.] They were abolitionists to all intents and purposes. He thought it would be clearly wrong to put these men on an equal footing with the native born citizen. These people know that in this country all their civil and religious rights are guaranteed to them, and yet they refuse to take the oath of allegiance to the best Government that God Almighty's sun ever shone upon. ["Consent."] By their insidious doctrines they are doing all they can to sap the foundations of the Government. The Convention went far enough the other day, when they adopted a provision making a difference of only six months residence between aliens and native born citizens. He had voted for that provision, but when he did so he almost doubted the correctness of the vote; but he did not for a moment doubt the impropriety of passing this measure unless the amendment were adopted with it. He was utterly opposed to allowing foreigners to enjoy all the privileges of citizens, while they declared that the Government which extends to them these rights, was not consonant with, or conformable to human rights.

He was not willing to put these individuals on a par with the native-born citizens of the country. He, for one, would never consent to it.

Mr. WATTS said he was in favor of the proposition for several reasons, and he was opposed to the views expressed by the gentleman last up. If there were persons in his county, who were not disposed to become citizens, he thought it would be a bad way of punishing them, to prevent them from holding property. Whenever the Legislature had been applied to to pass a law to enable foreigners to hold property, and to transmit it to their heirs he had never known the application to be refused. The Legislature had, invariably, in such case passed a special act to enable the property to go to the heirs of the individual. And if there were individuals living in the county of Monroe who were guilty of such conduct as the gentleman has stated, there should be some means of punishing them, besides depriving them of the privilege of holding and transmitting property.

Mr. LOCKHART said that he was in favor of the provisions of the section under discussion. In that portion of the State in which he resided, there was a large foreign population, many of whom have experienced great inconvenience in the settlement of the estates of deceased aliens. It was true that for four or five years past we have had a statute which measurably removed the evil, yet he thought that it ought to form a section in the Constitution. It may not be amiss to state that in some of the continental States of Europe, the laws of descent and distribution are made to depend upon the law of the country where the heir or distributee resides, so that if by the law of the country where the heir lived and owed allegiance, foreigners were allowed to inherit, the rule would be reciprocal, hence the great importance of inserting the provisions of this section in the Constitution. He had known a German who resided in this State, prior to the passage of the statute to which he had referred, who fell heir to property in one of the German States, who was compelled to change his residence from Indiana to Pennsylvania or Maryland, before he was entitled to enjoy the inheritance.

The government of the United States now has treaty stipulations with twenty or more foreign powers, which, to some extent, regulates this matter, but let the diplomatical intercourse be broken off and treaties annulled, and great difficulties and confusion would ensue. The policy of our Government has been to invite foreigners hither. Let us then secure to them and to their friends in the country from whence they came, their just right to inherit.

Mr. EDMONSTON said he had a single remark to make in reference to the amendment. The merits of the question had been amply explained by the gentleman from Vanderburg and others. He thought it was but a matter of justice and right, that when a foreigner arrived in this country with the intention of purchasing property, and becoming a permanent resident, he should not be embarrassed by being required to seek out the means of becoming a citizen by the process of naturalization, before being entitled to procure a location for his family, and to hold the property he might acquire for such a purpose, and transmit it to his heirs.

Mr. PETTIT said he was in favor of the principle of the section which had been proposed by the gentleman from Crawford, but he was in favor of carrying that principle further. The section did not go so far as he desired it to go. I did not provide that alien heirs of an alien resident might inherit property. It only provides that there should be no distinction made between resident citizens and resident aliens, as to property. That was not so far as he wished to go. He wanted to see it provided that when a man comes to this country, though no drop of his blood runs in the veins of a man in America, his foreign relatives should receive the reward of his labor. Unless the gentleman would accept a modification of his proposition to this effect, he would ask the Convention to vote it down in order that he might offer a proposition that the property of aliens shall go to their heirs whether they reside in this country or not. He desired that the product of the toil of every man, no matter whether foreigner or native-born, should go to his blood relatives wherever they might be found. This was but in accordance with the liberalizing spirit of the age.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford said he had no objection to the addition proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He would accept it as a modification of his amendment.

It was accordingly added, in these words:

"All real estate owned by aliens may be willed, or shall descend to the heirs of such owner, whether resident or non-resident, alien or citizen."

Mr. READ of Clark said that the present Constitution, as they all knew, provided that when a foreigner, who owns real property in the State, dies, such property escheats to the State. Considerable litigation had grown out of this condition of things, and he thought it was important that the Legislature should be released from that kind of legislation. It appears to me, continued Mr. R., that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe goes a little too far. The provision of the Constitution of Wisconsin, in regard to this matter, suits my view. It appears to me that we should not be asked to go further than to put the foreigners upon a footing of equality with our native born citizens, in respect to the inheritance of property. Otherwise great evil might grow out of it. Foreigners, as the gentleman from Hancock has observed, may buy up large tracts of land, put their tenants or serfs into possession, and keep the property beyond the control of the State. Then let us adopt a provision of this kind, putting foreigners upon an equal footing, in regard to the rights of property. And it is all that they can ask.

Mr. LOCKHART. As there seems to be no difference of opinion in regard to the propriety of adopting a provision of this kind, for the purpose of perfecting the section I move that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. Before the question is taken, I desire to direct the attention of the Convention to one feature of the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, which seems to condemn it at once. The purport of it is that the property of all persons dying intestate should descend to their heirs, whether such heirs are aliens or citizens.

Now I hope that this Constitution will never compel the Legislature to adopt such a provision as that in our law. What would be the effect of it? Suppose that a man should die leaving a widow, but no children. This provision would compel the Legislature to pass such laws, as would give to the heirs of the deceased his real estate, whereas justice would require that his widow should take some part of the lands in fee.

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Clark intend to offer his proposition as an amendment?

Mr. READ. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will send it up in writing.

Mr. DOBSON. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. PETTIT. There are forty amendments already.

Mr. DOBSON. May they not all go to the committee?

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Clark to the proposition offered by the gentleman from Crawford.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WALPOLE, the section with all the pending amendments was referred to a select committee of five, consisting of Messrs. PEPPER of Crawford, READ of Clark, PETTIT, DUNN of Jefferson, and LOCKHART.

The section which provides that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the State, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes, was read a second time.

The question being upon its engrossment,

Mr. NAVE said, before the Convention acted upon the section, he wished to insert, as an additional section, the last section of the bill of rights, as contained in the present Constitution, as follows:

"To guard against any encroachments on the rights herein retained, we declare that everything in this article is excepted out of the general powers of Government, and shall forever remain inviolable."

I wish to offer this additional section, at this time, continued Mr. NAVE, because, after the article has been acted upon, it will be out of the power of any gentleman in this Convention, under the existing rules, to offer an amendment, without moving to re-consider; and as the bill of rights is a mere catalogue of abstractions, declaring what are the rights that are not to enter into the general powers of the Government, it becomes necessary that we should so declare them, and declare that they shall never enter into the general powers that are conferred upon the different branches of the Government of Indiana. I presume there will be no objection to the proposition; I do not deem it necessary, therefore, to detain the Convention with any further remarks.

The section was adopted.

It was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question being upon the engrossment of the section which provides that "There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude within this State, otherwise than for the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. No indenture of any Negro or Mulatto, made and executed out of the bounds of this State, shall be valid within the State."

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to strike out the latter part of the section.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved that the section be re-committed, with instructions to strike out all after the word "convicted," and insert a provision that the immigration of Negroes and Mulattoes into the State, be prohibited.

Mr. KELSO remarked, that the subject of the immigration of Negroes into the State had been referred to a select committee. What that committee would report, could not be known until the report was made. He thought they ought to have that report, before acting upon this proposition.

Mr. DOBSON. I understand the gentleman proposes to refer the section, with his amendment, to that committee.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I presume there is not a citizen of the State of Indiana, who contemplates that the Constitution will retain the section in any other form than that in which it has stood, since the formation of our Government. There is, in my opinion, an additional reason why this subject should not be referred, as proposed by the gentleman from Davies. I, for one, retain my opinion upon the question of restraining Negro immigration to the State. I am still in favor of a restriction of this kind, but I am also in favor of having the article or section on this subject submitted separately to the people. I hope that the provision will remain precisely as it has stood for the last thirty-four years. The people, so far as I am aware, have been perfectly satisfied with it.

Mr. CLEMENTS said he wished to make a single remark before the question was taken. In the first place, he understood that this subject had been before the select committee for a considerable time; and he was aware that there was strong opposition to the amendment he had proposed. He had moved the commitment of the section, with instructions, with the view of having early action on the part of the Convention, in regard to the subject of Negro immigration.

In the first place, (continued Mr. CLEMENTS,) in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Switzerland, I apprehend that if the committee report, and the Convention adopt, a clause to be inserted in the Constitution, prohibiting the immigration of Negroes into the State, it will cover that class of Negroes that might be brought in by indenture, and if so, there can be no necessity for the latter part of the section; it will be mere tautology. And the prohibition, it appears to me, may as well be inserted in this section, as in any other. If a majority of the Convention, as I suppose, are in favor of prohibiting the immigration of free people of color to the State, then, sir, the friends of such a clause had better refer the whole matter, to the committee. It may be that the select committee may not report in time for the action of this body, for I hope we shall soon arrive at the termination of our labors. Now is the time to act upon the subject. The people of my portion of the State are in favor of restricting the immigration of this class of persons; and if it be the intention of this Convention to adopt a provision in reference to the subject, it should be no longer delayed.

Mr. CRUMBACKER said it appeared to him there could be no advantage derived from hastening this question forward, at this time. The committee would undoubtedly report in time for the action of the Convention. They were the friends of the measure. He entertained no doubt that the question would be brought up as early as was necessary, in order that the Convention might act deliberately upon it. He would, therefore, move that the instructions be laid on the table.

Mr. COOKERLY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table, provided the gentleman from Vigo will renew it.

Mr. COOKERLY. I will renew it. I concur fully in the remarks that have been made by the gentleman from Davies. It is high time that we had this question before the Convention. If my recollection is correct, it is more than a month since that question was committed to the select committee; and it is strange—I say, sir, it is passing strange—that that committee have not reported before this time. It is a very important matter; it is a question concerning which the people of the State feel a deep interest; and it ought not to be postponed until the Convention is about to close its labors. It is a matter that needs investigation, and I say the report of the committee ought to be made as speedily as possible. I will now say to the chairman of that committee that, if the report be not made before Saturday, I will introduce a resolution on that day compelling them to make their report. Sir, the Convention is not to be bamboozled in this style. I do not know the reason that this report has not been made. I do not know but, as the gentleman from Tippecanoe said in regard to another matter, there may be a cat in the meal tub—there may be something behind the bush—and I am determined to find it out.

Mr. STEVENSON said he trusted the section now before the Convention would be acted upon separately. The matter contained in it, and the question of the immigration of negroes into the State, were entirely different, and ought not to be blended together. He was as much opposed to the immigration of free negroes to the State as any man in the Convention; and he was for having early action upon the subject.

Mr. COOKERLY. I forgot my promise to renew the motion to lay the motion on the table. I hope the gentleman from Putnam will allow the motion to be made.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have very few remarks to make. And first in relation to the action of the select committee, as I am a member of that committee, permit me to say one word. The chairman of the committee has been absent, but he has now returned, and informs me that he intends to make a report next week. And, sir, there is no time lost. We have before us an abundance of work. I trust, then, that the subjects will be acted on separately; that the subject of negro slavery will be disconnected from the subject of negro immigration.

Mr. OWEN. I am also a member of that committee, and I suppose that the meaning of the cat in the meal tub is that it is desirable that those gentlemen who are candidates for any office should give their votes upon the question of free negro immigration. Now, if there is any such difficulty as this about it, I say in advance that I am in favor of inserting a provision in the Constitution prohibiting negroes from coming into the State. I do not care what effect this declaration may have upon any election that may take place. It has never been my course in life to conceal my opinions upon any subject. And these are my opinions in regard to this matter.

As to those negroes who are now here, I believe we ought to make little or no change in regard to the privileges conferred upon them. I shall not detain the Convention further, but will merely add this, that if there is any gentleman who has a vote to give, which vote will depend upon the opinions I entertain, he is at liberty to question me upon any subject: and now as to this matter itself, I can say because I know, there is on the part of all the members of that committee an earnest desire to get the matter before the Convention as early as possible.

Mr. COOKERLY. I will state that I had no reference at all to the gentleman from Posey, for I really did not know that he was on the committee, although I knew that he was in favor of prohibiting the immigration of negroes into the State.

Mr. FOSTER said he had been very much surprised that so much time had been permitted to elapse without having a report made from the select committee. He thought they had been altogether too dilatory in making their report; it was a matter of paramount importance. In his county it was considered a matter of more importance than almost any other. He trusted that the report would be no longer delayed.

Mr. BASCOM said he thought there had been enough of negroes and cats in meal tubs.

Mr. KENT said it was known, perhaps, to almost every member of the body, that no man here or elsewhere, had taken stronger ground than himself against negro immigration to the State. It was known, also, that for some time past two or three of the members of the convention had been absent, and it was due to those gentlemen and this Convention that they should postpone final action until their return. He had no doubt they all would be present in the course of the next week, and they would then be able to make a report.

Mr. COOKERLY. In accordance with a promise that I made to the gentleman from Lake, I move that the proposition of the gentleman from Daviess be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. KELSO,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is report No. 21.

[This is a report from the committee on elective franchise, and apportionment of senators and representatives. It consists of two sections, the first providing that the Senate shall consist of thirty-four, and the House of Representatives of one hundred members. The second, that the General Assembly shall every sixth year after the adoption of the Constitution make an equitable distribution of the above named number of senators and representatives among the several counties and districts, &c.]

On motion, both the sections of the report were laid upon the table.

REPORT 22.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is report No. 22.

This is a report from the committee on the executive, the first section of which was read as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide by law that the county Auditor, or other proper officer of the several counties, shall annually furnish to the Secretary of State a report of the agricultural productions of each county."

Mr. SHOUP moved to lay the section on the table.

A division being called for on the motion, there were ayes 23, noes not counted.

And the section was not laid upon the table.

Mr. DOBSON. I must say that I was somewhat surprised at the motion made a moment ago by the gentleman from Franklin (Mr.

Shoup). This section appears to me to embrace a matter of far too much importance to be thus hastily disposed of. The kind of information for the collection of which this section provides is as important as any that can be collected. It can be obtained, too, with but little trouble and cost to the State, and will be always at hand for a variety of useful purposes connected with the legislation of the country. One reason that strikes my mind as a very forcible one why we should adopt this section is this: Some years ago when the western States failed to meet their liabilities, foreigners not understanding our mode of taxing property made loud complaints against us.

They said, These people have so many millions of acres of land taxable, why don't they pay the interest upon their bonds. Now in England they tax productive property only—in this country we tax all lands whether productive or not; therefore, complaints have been made, and bad feelings entertained, all of which resulted from the want of the information sought to be obtained by this section. If they had have known that only about one-third of the 23,760,000 acres in Indiana was taxable, and one-quarter of that only in cultivation, they would not have complained so much.

Now we tax all the land whether it be productive or unproductive. We ought, therefore, not only to know the productions of the soil every year, but the number of acres employed in the growth of wheat, the number in corn, the number in grass, &c., &c. This is worth all the other information that a man can have in regard to making up his mind in the passing of any law affecting these products. I have already said that this information can be obtained very easily and with little expense, and I do think it ought to be had.

Some gentlemen object to placing a provision of this kind in the Constitution; but I think that that is the proper place for it. In most of the neighboring States that kind of information can be obtained. I have in my possession a report made in the State of Ohio, showing the number of hogs, sheep, cattle, horses, mules, &c., raised in each county, together with the number of bushels of grain of every description, with a variety of other useful information. Why then should we not have a similar report of the products of the various counties of the State of Indiana, especially considering that it can be had with so little trouble and expense. I hope that the motion to lay this section on the table will not prevail, but that the Convention will adopt it as one of the provisions of the Constitution, feeling assured that, in value, for a variety of purposes, it will amply repay all the cost and trouble of obtaining it. When the report from each county is made the Auditor of State will report to the Legislature in a tabular form; that sheet will be published and distributed back to the citizens of each county; in addition to this all the papers in the State will publish it, as a matter of course, for the benefit of their readers. Then every man in the State can be able to form a correct opinion of what the price of pork, wheat, corn, tobacco, horses, mules, cattle, sheep, &c., will be, as the merchant and trader can. Then they will get the full worth of their property. Now they do not for the want of this very information. The merchant knows they have to give up; that's the reason.

All the States should adopt such a plan, and the citizens of each would soon know the increase or decrease every year. They would know what each had to sell, and how much. If the crop of hogs was very large I would know that the price could not be high; if small it would be high. Just so in regard to every other product. And, sir, it is out of our products that we all live and prosper. That which is dug out of our soil, and nothing else, adds to our wealth as a State. All that the merchant makes is somebody's loss. Just so in regard to all other occupations—except mechanical and manufacturing. Then, sir, don't keep him who tills the soil, in the dark; let him know what his brother farmers all over the State are doing, what they are raising, how much they raise, what they have got to sell, and my word for it they will not sell their pork for $2.00 per hundred, when at some other part of the State it is bringing $4.00, as they now very frequently do. When it is up they will know it, when it is down they will know it, and so in regard to other products. No, sir, you can't fool them out of their crop and laugh at them afterwards.

MR. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, I have prepared no speech upon this subject, for I supposed that the sections would commend themselves at once to the mind of every gentleman present, without the necessity of any argument. I confess I feel a great anxiety that they should pass. Gentlemen know that some steps have been taken to establish an agricultural bureau at Washington city, as well as in some of the States, and I am anxious that we should adopt these sections, not only for our own benefit as a State, but also for the purpose of facilitating the progress of the agricultural interests. This will be better than anything which can be done by a Board at Washington. I consider this to be a matter of great importance, not only in regard to our domestic policy, but also, to the general character of Indiana as a member of the national confederacy.

Sir, there are some propositions the truth and propriety of which are so manifest on their very face that it is impossible to support them by any argument. This appears to me to be a proposition of that kind. I believe that the system can be established on an economical basis, and a simple form of blank returns, is all that will be necessary to demonstrate the products of the State, and to diffuse a correct knowledge of them in their chief features. We can thus obtain at a cheap rate, not only all the statistics relating to agriculture, but also all those relating to common schools, which are now collected at a great expense, and under cumbersome arrangements, in other States. I propose to dispense with a State Superintendent who has to travel through the State, and perhaps look to very different objects, political or other, from those which he is ostensibly accomplishing. We will avoid all the expense and cost of this system of machinery, and will have the information direct from the people themselves. I hope therefore that the section will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS of Parke moved to amend the section by striking out the word "annually" and inserting the word "biennially."

Mr. HOVEY. If I understand the call that led to the holding of this Convention, one of the most powerful reasons was that we might lessen the expenditure of the State. This provision if adopted would require one man in each county at least for about half a year to acquire the information necessary to the carrying out of this provision.

I will not war against the provision itself. It may be a very good one, and all the arguments that have been used by the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Chapman) may be true. But at the same time this is an experiment, and I think it should not pass as a Constitutional reform. There is no necessity for a provision of this kind being placed in our organic law. It would be almost impossible for any man to obtain a correct outline of the products of Marion county in less than six months. Here are all your hogs, cattle, horses, wheat, corn, potatoes, turnips, hay, &c., to be arranged in a schedule; and will require an amount of work which cannot be done in a short time, and will cost thousands of dollars to the State to collect it every year, while at the same time the benefits to be derived from it are somewhat doubtful. If gentlemen want to try the experiment, let them try it as a law. It would be as proper to make a Constitutional provision against murder or larceny as to embrace this section in our Constitution. It may be a very good thing in itself, but, sir, there are thousands of good things that should never appear as Constitutional measures. It may be very good; but I must say that I think it ought not to have a place in the Constitution.

Mr. PRATHER. In reply to the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Hovey) I must say that I think he is much mistaken in regard to the time that will be required in taking these agricultural statistics. They can be taken at the same time and by the same individual who takes the assessment, and will cost a very little additional expense. I hope the section will be adopted.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. As Chairman of the committee which reported these sections, it may not be amiss to give some of the views which induced the committee to report them to the consideration of the Convention. I feel, like my colleague from Marion, when I repeat what he has said that the excellence of such a provision is so apparent on its very face as scarcely to need an argument in support of it. In reply to the objections of the gentleman from Posey, I will state that the committee considered it would be but very little trouble to the tax collector each year to keep an extra book ruled in columns with proper heads to each, being directed by law to put certain interrogatories to each tax payer, and this with the information obtained by the assessor would make it complete. Or the law might provide that every individual should send a short certified statement of the products of his farm to some person authorized to receive such statements. This could easily be done, and I have no doubt whatever that such a provision of law would very readily be complied with by the people.

Sir, there is no interest in the whole country that is equal to the agricultural interest. From that interest we derive all those resources necessary for carrying on the government. To their productions we must look as a means of obtaining a revenue. It is useful in that point of view. So useful has it been considered, that the Congress of the United States, in the bill providing for the taking of the census, has made provision for obtaining very accurate information in regard to these matters. But this occurs only once in ten years. The object of this section is to record the products of the year preceding. It will be recollected that there is a wide difference in the products of the State even as between the years 1849 and 1850. In the year 1850, there were probably raised five hundred bushels of wheat to where there was one hundred raised in 1849. Sir, I regard this provision as being of immense benefit to the State in an indirect manner. We would have accurate and reliable statistics; and it would be a great incentive to the farmers of other States to come and settle within our borders, when those statistics show the vast quantity of grain which our soil is capable of raising.

Mr. COOKERLY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Marion how he would carry out such a measure, without great additional expense?

Mr. MORRISON. I propose to do it by making it a part of the duty of the assessor or of the collector of taxes. Very little additional time would be required to obtain the information, as either of these officers might be passing from farm to farm in pursuance of their duties.

Mr. COOKERLY. The county auditor will certainly charge for his labor, and it will take the assessor three times the length of time to make his assessment that it would otherwise do. As a matter of course, therefore, it would entail a vast amount of expense, and I shall most determinedly go against every constitutional provision that is likely to impose additional burdens upon the people. I believe with the gentleman from Posey, that this is a matter which appertains solely to the Legislature. We have not come here to legislate, but to settle the basis upon which future legislation shall proceed. This is a matter purely of a legislative character, and I do believe that it ought not to be put into the Constitution of the State. I am in favor of the principle, but I say let the Legislature provide for it, if they think it is necessary or useful, or that the information thus sought can be obtained without too much expense. They are the proper judges of such a matter, and let us not, therefore, put it into the Constitution.

Mr. BORDEN. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee on the executive, that most of the States of the Union which have revised their constitutions have made a provision for taking the census of their respective States every five years, and have also provided for obtaining information of this kind at the same time. The U. S. Constitution provides for taking the census every ten years; and if we were to amend the section by providing that this information should be taken in the year 1855, and every tenth year thereafter, we would then have this information furnished to us in a perfect form, every five years. Such an arrangement would relieve the State of considerable expense in obtaining this information every year. I merely throw out this as a suggestion.

Mr. MORRISON. No expense is necessary at all.

Mr. DOBSON. In reply to the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) I would simply remark that the Legislature have had the power to provide for obtaining this information, but they have always failed to do so. I have again and again attempted to have some such law passed, and have as invariably failed. This is a matter of such importance that I think we ought to adopt a provision in the Constitution, in order to secure it. It is not going to cost so much as gentlemen imagine. The assessor has to go around and make his assessments anyhow; and the additional cost of obtaining this information through him would be very little indeed. Then, Mr. President, who will pay the cost? It will be the farming population themselves, when the assessor is collecting the information. And what will be the result of it? Why, sir, every year we shall have a published advertisement of the products of each county, and persons at a distance will know exactly to what particular county to go for any specific products they may desire to purchase. This will naturally produce competition. I know that it may seem to many gentlemen here a very small matter; but let me ask them if there is a single dollar of wealth in the State, except what is dug out of the ground by the farmer. Merchants advertise their wares, and lawyers and doctors their professions, in the newspapers, and why should not those engaged in agriculture have the means of advertising the fruits of their labors? This, too, will only be once a year. It can be done very easily. The assessor might have a blank form, with appropriate columns. The farmers themselves would fill them up, and all he would have to do would be to carry the sheet away, and then have some person at the county seat to make an aggregate of the whole.

This, sir, is information, above all other information, that the people of this western country need and want. Our merchants, our lawyers and physicians, are all maintained by what is dug out of the soil by the farmer, and I am satisfied that they would be willing to pay all the additional expense, if there is any incurred. Now why do I make these remarks? Simply, sir, because when men have been engaged in a business, they are apt to talk about it. I have been engaged in raising stock, and I know that it is exceedingly desirable that persons buying either stock or any other agricultural produce, should know in what county they can most readily find what they want to purchase.

Mr. BASCOM. I have only a word to say in regard to this matter. I think that gentlemen are very much mistaken when they frighten themselves into fits about the expense of collecting these statistics. They can be taken without costing the country any additional expense. I am glad to see that our Governor, in his late message, has recommended a different mode of assessment throughout the country. I had a little observation in reference to this matter in the State of Ohio. I was there when the assessor was going round, and I know from experience that their assessments cost much less than assessments in the State of Indiana; and besides that they collect more information that is valuable to all the citizens of the State. They have a sheet printed in blank columns, which they leave with each farmer; and all that the man has to do is to set down how many cows, horses, &c., he has in that blank sheet. In ten days the assessor calls and obtains the blank thus filled up, and takes the affidavit of the person called upon as to its accuracy. By this means valuable statistics are obtained, and it takes no more time than it does to take the mere assessment. This provision, in addition to the assessment which must be taken, would hardly add a feather's weight to the expense, while at the same time it would furnish to the people of the State a vast amount of the best kind of information. I think we can do but little less than turn our attention in this respect to the agriculture of the State. Upon it we all depend for a livelihood. Upon it depends the prosperity of the State; and shall we not give in this Constitution one brief section—a few lines—for the benefit of the farming interest? Shall we not give the people a knowledge of what they produce? By this means you would let men in one part of the State know what was produced in another part of it. By this means you have the products of the whole State before you, and I think it is due to the people of the State that they should have this information; and I am not only satisfied that it will not cost anything to obtain it, but that the people will not complain if it should.

Mr. SHOUP. The gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) has said that notwithstanding all his efforts from year to year in the Legislature to have this plan adopted, that body refused to do so. That, sir, is a very strong reason to my mind why we should not adopt any provision of the kind in the Constitution. [A voice—"that's a fact."] If the people themselves have not called for it, certainly the Legislature need not force such information upon them; and if the people have not called for it, and the Legislature has not thought it necessary, why should we make such a provision?

The gentleman from Allen thinks that this information would cost but little. It will certainly cost a great deal. It will cost at least $125 to each county, and perhaps $10,000 a year to the State. Whenever the people think it necessary, they will request the Legislature to make such a provision. I therefore move to lay the section on the table.

Mr. WOLFE. Will the gentleman from Franklin withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. SHOUP. I will withdraw it, to accommodate the gentleman from Sullivan.

Mr. WOLFE. The gentlemen have been talking a great deal about farmers and farming, and I suspect they have been talking about that that they know very little about. I call myself a practical farmer. I was educated in a corn field, and it appears to me that the object contemplated by this provision is altogether useless. It will not make the produce of any farmer either more or less. These things, like water, all find their own level. If gentlemen want to come to the country to buy wheat they know the wheat country without having this information from the farmer, and if they want to buy mules, they know perfectly well where to find them [laughter]. It has been truly said that all the wealth we have in the State is dug out of the earth, or rather, is the product of the soil. But do you want to take away from the farmer all that he earns? I know very well that I can do without this information, and sell all that I have without any trouble. Sir, we are told that this information is to cost little—that it can all be obtained on a printed sheet—but who is to pay for the printing of the assessors' sheets, and the books, and the individual going twice over the county? It is the farmers of the country, the men whom this provision is intended to benefit. Sir, all this talking here is for Buncombe. I am a farmer at home, and I ask for no such thing as that. It may be advantageous for doctors and lawyers, and men who want to live by speech-making, to know who is solvent and who is not, and for those out of the State to see where they can best go to buy what they want, but it will be of no advantage to the farmer.

Mr. DOBSON [interposing]. The gentleman from Sullivan refers to lawyers who call themselves farmers, and men of education. I can tell the gentleman that I was educated in a corn field, or, rather, I was there when I should have been receiving my education.

Mr. WOLFE. I did not allude to the gentleman from Owen. If he thinks so I will take it all back. I know he is a good farmer. I am only speaking of the general feeling of what would be advantageous to the farmer. I can see no advantage to the farmer, and therefore I do not think it is worth while to detain the Convention with any further remarks. I believe gentlemen are all prepared to vote on the subject.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on this section before the motion is made to lay it on the table. And I desire also to have the attention of gentlemen who are of opinion that this is a matter of so little interest to the good people of our young, but flourishing State; sir, I regard this as a matter of vital import, not to the farmer alone, but to the whole country. Yes, sir, it is of importance to the physician, to the lawyer, the day laborer, the mechanic, the merchant, to all; for in some things we have a common interest, and this interest has been too long overlooked by all. I ask gentlemen in what consists the wealth, in what consists the pride, the prosperity, and the future prospects, temporarily, of our country, but in a development of our vast resources. Politically, a nation's character is the sum of its splendid deeds—they make up one common patrimony, the nation's inheritance. Just so would we weigh or measure the character of the agriculturist, by the sum of the fruits of his enterprise and industry.

And as this is a subject, to which the public mind should be directed speedily, the necessity of recognizing it in the organic law, must be obvious to every gentleman on this floor. Some gentlemen object to this section on the ground, that it is to benefit the speculator at the expense of the farmer. Sir, the contrary view is the correct one. Give your farmers annually, the exact amount of hogs, of cattle, of mules and horses, and of produce of every sort in the various counties in the State, and your farmers will be less likely to be imposed upon by speculators whose business it is to gain this knowledge to the exclusion of others.

But the gentleman from Sullivan says he is a practical farmer, and that he does not wish to incur the expense attending these returns. Why, sir, if the pork feeders in the Wabash valley, had been favored with correct information in relation to the number of hogs compared with former years, they would have received for their pork this fall and winter, enough to have paid the expenses of these reports for the next ten years, over what they have received. I should be much pleased to see the time, sir, when like our sister States, we shall have an agricultural fair, annually, when we shall feel proud to come up to the capital of the State, with our stock, and our produce, and greet each other as the sovereigns of this heaven-favored land.

In relation to the amendment proposed by my friend from Parke, who sits on my right, (Mr. Davis,) I am willing for the present, that it should be adopted, leaving the matter to be further acted upon by the Legislature.

Sir, as the farming interest is the interest of all, as agriculture is the source of true wealth, and the true source of all wealth, and it has been so long neglected to the injury of all, may I not be allowed to express the hope, that in the adoption of this section, the subject will receive an impetus, that it may be the means of brightening the hopes of the hard-fisted yeomanry of our country, that it may be a beginning of better days, the dawn of a new era in the history of our State. I close by expressing the hope once more, that this section may not be laid on the table.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I think I and my constituents have some interest in this matter. I myself, have been raised a farmer, and I believe I am in some measure, at least, acquainted with their interests. The farmers of my section of country, do not require this information at the expense which is to be incurred by it. Now, I ask if your census takers are not paid by the day? Certainly they are. And it will take twice as much time to take down all these statistics in relation to the productions of the country as it would to make a mere assessment, or to make an enumeration of the population. Sir, it will not cost less, on an average, to each county, than two hundred dollars a year. Is not this a considerable sum to abstract from the farmers of the country merely for the purpose of informing stock-jobbers where they may purchase the best stock, and get the best bargains? I think it is, and I am, therefore, opposed to it. I do not believe that the people of the country ask for it, or desire it; and I hold that it is not right to tax the farmers for the purpose of obtaining this information without their consent, for the benefit of others. I never raised anything which I could not readily sell in my own neighborhood, and that, too, for a fair remunerating price; and why then should we tax the people to obtain information merely for the benefit of strangers?

Mr. COOKERLY. The gentleman from Putnam makes a sweeping declaration and says that when gentlemen vote to lay this section on the table, they are giving a vote that will deeply affect the farming interest of the country. This, sir, is not the case in the sense in which that gentlemen implies; because I do not believe, that there is a single gentleman on this floor that would try to depress the farming interest, either in this or in any other State. I, sir, would not wish to be understood, in giving my vote to lay this section on the table, as militating against the farming interest of the country. I shall give that vote, because I desire to protect them in their rights. Sir, I came here as an economist, and not for the purpose of making Constitutional provisions to increase the burdens of the people. This section, sir, has no business to be adopted in the organic law of the State. I said it before, and I say it now, that I do not care how much gentlemen denounce those who vote to lay this section on the table, or who vote against it, I shall certainly give such a vote. I am a farmer myself; I raise everything which I require to eat, and I should be the last man in this Convention to do anything which would be likely in my opinion to injure the farming interest.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I propose to amend the section by striking out the word "annually" and inserting "every fifth year."

Mr. FARROW. This report contains but two sections; one in relation to having a return of the agricultural products of the country, and the other to the education of children. The former section refers to that kind of physical training that men are engaged in as farmers, and I am happy to say that the county I represent would perhaps have as little interest in the adoption of this section as any other. It is now undoubtedly the interest of Putnam county, that the traders in stock should know that a great amount of stock is raised there. And it is not because the farmers of that county are influenced by any very highly constitutional feelings that they desire to see this provision in the Constitution, but because they have taken the question of raising stock in advance of other counties. They have devoted their attention to it; and having done so, the probability is that they will realize a much larger profit from the products of the soil in that county than they will in many other of the counties. Notwithstanding this, however, it does seem strange to me that there should be any opposition to voting so small a portion of the Constitution to the farming interest.

Gentlemen complain of the expense of the arrangement. If, however, they will consider for a moment, I think they will come to the conclusion that if there should be a small additional expense incurred in obtaining this information, it will, in a very short time, be more than ten-fold repaid, by the advantages which will accrue from it. This information would be sent abroad, through the newspapers and by other means, so that each county would have a partial advertisement of its staple products, not only without any cost but with great advantage to the producers. I know that Putnam county first increased her stock by an agricultural fair, and just so long as she continued to keep up her operations in that matter, so long she continued to improve in the stock of the county; and from that small beginning we have secured perhaps a better stock, or at all events a stock equal to any that can be found in the State. If, then, you adopt a provision in the Constitution directing the attention of the Legislature to the subject, you will increase an interest in all matters appertaining to agriculture, in which the farmers of the country will doubtless acquiesce. I am in hopes that this matter will not be disposed of in such a summary way as has been proposed. When I first noticed the section, it appeared to me to be one of such importance, one that I thought would require so little argument in its support, that I could not but believe it would be adopted by unanimous consent, and without a single objection.

Mr. SPANN. The second section of this article has a special reference to the common school law of the country, and it appears to me that that provides for everything that is necessary. It has no reference to anything appertaining to the farming interest; because, whether a man is a farmer or a mechanic, or a lawyer or anything else, it is all the same to him, so far as this provision is concerned.

In relation to the first section I cannot but regard it as wholly useless, even if it were incorporated into the Constitution. If a man has anything to sell, there are usually markets enough in which he can sell it without the necessity of his going to the expense of advertising the whole world that he has it to dispose of. Sir, I think that the committee who reported this section, misconceived the true interests of the farmer; for I think it is not in any way material for him that the number of his horses, or cattle, or sheep, or hogs, should be known. When they are taxed they are always found, and he is always ready to give an account of them. If a person comes from Ohio to Indiana to purchase stock or wheat, he generally knows where to go to obtain what he wants. If the whole object is to give the citizens of Kentucky and other States an opportunity of knowing what we produce, such a provision is evidently for their benefit and not for ours. So far from the farmers of this State having any interest in such a provision, I think it is a decided mistake. Besides, sir, this is a question which, in my opinion, is strikingly legislative; and for that reason alone, if for no other, it ought not to be incorporated in this Constitution.

The question was then taken on the motion to amend, by striking out the word "annually" and inserting "biennially."

The amendment was not adopted.

Mr. HAWKINS moved to amend, by striking out the word "annually" and inserting "in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, and every tenth year thereafter, and to add thereto the number of inhabitants."

Mr. H. said that when the United States first took the census, provision had been made for obtaining a vast amount of statistical information in relation to agriculture and other products, and if the Convention were to put the matter in the shape in which he had suggested, they would have every fifth year, a full statement not only of the aggregate wealth of the State, but also that which was a matter of equal importance, a reliable statement of the increase of population. If there was no other advantage to be gained beyond a mere matter of State pride, that, in his opinion, ought to be sufficient to prompt the Convention and the people of the State, farmers, lawyers, physicians, and every other class, to require information of this kind. Such a provision is not only worthy of the character of a great people like the people of Indiana, but it is worthy of a place in their organic law.

Mr. MOORE moved to lay the section and amendment on the table.

Mr. PRATHER moved a division of the question.

The question was taken, first on laying the amendment of Mr. Hawkins on the table, and a division being called for, there were yeas 51, noes 30.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

The question then recurred on laying the section, as reported by the committee, on the table.

Mr. CHAPMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MOORE. I will withdraw my motion to lay the section on the table.

The PRESIDENT. It is too late now to withdraw the motion.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the section on the table, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Berry, Blythe, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Hugin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Lockhart, Mather, Mathis, McLean, Milligan, Moore, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Hariden, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Spann, Tagué, Tannehill, Trimby, Watts, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—66.

So the section was laid upon the table.

EDUCATIONAL STATISTICS.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on section No. 2 of the same article.

[The section was read by the Secretary.]

Mr. SMILEY moved to lay the section on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT NUMBER TWENTY-THREE.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is report No. 23, on its second reading.

[This is a report from the committee on matters pertaining to criminal law, and contains two sections—the first defining the crime of treason, and the second prescribing on what evidence persons charged with the crime shall be convicted.]

Mr. PETTIT moved to amend the first section by inserting the word "only" after the word "shall," so as to make it read:

"Treason against this State shall only consist in levying war against it, and in giving aid and comfort to its enemies."

The amendment was adopted by consent.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question then being on the adoption of the second section, it was adopted without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPORT TWENTY-FOUR.—THE BANK QUESTION.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is report No. 24. The Secretary will read the first section.

The first section was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"The business of banking shall be free to all, on such terms and restrictions as the Legislature shall impose in general laws for such purpose, including the following principles, which shall be obligatory upon all persons, associations, or corporations acting under such general laws."

Mr. HALL. I move to amend by striking out the section and inserting the following:

"Sec. —. The General Assembly may authorize the establishment of a new State Bank, with Branches, to go into operation after the expiration of the present Bank charter, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; but in no case shall the State be a partner, or have any interest therein, or any branch thereof, except as may be occasioned by the investment of any trust funds of the State therein as loans; and the safety of any funds, so invested, shall be secured by their preference in payment, in case of insolvency, over the stocks of any individuals in the Bank; Provided, That each Branch shall be mutually bound for the debts and liabilities of each other."

Mr. H. said that, at the present stage of the question, he would refrain from offering any observations in regard to the amendment.

Mr. RARIDEN. I am not disposed to go into the discussion of this isolated proposition; but I should be very glad to discuss the whole subject of banking, so far as the State of Indiana is therein concerned; not its philosophy of this time, but its use compared with its rival project. It will, however, be utterly impossible for me to do any kind of justice, either to the subject or to myself, in the short space of fifteen or thirty minutes.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Wayne that the rule is now thirty minutes.

Mr. RARIDEN. Then I will say as much as I can in that thirty minutes. ["Consent."]

As this is probably by far the most important subject that will be discussed before this body, I would much like that the thirty minutes rule should be suspended. I believe that the time of the Convention would be saved by it; and also because it is known that, when a man speaks against time, he cannot arrange his ideas in that form, or express them in such language as he would desire, and I would like if some gentleman would move to suspend the thirty minutes rule, so far as it applies to the subject of banking.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to suspend the rule.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, and the rule was not suspended.

Mr. RARIDEN. I am well aware that, even in thirty minutes, I could not make myself intelligibly understood; and I shall have to move the indulgence of the Convention to be allowed to continue, otherwise I shall have to stop in the middle of my remarks. I am going to discuss the whole subject as it presents itself to me. I am going to take a view of the State Bank system as it now exists, and as a parallel with the free banking system, for the purpose of showing that the people of the State are better secured under the charter of the State Bank, than they could be under the free banking system. I say nothing of the benefits of the present Bank— [much noise.]

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would respectfully ask the Convention either to repeat the eleventh rule or to observe it. The rule is as follows:

"Whilst the President is putting a question, no one shall walk across the room; nor whilst a member is speaking enter into private discourse, or pass between him and the Chair."

Gentlemen must be well aware that it is exceedingly painful to the Chair to be under the necessity of continually calling order; but with so much conversation going on, and so many gentlemen constantly walking across the floor, it is impossible that the speaker can be heard, or the business of the Convention attended to as it ought to be. It is very unpleasant to have to make this remark, but gentlemen cannot fail to see its propriety; and the Chair would again ask of gentlemen either to observe this rule or to repeal it.

Mr. RARIDEN (resuming). Now, Mr. President, I lay it down as a positive fact, that it is not within the power of this Convention, nor of any legislative body, by their action, to exclude from the State of Indiana a paper currency, or to increase the quantity of precious metals that circulate as a currency. It is not in the nature of things that that can be done by legislation. If we do not supply a paper medium of circulation, it must come from the other States around us—Ohio, Kentucky, and all those States with which we have connection in trade. They are pledged to the continuance of a paper currency. It is with these habits, and in these institutions, and must continue. It is admitted that the present State Bank, with its present capital, is entirely insufficient to supply the demands of trade; and, in consequence, I take it that other States supply us with a paper circulation of at least two millions of dollars, at a cost of at least 7 per cent.; and I believe, further, that the State of Illinois is supplied with a circulation of five millions of dollars of foreign paper. Upon that two millions of dollars, we necessarily pay to persons out of the State the regular interest at which such institutions discount money.

Another thing let me premise before I proceed, and that is as to the contraction and expansion of currency so much complained of, and about which the banks are so much blamed. It is not their fault; if they could, they would at all times consult their interest, and keep up the circulation at their highest point; but they cannot; it results from the laws of trade. With us we have our seasons for investments, and when the demand is great and the supply small, there is great disposition to adventure. Everybody wants money, and the banks, to please their customers, as well as to advance their own interests, loan freely to the last sou, and those loans upon the main staple are generally made upon time. Bills payable east, with a view to accommodate the trade of another class of customers who will want at the maturity of those time bills. Well, it very frequently so happens that men were mistaken in the demand for the subjects of these investments, and when it gets to market they either sell at a loss, or hold on for a rise, and in each case they fail to meet these bills. Then the trader applies for relief and delay, which, if they grant—and they generally do—requires a calling in of means around them to meet the liabilities which those bills were expected to meet. Besides this, the periodical seasons of investment and sale would account for the expansions and contractions upon a principle very just and natural, that in the growing and producing season half the amount was not wanted that was in the winter and selling season, and therefore the expansion and contraction.

I assume, then, that we must ever have a circulating paper medium; and if we do not furnish it for ourselves, our neighbors will undoubtedly furnish it for us.

That the State Bank of Indiana has done well—that it has afforded a secure medium of circulation, and has had the confidence of everybody—that its paper was at all times convertible into specie, excepting at that time when there was a universal suspension of specie payments—I am not going to deny. Nor am I going to discuss the causes which produced that suspension. It is sufficient for me to know that such an event having occurred once, it may occur again. At all events, we live in the midst of a community pledged to a paper currency, and it is a law of currency, that where there are two mediums of circulation, one of which is cheaper than the other, and that one only will answer every possible purpose of trade, that one will go where it is wanted for those general purposes. It must necessarily go to the great points of trade, while the other medium, made to answer local purposes, will be confined to those localities for which it was designed, and where it answers all the purposes of local trade. Hence, I say that the banishment of banks from among us cannot be the means of increasing the circulation of specie, or the expulsion of paper. I have not time now to discuss the merits of the State Bank; but I will merely say that it has answered all the general purposes for which such institutions are desirable. It has made to the State of Indiana not less than a million of dollars. It has made eight hundred and seventy thousand dollars belonging to the school fund, the greater part of which the State has appropriated to its own use. It has associated capital in such a form, and as a subject of taxation, as to make the State from eight to ten thousand dollars per year. It is taxable as individual capital, and is thus made visible as a subject of taxation on which the State has laid its hands, and realized an annual tax that will amount to the sum of perhaps two hundred thousand dollars or more.

Mr. HAMILTON. I think that was for school purposes.

Mr. RARIDEN: The charter says that until an ad valorem system of taxation be established, there shall be only a tax of twelve and one-half cents a year, per share, for school purposes. That tax has been regularly paid, besides the ad valorem tax as upon other property; and I believe it amounts to between five and ten thousand dollars a year. It is a convenient way of having a tax. It is so fixed that whatever capital the State has in it is protected by the whole amount of individual stock. That is protection enough from the guaranty of the individuals that manage the concern, to look well to the interests of the State of Indiana, as well as to their own interests.

But I wish to speak of a charge that has been made against that institution, for taking more than the legal interest through the instrumentality of bills of exchange. It may be that they trade in bills of exchange. If they do, it is for the interest of the Bank as well as of the community to do so, if it can be better and cheaper done through that than through other means. And if the Bank did not do it, instead of its costing its customers from one to a half per cent to carry their money to eastern cities, it would cost them double per cent, besides the risk. This, sir, is for the convenience, as well as for the interest of the customers of the Bank. Let me give an example. Here are flour and pork, which are staple articles. If I wish to become a pork packer, I apply to the Bank, and the banker says, "I will let you have money upon a bill payable in Philadelphia, or New York, or Boston." Well, say he charges me no discount upon that bill, except the interest till its maturity; the pork packer receives the money here; he invests it in hogs; he gives his bill payable at the place where the sale of the pork when packed is to be made; he deposits that much to the credit of the institution here, and the merchant here going east to buy goods takes the bill of the Bank drawn on that fund, and has no hazard in carrying his money there. Now this is a simple process through the medium of trade by which bankers are enabled to transfer their funds from one point to another, to suit trade, and at little cost. It is a matter of convenience, and one of the best methods that can be devised. Some gentlemen will say that when you go to the Bank to get money on your bill, they will not give you their own issues, but perhaps a draft on some other bank, on which you will have to pay half or one per cent. premium, and that in order to obtain convertible funds you must lose half or one per cent. This results from having more exchange than the market required, and if it gets rid of it in this way, it is only doing as any other trader would do. This State Bank, then, has answered all necessary purposes for which it was intended; it is perfectly secure, and is the only enterprise which the State of Indiana has embarked in that has made money for the State. That is enough to say in the present instance in regard to the Bank of Indiana.

Mr. President, my ears have been assailed with the universal cry of wide spread free banking. Now, what does that mean? I made a little sortie, not long ago, by offering a proposition to exclude from the General Assembly all Presidents, Directors, &c., of railroad or banking companies. For offering that proposition I was called a demagogue, and charged with catering to vulgar appetites. I did not see proper to repel that charge then, and I am now going to explain what kind of demagoguism it is. I now repeat, whatever gentlemen may say in regard to railroads and other improvements, all of which I regard as a great benefit to the State and the people, and I applaud the enterprise that has brought them to what they now are; yet I say that men embarked in interests of this kind, have a single eye to those interests, and ought to have, and that, in the Legislature, they would endeavor to have such laws passed as would make them more profitable and more useful to themselves, without much regard to public interest. These men would be joined together in one common tie of interest, and would be moved by one common impulse. The pressure that is put on at head quarters, would be felt throughout every part of these great works, and the whole would answer to the rudder.

Now, sir, one word more about my notions of monopolies. It is not the Constitution or the Legislature that constitute monopolies. It is the power of money. If I have a million of dollars, I am able to monopolize a great portion of the trade. Men of money, too, act with a common impulse. Now, when I proposed to exclude Presidents and Directors of banks and railroad companies, I showed the reason why I would exclude them. I said that they would be associated together, and, under the control of the master work; and that one of these works now constructed had a revenue superior to the whole revenue of the State Bank of Indiana, and that every railroad connected with that line would be necessarily under its peculiar influence, and would be compelled to act as it might direct, and would yield loyally to its wishes.

Now for the free banks. I tell you whatever can be done to obtain a system of free banking, will be done. Gentlemen say that we are going to have the best kind of security in the world in these free banks, by founding them upon State or United States stocks. Let me examine this for one moment. I say to gentlemen that the great object of the advocates of free banking, is to found the system upon railroad stocks; and they design to do it in this way: Our State stocks pay an interest of, say, five per cent. The dividends on railroad stocks amount to ten per cent. What individual holding State stocks would not be willing to pledge them to the free banking company?—in other words, the "Railway Banking Company"—if they could thereby obtain more interest, and a pledge of the road stock as security for the bonds. The owners of the railroads must necessarily own and direct the free banks, and they will, consequently, own the State bonds. The receipts of these railroads will not be less than two thousand dollars per day. Let the State receive their issues as tax, and the road receive it as toll, &c., it will be a perfect security. That very paper squeezed out of the State bonds, will be loanable at six per cent., and at the same time, will pay five upon the bond.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MAY. I move to suspend the rule.

The rule was suspended.

Mr. RARIDEN (resuming). This system of free banking affords the very best opportunity for the owners of the railroad stocks to enrich themselves. The foundation of this system is said to be State or United States stocks, paying five per cent. interest. They will make their issues, and with these issues they will buy up the produce of the country. This will be giving them five per cent. for using the money. But this is not all. I say that the men who own the railroads and free banks, when they loan out their money to be invested in the produce of the country, will direct where that produce shall be shipped to, and to whom, and storage, commission, insurance, and storage will be added to interest. They will control the whole issue, as well as the road. One other thought. The price of produce must depend upon the demand, and the amount of money in circulation; and when there is a combination of all these interests, having the control of the circulation, they, having also the control of the roads and transportation, will be able, by a diminution of the circulation, to put down the price of produce at just what they please, no matter how great the demand for it, and thereby make immense profits.

Now one other word in reference to this free banking. I am going to speak from Gubernatorial authority—the best kind of authority, which is neither democratic nor whig, but the truth, and half between the two. It is a matter of documentary history and official information, and it gives us information of where this great amount of free banking capital is reposing, but which, for some unknown cause, has not found a place on the tax-books. But hear Governor Wright, in his communication of useful information to the Legislature, made only yesterday. He says: "While the property of the man of moderate means, the farmer, the mechanic, and the day-laborer, is, from its very character, exposed to the eye of the assessor, and is such as to enable him to estimate its value with accuracy, it cannot be doubted, that a large amount of taxable property, consisting of corporation stocks, moneys, and credits, entirely escape taxation."

He then instances, that the estimated value of property in New Albany, is three hundred thousand dollars more for corporation than State tax; in Madison, five hundred and sixty-five thousand four hundred and seven dollars more, and in Indianapolis, six hundred and fifty-seven thousand nine hundred and ninety dollars more. How does this come, among the people-loving and money-making inhabitants of those places of trade? Is this the free bank capital which wants employ, but is too proud, or too diffident, to step forth on the tax-book and be rated like poor men's effects? Yet my word for it, the owners love poor men, farmers, mechanics, and everybody else. But then this free bank capital could not find its way upon the tax-books, and they are not to be blamed. I hope they will not be offended with the Governor for revealing it, or limit his discounts, when it finds its proper place, in a haven for free banking.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I will explain this to the gentleman from Wayne, if he will allow me. The citizens of those towns have a right to make for themselves an assessment on what they assess, for a municipal tax. The assessment is made on a totally different basis from that for the State tax.

Mr. RARIDEN. Oh! if that is all the explanation, I may admit it.

Mr. MORRISON. Compare those counties around, and these assessments.

Mr. RARIDEN. I shall make no such comparisons, nor have any altercation. I am discussing a great principle, as well as particular features in the human character, in pursuit of gain—which is but another name for the pursuit of power over their fellow men. To make money more profitable to its possessors, is the object of this free system, and all other systems that I have ever heard or read of. The old and present plan of banking, is through incorporations. There the law creates the body, and gives it all its powers; none can be exercised except what is granted. And it being a creature of law, is under the supervision of law, and answerable for any excess over, or departure from, delegated powers. The free system is based upon the natural rights of man, under the idea that what may be done by man as a citizen, may be done by him as a banker. Its friends say they only want to negative certain powers and rights in that branch of business. It is said further, that this business is to be left open to all—to be free as air—no monopoly about it; that whoever will produce State bonds to the State, and pledge them, with some other ceremonies, becomes a bank of discount and deposit, himself, or themselves, and that the State gives its certificate of power, as a passport to the paper, and sends it out into the world, to make its fortune, or the fortunes of its godfathers. This is called free to all. Do not gentlemen know, that when you require a deposit of State bonds, to fifty or a hundred thousand dollars, before beginning, you interdict a majority of men, as fully and absolutely as if it was done by a decree of heaven?

We are told, that no frauds can be perpetrated, under this perfectly free system. Indeed, sir, when I looked through our revenue laws, I could not see how any frauds could be committed upon them. It did not occur to me, how this free banking capital could conceal itself from taxation. And yet it did so conceal itself, and such things pertain to the sly and insidious character of such capital. The disposition which the Governor shows, to unhouse and unscreen this capital, I have no doubt increases its desire to creep into State bonds, which cannot be taxed as capital, and then to have a currency squeezed out of them, that might be loaned out at interest, or employed in any other way that real capital could be employed, and avoid taxation. The Governor speaks of this matter, as something appertaining to his knowledge, and he gives it in charge to the Legislature, as a great fraud and abuse, which ought to be looked to by those who have sympathy for tax-payers. We have here an evidence of the affection of the owners of this capital, for the people. Their money wants to be employed in free banking, for the benefit of the people; to expand their currency, to stimulate their industry, and to reward their labor. But it is not to be taxed, as theirs is, and its owners are the men to whose integrity, wisdom, and love of justice, must be confided the whole subject of currency. If we embark in this enterprize, upon the basis of State bonds, which, I again repeat, will come through the railroad companies—not because their holders would be unwilling to form partnerships here, and furnish the bonds for bank capital, and thereby have six per cent. per annum added to the interest of his bonds, which would come off the people—but because they could still do better by furnishing the bonds to the railroad, which has the whole carrying trade, besides a credit, which would give perfect confidence to the bond-holder, under all contingencies. And that the Madison road will control all others that are connected in any manner with it, is as certain as that heavy bodies fall and light ones rise, or that inferior force is subdued by superior. Then they will all harmonize. They will, if this system is adopted, dole out the money, to purchase the produce, and fix the price upon transportation; and if they do not look to their own interest, it will not be because they have not the power. Perhaps those patriots who may turn free bankers, and who boast of always being near the people, when their interests are in danger, may still stand, like guardian angels, by them, to save and shelter them, for that will be their only hope.

Gentlemen say they are not willing to embark in this new system of money making, until the hands of the State are tied, lest it might break in and spoil the whole field of business. They don't want competition, and I don't want to try the experiment, without leaving the State at liberty to enter the field and drive them out, if they turn out to be severe task-masters, as I fear they will. There is no use of such a restraint upon the State, for I tell you that no State bank can stand up against such an institution as a free bank connected with, and acting in harmony with, the railroads.

Then, why should we tie up the hands of the State? Why should we say to posterity, "we see clearly what is for your best interests and therefore, we leave you no control in the matter?" I say let the State come into competition; and let it have the power of putting down these institutions, if it should be found necessary to do so for the good of the people. Gentlemen say, when the people are to be effected, they are always very near to the people.

Sir, this is getting near to them in reality—it is getting into their pockets. If they repudiate the idea of any connection between the railroad companies and the free banks, all I say, is, wait for the future and see what time will develop. Men of money will adopt just such a system as will make their money produce the most to them. If they can control the people so as to be able to supply the circulating medium, they can expel from the country all other circulation, by raising the price of transportation, should produce get so scarce from the scarcity of money to buy it.

Sir, I feel much exhausted, not being in very good health. When the subject shall have been discussed, and gentlemen shall have spoken all they have to say upon the subject, then I will take up their bantling as they may exhibit it, and, if I do not show them that the inevitable result of their free banking system, as they design it, is to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer, then I will confess myself no prophet, and blind to the future. [Applause.]

Mr. DOBSON. It is now growing late, Mr. President, and as this is a question of great importance, I much fear whether gentlemen will listen with any degree of patience or attention to any remarks I have to offer. [Cries of "go on, go on, go on."]

Mr. President, where has all this noise about free banks sprung from? In what direction has it come? On what breeze was it bourne? Has it the smell of salt water upon it? I would like to have all these questions answered. Will gentlemen answer them?—we shall see. Let us look at the matter.

Some twenty odd years ago, we were told that the General Government must engage in an extensive system of internal improvements —it was to make us all rich, very suddenly, and no mistake. A stop was put to this system, by Andrew Jackson vetoing the Maysville Road Bill.

Then, sir, what next. Why, the States undertook, each for itself, to construct works of internal improvements. Well, sir, the system broke down by its own weight and its own inherent defects. When the crash came, the astounding fact was published far and near, that the States had sold bonds to the amount of two hundred millions of dollars, and that these bonds were owned by foreigners. Many of the States failed to pay the interest on their bonds. What next, sir? Why, sir, a splendid idea—just the thing exactly; it was that the General Government was to assume the payment of all these bonds. Do you know, sir, where that scheme had its origin? Well, it was not in this country. It was in England. A fearful struggle ensued in Congress and in the State Legislatures, and at the ballot box this scheme finally failed. The General Government refused to assume the debts of the States. I, for one, was opposed to it. What next, sir? Why, those holding the bonds of Indiana came forward and proposed a compromise,—they were willing, if they could not get money, to take property at its appraised value. [Laughter and applause].

Well, the compromise was made, and they took the Wabash and Erie Canal, and the lands obtained for its construction, for half the debt, and we issued new bonds for the other half, bearing 5 per cent. interest—4 per cent of which we were to pay semi-annually, until 1852, the other 1 per cent. to be added to the principle at that time, and after that we were to pay the interest as it fell due. Well, sir, what next? Another new idea—aye, sir, a splendid, a glorious idea. Now I ask the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) if it is not possible that these foreign bond holders are willing, not only to make and manage our canal for us, but to do all our banking for the next fifty years, if we will only permit them? What kindness; disinterested kindness. [Laughter.]

How much do we owe, sir? Say seven million. At what interest? Five per cent. Now the great object of the friends of free banks, as they tell us, is to bring home our bonds, so that the interest may be paid at home, instead of sending it abroad. Ah, that's the idea, is it? [Applause.] Now that is a plausible argument; but let us examine it and see how it will work. Suppose the bonds at home are deposited in the Auditor's office,—free banks in operation all over the State, in full blast, the bonds will still draw the 5 per cent.—the people will have to pay it by taxation. The banks will make from 6 to 10 per cent. on their issues. Who do they make it of? Our people, of course. Who gets it?—Where will it go to? Now there's the rub. [Cries of "that's the question," and applause.] Our people will not get it,—do you ask me why?

Why, sir, for the very best of reasons; they have not the money to buy the bonds. Will any man pretend to say that the citizens of Indiana have seven millions of specie to spare? Sir, the idea is preposterous—the money is not here—you can't raise it. Then I ask again, who is to own your bank and get the profits? Foreign capitalists. [Cries of "that's the idea," and applause.] Yes, sir, that's the idea. They will then draw from the labor of this State from 12 to 15 per cent., instead of five;—they now get 5—they want 15—will you give it to them? [Cries of "no, no, no."] Gentlemen say no. I say no. Then resist this free banking system. But it is said that we will get clear of an odious monopoly, by putting down the State Bank and adopting this new idea, (or, more properly speaking, this foreign idea, as I should call it). Yes sir, get clear of a monopoly, by embracing a greater one,—like the live eel in the frying-pan, finding the place rather too hot, hoping to improve his condition, squirmed himself out of the pan into the fire. [Laughter and applause].

History teaches us that bankers, like other men, use all the means at their disposal to advance their own interests, and they, of all others, perhaps, are the most unscrupulous in regard to the interests of others. Bankers will control this government, if they can. What has been done in other countries, may be done here, if the people are not watchful. It has been said that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. If so, we should be vigilant, and, to use a common phrase, not be caught napping.

There are five brothers on the other side of the Atlantic (I allude to the Rothschilds), who control the whole money operations of Europe. Their father, who seemed to have a most peculiar faculty for acquiring money, left an enormous amount to five sons, advising them on all occasions to act as a unit. By their means the old and tottering Governments of that country have been upheld. One of them in Paris had the ingenuity to dodge the public indignation, and come out on the side of the people. Yes, sir, these men command crowned heads, and they shut their mouths. The oldest brother has his bank at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, one of them has his in London, one in Paris, one in Vienna, and the other in St. Petersburg, and they act as a unit.

Now it has been said that these men are the owners of nearly all these stocks. Now if this change should be made, and these stocks should be brought home and made the basis of banking in this country, I ask you whether these men would not control the monied affairs of this as well as of the old countries? They have been able to control England, and one of them by the influence of the five brothers has been able to take a seat in the British Parliament, despite the laws which prohibited men of his religious opinions from sitting there. Yes, sir, proud England's Queen bowed to the money King!

Now with regard to the power to tax stocks, I will not take up the time of the Convention to discuss it at present. I do not know that these views have been taken by another living soul of the Convention, but when the subject was first presented to me, the first idea I had was, that foreign capitalists had a desire to do our banking, and that they had baited a hook and thrown it out among us, and that certain theorists had took the bait. Yes, sir, they are caught. [Applause, and "that's the fact."] I am not disposed to give up that much power. That idea I had in my head when I wished to exclude presidents, directors, &c., of banks and railroads from a seat in the General Assembly. You refused to make such a provision, and they will consequently take their seats. And if a man from a foreign country cannot himself take a seat, I ask you, sir, if his agent who he controls will not represent foreign interest and be subject to foreign instruction!

Yes, sir, they wish their agents to be in your Legislature, they wish to do your banking, and your legislation also. [Applause.] The individual holding a seat in the Legislature here will not only receive his instructions from those who vote for him, but will occasionally get a letter from Wall street, New York, that will express the wishes and desires of men somewhere else, which he will consider instructions, and will obey them. I do not believe myself—although I am not the advocate of the State Bank—that by breaking down that institution you will be able to substitute a better one. I prefer, however, a State Bank to free banks; and in doing away with the State Bank in order to get rid of a monopoly, I am conscious that the State of Indiana would never regret it but once, and that will be all the time.

But the question now evidently is between free banks and no banks. I said I considered the question as to a State Bank as settled when that section of the Constitution was adopted prohibiting the State from borrowing money for any purpose whatever, even though the people by a unanimous vote should wish to do so.

Now I apprehend that one reason, and perhaps a very just reason, which has created a prejudice against the State Bank, is, that it has not one-fourth or one-fifth of the capital which the business of the country now requires. I can account for it in no other way. True there are other objections to it, but this is the principal one. If I have four or five neighbors who want to borrow my axe, and I have only one, I cannot lend it to them all at once. The first that comes will probably get it, and the balance, being disappointed, may think that I am surly and unwilling to accommodate them. They might think that I acted with some partiality. Well, sir, I believe that banks always become partial. I believe the gentleman from Hancock was pretty near right when he said, the other day, that every man acts the demagogue as far as he has capacity [laughter], and I think that in money affairs a man is very apt to cut the length of his knife. I have no doubt that at banks, as well as in every other place where money is concerned, every man has his favorites. It is natural; we all have our friends, and I doubt not, sir, if your honor had money to lend, you would give your particular friends a wink or a nod, so that they might come in time and get it.

Now I have said about all that is necessary to say at present. I may take up the subject again; that will depend upon circumstances yet to transpire. I suppose we are going to have these free banks; that is the system which this Convention will adopt. But I want the Convention to know from whence the thing comes; let the screen be raised that all may see the Elephant. It is customary with those who exhibit menageries through the country, to bring the Elephant through the principal street of the village, so that he may attract the attention of the boys, so that they may judge the balance of the animals by the size of it. Now all I ask is to give us a peep at your Elephant before we pay our money. Don't pull the wool over our eyes; tell us at once all about it.

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 3, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LONG.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LOCAL LEGISLATION.

Mr. NEWMAN, from the committee on special and local legislation, reported back the section which confers the powers of local legislation upon county boards, with a recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN said, he trusted the Convention would not concur in the report, but that they would adopt the section, and for this reason: It appeared that by another provision in the Constitution, they were about to deprive the Legislature of the State of the power to pass laws of a local character. This power must be vested somewhere. To whom, he would ask, could it be confided more appropriately than to a board of county commissioners? Many of the new States had adopted this system. He thought it highly expedient that a provision of this kind should be adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON remarked that this section had been introduced by him. The object was to give to a county board legislative power in small and local matters. But if the Legislature could invest the county boards with the power of legislating for local purposes without having such a provision inserted in the Constitution, he would be entirely satisfied without insisting upon the adoption of the section; but he thought it indispensable that the power of legislating for local purposes should exist somewhere.

Mr. NEWMAN said, the opinion of the committee was that it was desirable to avoid, as far as possible, all local legislation, and that if a constitutional provision were adopted conferring legislative powers upon county boards, they would be running the risk, at least, of doing what would be more dangerous than for the Legislature to retain the power to legislate for local or special purposes. The committee apprehended that there would be danger of an infraction of the rights of citizens of the different counties. The objection made by the gentleman from Allen might be obviated by having general laws passed to apply only where they were applicable, and such laws would stand upon the statute book, so that every citizen might know when he violated an enactment. Even if county boards were to be constituted to exercise the power of local legislation, the Legislature would have the power to confer upon them the necessary jurisdiction, but when they came to legislate upon matters affecting the rights of the citizen, he thought they ought to be controlled and restrained by the Legislature of the State, otherwise we should run the risk of falling into worse error. If the enactments of the county boards were to have the authority of laws it should only be after a recognition of them by the Legislature. He thought it was greatly preferable that the law should be a general one, to be passed by the General Assembly, and to be acted on or not, to be adopted or not by the county board, as the exigencies of the particular county might require.

Mr. BORDEN said, the Convention would observe that the section did not prescribe that the Legislature shall confer such authority on the county board, but that they may do so, leaving it discretionary with them to do so or not, as they pleased. He supposed it was contemplated by the Convention to restrain the Legislature from passing local laws. He supposed there would be a provision declaring that all laws should be of a general nature—that they should be general in their application. If such a provision were to be adopted, then this power of local legislation could not be exercised by the State; and he knew of no better tribunal—one upon which this matter of local legislation could be more properly conferred—than the county board. He was in favor of bringing legislation as near to the people as practicable. It was the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson that everything that could be done in the county ought to be done there, and not entrusted to the Legislature. He would add that everything that could be done by the township authority, and not by the county authority, and all the business that can be as well done by the county should be done by it and not by the State. He was not very solicitous as to what disposition might be made of this section, but he hoped that before the Convention adjourned, a provision would be adopted conferring the power upon the county boards to legislate for county purposes, or else to authorize the Legislature to pass general laws to be applicable only when adopted by the constituted authorities of the several counties.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move the following amendment—

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon concurring in the report.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move then that the report be concurred in with the following amendment:

Add these words "under general laws."

The question being on concurring in the report with the proposed amendment,

Mr. PETTIT said, he understood this to be a proposition to create ninety Legislatures.

A VOICE. Ninety-one.

Mr. PETTIT. Ninety-one small legislative bodies—one in each county of the State. If gentlemen could point out one thing that required legislation which was not of interest to the whole State, then he would consent that there should be as many legislative bodies as they chose to have.

Gentlemen were undertaking to adopt the very thing which the people had sent them here to abrogate, viz.: local legislation. He was for having the laws uniform, so that wherever the Indianian sets his foot, he might be governed and protected by the same laws, and liable to the same obligations. There was no necessity for such a provision as this. What local legislation did gentlemen want? Why not create a local Legislature for every township as well as for every county? Carry it down to sections, if they please, or have an independent Legislature for every forty acre lot. There was no need of any such thing. One Legislature was enough over one people. There should be but one authority—one sovereignty to rule all.

Mr. WOLFE said he was not going to advocate the principle of establishing county boards; but he had a few words to say in reference to local legislation. It was impossible to do without it altogether. It was like entering up judgment in court. There must be an act to meet every case. There were many circumstances connected with one case that did not appertain to another. It was impossible that one act could cover all the cases that might occur. In reference to the public highways, for instance, he had seen a great deal of difficulty arising in the Legislature in reference to these matters. The same enactments in reference to roads would not apply to all counties alike. The soil of one county was different from the soil of another. It was not requisite to make all roads of equal width. In some of the counties, the soil was of such a nature that, if they had wide roads, they would become almost impassable at certain seasons of the year. He thought that some provision like this was indispensable.

Mr. CHAPMAN said that those county boards which it was proposed to create would correspond in some degree with those local governments called municipal—city corporations. It was possible, and he hoped it would be the case, that the Legislature would pass a general law prescribing certain municipal regulations; but he thought it impossible that they could prescribe all that would be required in the different towns and counties. The towns and counties bordering on the river would require a different sort of legislation from those in the interior. There must be a certain degree of legislative power given to city corporations to pass ordinances to suit themselves, because the State Legislature could know nothing about their wants. One thing was very certain, and it was that, in New England, where, from time immemorial the power of local legislation had been conferred upon county boards, it had been found to work well. Those boards acted under general legislation; but, in their enactments, they established regulations respecting a thousand different particulars to which general law could not specifically apply. But there should be restrictions. They should not be permitted to go beyond a certain point. He thought it would be good policy to follow the course pursued by New England in this respect. There it was the practice to submit the project of a law to the people, and call upon them on a certain day to go to the polls and vote for or against such measure. If they approved of the measure, it became a law; if not, it was a nullity. He thought there would, at all events, be no harm in conferring this power. His opinion was, that it was best to bring legislation as near to the people as possible—to let men govern themselves as much as possible. This, he thought, was the correct principle: that laws passed by the Legislature should be general, and only touch upon great leading points; that they should mark out boundaries within which these county boards should legislate. It was the true policy of all free governments to accommodate the people as much as possible, instead of tyrannizing over them.

Mr. MATHER said he hoped the recommendation of the committee would not be concurred in. If, said Mr. M., we refer to the report of the committee on local and special legislation, we find that they have provided that a variety of matters shall not be the subject of local legislation, but shall be governed by general laws. Now, it does appear to me that it will be highly necessary that we should place the power of local legislation somewhere else when we take it away from the Legislature of the State. I have examined the sections reported by the committee on special and local legislation with much attention, and with an earnest desire to vote for some provision contained in them; but before I can do so, some measure must be provided by which the business which is thus taken away from the Legislature can be done somewhere else. To say that local legislation is unnecessary, and that the people do not demand it, is, it appears to me, going further than the facts will warrant. We have had a great deal of it in this State—too much, perhaps, for the benefit of the people, for whose benefit all laws ought to be passed.

Now, so far as taxes for State and county purposes are concerned, it is right enough; and so far as relates to township and road purposes, some general provisions should undoubtedly be made by the Legislature that should extend throughout the whole State, according to the circumstances of the different counties. But if the Legislature should declare that the same tax should be levied in one county as in another, for county purposes, it cannot operate well. If the road tax, for instance, were to be made sufficiently high to keep the roads in repair in one county, it might be much too high, or too low, for another county. There is no other way of regulating these matters as the people want them, and as they ought to be regulated, but to give the power to the people of each county to regulate them for themselves.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved that the further consideration of the section be postponed until the sections reported by the committee on special and local legislation should be taken up.

It was so ordered by consent.

PLURALITY OF OFFICES.

Mr. DOBSON reported back the section which provides that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time, with a proviso that counties having less than one thousand polls may elect the same person clerk, auditor, and recorder, with a proviso that postmasters, whose annual income is under ninety dollars, may hold State offices.

Mr. SHOUP moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the proviso.

Mr. BORDEN suggested that it was not in order to instruct the committee to strike out the proviso, the Convention having heretofore instructed the committee to insert the same.

The PRESIDENT overruled the point of order.

The question being put on the motion to re-commit with instructions,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 40, nays 94—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Bracken, Brookbank, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Conduit, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Foster, Gootee, Haddon.

Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Kelso, March, May, McClelland, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Snook, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, and Wiley—40.

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogen, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—94.

So the section was not re-committed.

Mr. MURRAY remarked that there seemed to be a very strong objection against the provision rendering postmasters eligible to office, but it seemed to him there was no very good reason why they should not be eligible. The case of a postmaster was very different from that of a justice of the peace. The duties of the office of postmaster could be discharged by deputy. But this was not as in the case of justices of the peace. It appeared to him that the objection should not prevail against the passage of the section.

Mr. DOBSON said that the reason which the gentleman had assigned in favor of the eligibility of postmasters was the very reason why he was opposed to it. It was an office that was held at the will of the Executive. The postmaster might be turned out of office at any moment, by the Postmaster General. He had been in the Legislature, and had seen postmasters in that body exercising their franking privilege, and sending documents all over the country. He was in favor of equality among the members of the Legislature; and the very fact that postmasters were under the control of the existing administration was the reason why he wished to exclude them. He wanted the Legislature pure and uncontaminated by extraneous influences. He wanted them to act under no other influence than a desire to promote the interest of the public. He wanted no man in the Legislature who could make use of the privilege belonging to a postmaster, for the purpose of disseminating the political views of those under whom he held office.

Mr. WATTS said he was opposed to the section, but he did not see in it the great bug bear in regard to postmasters which seemed to terrify the gentleman from Owen. The gentleman, he thought, was somewhat mistaken about the franking privilege of postmasters. He was under the impression that it extended only to the business appertaining to the post office.

Mr. DOBSON. I have seen them franking political documents frequently.

Mr. WATTS. Well, sir, I will not contend with the gentleman on that point; but I am opposed to the section because it will disqualify a great many citizens of Indiana from being elected to office, although the people may desire to elect them. If a man accepts the office of justice of the peace, and the people wish to send him to the Legislature, I am of opinion that they ought to be permitted to do it. I shall vote against the section.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to strike out the proviso relating to postmasters. It seems to me that if any class of men ought to be excluded it is postmasters. If the proviso be stricken out I shall support the section, but if it be retained I shall vote against it.

Mr. OWEN. It does appear to me that the position of the gentleman from Owen is not a correct one. I ask the gentleman if there is a single postmaster who receives but ninety dollars a year who is not obliged to do something else for a livelihood? He must necessarily do something else, for the receipts of his office would not support him. It is not for the sake of the receipts of the office that the postmaster accepts the office, but for the accommodation of the neighborhood. It is wrong then, in my opinion, to deprive them of the right to be elected to the Legislature.

Mr. WOLFE said it appeared to him that gentlemen were making this thing a matter of more consequence than it really was. He thought they were going too far in the way of disfranchising individuals. Who were the people to find capable of representing them in the thinly populated counties if they did not have the privilege of selecting from among those who were considered competent to discharge the duties of justice of the peace, or postmaster, &c.

Mr. MAGUIRE was in favor of retaining the proviso.

Mr. DAVIS of Parke moved to strike out the word "postmaster," and insert "the holder of any office the fees of which do not exceed sixty dollars per annum."

Mr. BRACKEN. It appears to me that the point here is that money disqualifies a man for holding office. I maintain that if fifty dollars incapacitates a man, one dollar is a part of the same incapacity. We have declared that justices of the peace shall be ineligible. But there are many justices of the peace who hold their offices not on account of any emolument arising therefrom, but for the benefit of the neighborhood. Yet they are to be excluded; and we are proposing to fill the Legislature with men who are bonded together in one common interest, and who upon every change of administration, as is well known, lose their appointments. If a man takes an office let him be content with that office. Or if he wants another let him resign the first. I do not know how many postmasters there may be in this body, but when you touch upon the question of office holding, you find men bounding up on all sides in defense of a plurality of offices. For my part I want to see men act consistently.

Mr. MURRAY. I suppose the question before us is designed to involve two principles: first, to proscribe men who may be supposed to possess an undue influence from the circumstance of holding high offices, men of means and of talent, that they may not exercise an improper and overpowering influence upon legislation; and in the next place, to diffuse offices as much as possible, so that all may take part in the making of the laws, or that all may share in the benefits of office. Now it may be very proper to carry out these two objects, but no one will contend that an office, the profits of which are under ninety dollars a year, is such an office as would induce any man to accept it for the sake of what it produces. Such an office will not support any man. The office is usually accepted for the accommodation of the people; at least, so far as relates to the part of the country which I represent, there are many who hold the office of postmaster solely for the benefit of the neighborhood. It is desirable that the principle of proscription should not be carried too far, otherwise it might be extended into all the walks of life. There is no man who goes to the Legislature who does not expect to procure some law, or carry out some measure that will promote the views of those for whom he acts; and if you carry out your principle of proscription, you must proscribe every man in the State.

Mr. STEELE replied briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Rush. He thought the gentleman was making a great ado about a small matter. He was not in favor of conferring several important offices upon one individual, but if they were going to make the holding of a small and unimportant office a disqualification, he had no hesitation in saying that it would do a great injury to the country. His doctrine was, that in regard to the minor offices, the county offices, the people ought to be left free to give more than one to one man, if they considered him capable of discharging the duties appertaining to them. When more than one office was conferred upon a man by the people it was evidence to his mind that he must be a man of talent and of integrity—a man in whom the people could safely repose confidence.

Whenever the people got hold of a man that was honest, if they gave him half a dozen little offices, it would not hurt him. ["Consent," and laughter.]

Mr. GORDON moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being first on the amendment of the gentleman from Parke,

The amendment was rejected.

The question then being on the re-commitment of the section with instructions to strike out the proviso in regard to postmasters,

It was decided in the negative.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken, with the following result—yeas 85, nays 41—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Cookerly, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Wolfe, Work, Zenor, and Mr. President—85.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Bracken, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Duzan, Elliott, Foster, Holman, Johnson, Kelso, March, Mathis, McLean, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Rariden, Robinson, Shannon, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, and Wunderlich—41.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision.

No further reports from committees being made, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. NILES. I rise, sir, to make a motion, though I fear that at the moment it may not be very well received. It is in relation to our rules: I am solicitous, sir, that the question of banking and currency shall be thoroughly discussed. It is true that I have my own opinion at the present moment in reference to this question, but I am by no means sure that that opinion may not be modified in some respect in consequence of the arguments which may be advanced. It is undoubtedly our purpose to meet on the best possible grounds, and I appre-hence that whether the Constitution we are forming shall be rejected or accepted by the people, will depend as much upon the manner in which the bank question is settled as upon any other thing. There may be many days' discussion in regard to this question.

The PRESIDENT. What is the gentleman's motion in regard to the rules?

Mr. NILES. It is this, that for a certain period, say to-day and to-morrow, the half-hour rule be suspended, that the experiment may be tried, and that—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the gentleman's motion will amount to an amendment of the rules. A suspension of the rules can only be moved for a particular occasion.

Mr. NILES. A motion to suspend the rules for a certain time, it appears to me, does not amount to a change of the rule.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that a suspension for two days would be a virtual change of the rule, and that one day's notice of such a motion would be requisite.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion inquired whether it would not be in order to suspend the rule while this particular subject was up for discussion.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has just decided that it would not.

MILITIA.

The sections in relation to the militia, providing that white male inhabitants between the ages of eighteen and forty-five shall be liable to perform military duty, (persons conscientiously scrupulous excepted.)—that the militia shall be organized into companies, regiments, and brigades, and providing for active and sedentary militia, &c., were read a third time.

Mr. NAVE moved to re-commit the sections with instructions to strike them out and insert a provision to the effect that the Legislature may organize the militia in such manner as they may deem expedient, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and may provide for the discipline of the officers, and for the organization of volunteer corps.

Mr. CLARK of Hamilton moved to amend the instructions, so as to exempt persons having conscientious scruples against bearing arms, from liability to do military duty, or to pay an equivalent therefor.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio said he hoped that the section that had been reported by the committee would not be re-committed, unless the Convention were satisfied that the substitute that had been offered was much better than the section. For his own part, he did not perceive that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Hendricks, contained anything that would tend to secure the organization of the militia, or which would render them subject to be called on by the Commander-in-chief, in case of invasion, or to suppress riots and insurrections. He conceived, that as they had already provided that the Governor should be Commander in-chief of the militia of Indiana, the militia, when organized by the Legislature, should be under his control, as well as under the control of the officers immediately commanding them.

The section reported by the committee, continued Mr. PEPPER, provides, in the first place, that the militia shall be composed of a certain description of inhabitants: those over eighteen and under forty-five years of age. That is the provision of the first section. The second section provides that persons having conscientious scruples against bearing arms, shall not be compelled to enrol themselves in the militia. The third section provides that the Governor shall appoint the Adjutant, Quartermaster, and Commissary General. The fourth section provides that the militia officers shall be commissioned by the Governor, and hold their commissions no longer than six years. The fifth section contains a provision, which the committee believed indispensably necessary, in compliance with the law of the General Government, in order to obtain the quota of arms, to which the State is entitled; and that is, that the General Assembly shall fix by law the method of dividing the militia into brigades, battalions, companies, &c.; and the sixth section contains a provision, which is not imperative, however, that the militia may be divided into sedentary and active militia, in such manner as may be provided by law. These provisions, if the Legislature should carry out, would be the means of establishing effective volunteer companies. The last section, and, as the committee conceived, not the least important, provides that all the present offices in the militia, shall be abolished. This will leave the field open for young men to aspire to higher offices in the militia, and will infuse a degree of spirit and enthusiasm into the organization of those active companies. I hope the section will not be re-committed; and if gentlemen have any amendments to propose, they may offer them, and the Convention can act upon them.

Mr. PETTIT. Let me ask the gentleman one question. I understand he proposes to abolish the present militia offices. Does the gentleman intend to deprive them of their titles? [A laugh.]

Mr. PEPPER [laughing]. Not at all. They may assume a title of a higher grade, if they wish.

Mr. NILES said he had hoped that the article, as reported, would have been stricken out, and the provision only left, which designates the persons liable to perform military duty. The sections were re-committed, and brought back in a simpler form. He opposed the instructions, because they added to the section under consideration. He was glad that the motto, that he had seen in his boyhood, on the knapsacks of soldiers, that "in peace we should prepare for war," was getting out of date. The feelings of peace and universal brotherhood were taking the place of warlike preparations.

Mr. SPANN said he was glad to see the cultivation of a spirit of peace; but the day had not yet arrived, when we should disregard the warning voice of the Father of his country, who used the language quoted by the gentleman from LaPorte.

Mr. HITT demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question being first on the amendment to the instructions, it was decided in the negative.

The question recurring on the motion to recommit, with instructions, it was decided in the negative.

The question then being, Shall the sections pass?

The yeas and nays were taken, under the rule, with the following result—yeas 81, nays 33:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Bascom, Berry, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duran, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Milligan, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—81.

The remaining sections, which were ordered to be engrossed on yesterday, were read a third time and passed.

BANKING.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article reported from the bank committee—the pending question being on the amendment offered on yesterday by Mr. HALL, in favor of a State Bank and Branches.

Mr. GRAHAM of Warrick said it was evident to him, that the question should first be settled, whether there should be banks or not. He was opposed to the creation of any bank; but should it be determined to have banks, then the question would naturally arise, what kind of banks we should have? He had an amendment he would like to offer, in opposition to any bank.

Mr. HAMILTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT, I do not intend to discuss this subject, as to the utility or necessity of having Banks, or authorizing them to issue paper representing money. It seems, taken as a settled question, that public opinion demands such a circulating medium—one that can be easily converted into or redeemed in gold or silver coin, at the standard value. As a member of this Convention, I desire to present a very few practical views on the subject.

The question first to be settled is, will we have a bank or banks? If decided affirmatively, which I cannot doubt, then another question arises—what kind will we authorize?

On this last inquiry, the committee on currency and banking widely differed, as their several reports show. A majority favoring banking under a general law, and reported the section now under consideration, in pursuance of their views. A minority favoring a modified form of a State bank, with branches in which the State would not be a partner, but to which the trust funds might, if thought safe, be lent, under well and properly guarded restrictions; with, as in the present Bank, the State retaining a direction in the board of control, caused a section to be reported in pursuance of these views. These two sections, authorizing private banking under a general law, on the deposits, with the proper officer of the State, of the stock of this State or the United States, at their market value, and not above par, having at the same time a sufficient specie basis to redeem the paper as fast as it would return for payment, in gold or silver; that of the majority and that of the minority authorizing a State Bank and branches, in which the State should not be a stockholder, embrace the views I entertained, and as I thought most likely to reconcile the conflicting interest. That the Legislature would have the power to adopt either or neither, as their judgment might direct or the public will demand. That I was for leaving much to future legislative action, with such guards and restrictions as to insure the redemption of the issues, in gold and silver, is beyond the shadow of doubt.

Two other minority reports were made; one by the gentleman from Perry, the other by the gentleman from Johnson, which I doubt not will command the attention of this Convention.

The next inquiry, Mr. President, is, can these two kinds of banks exist together, or will they be antagonistical? I am decidedly of opinion they will work well together in this State—that our leading business men will connect them—selves with both. Was there abundant capital in our State to create a State Bank and branches, connected by a common interest, bound for the redemption of all the paper issued by them—that would be able to meet the business wants of this State, then there might be danger of a conflict of interest. This is not the case. On the contrary, I fear it will be very difficult to procure a sufficient capital for banking purposes, even during the continuance of your present bank charter, should banking now be allowed under a general law, in conformity with the committee's report now under consideration. What then will it be, when you wind up your present bank, and pay the capital vested in it.

Mr. President, to make banks useful, they must be established on a solid basis and command public confidence. To effect this, the issues, if of private banks, must be predicated on a deposit with some officer of State, the stocks of the United States, or of this State, with a sufficient specie basis on hand to redeem such notes as are returned for that purpose, the stocks at their market value, and not above par, on which all notes should issue, be countersigned and registered by the officer, then to an amount not to exceed a dollar, for a dollar par value of the stock, should be surrendered to be signed by the proper bank officers for circulation. To give that public confidence which alone would enable private banks to be useful, they must be managed by men who are trustworthy. Another feature to render banks useful, and not mere shaving-shops, is that their notes be received at the banks throughout the State. Should this not be the case, it would be a great inconvenience to our business transactions and to the public generally. The circulation would be very much circumscribed and return speedily for redemption. Perhaps it would be well to inquire how far private bankers would have an interest in receiving each other's paper at par, in payment of debts and on deposit, could they make it profitable to do so. Should they not so receive it, they could command no circulation for their paper, beyond the neighborhood of the bank; it would at once return for redemption in specie, thereby prevent their aiding our business men by loans to export our vastly increasing products or in aiding and fostering infant manufactories where we have any among us—the only legitimate business of banking. It strikes me, Mr. President, that it would be so. It would be the mutual interest of bankers to receive each other's paper at par. It would by that means command a more extended circulation and remain longer without returning for redemption.

Our present State Bank is now in its existence something like sixteen years, and since that period, (except when the surrounding banks stopped specie payment, thereby forcing ours in self defence, to do the same,) has given to the people of the State a currency that always commanded their confidence and meets their wants. Yet, Mr. President, it is agreed that our present State Bank is a monopoly—I grant it. The branches have too much restrictive power and have improperly used it for selfish ends, in refusing to establish other branches, as provided for by an act of the General Assembly, thereby preventing an increase of banking capital, at points where commerce demands it.

Let me ask, Mr. President, is not every citizen of the State a party to this monopoly. The State holds about one-half the stock of the Bank; the profits arising from which, after paying off the capital loaned for banking purposes, goes to the common school fund. Is not then every individual deeply interested in the success of our Bank. However, this feature of monopoly could be remedied to some extent—as well as many other defects—which our present bank charter contains. Among them and not the least is the fact, that whatever real estate the Bank is forced to receive in the payment of debts, the moment it becomes the Bank's, it is not taxed for State or county purposes; it is so much withdrawn from taxation, thereby increasing the taxable burthens of the property held by individuals. This is wrong, and should not be so. I never as a citizen could consent to a charter being again enacted without taxing the stock and all its property, however held. There are other defects, which I could point out; yet, sir, this is not necessary; all of which, with those I have enumerated, could be provided against in a new bank charter, or prolonging the present one to within three or four years of the time when we must pay off our bank bonds. Mr. President, let me ask, if private banking—to which when properly guarded, I am not opposed, but should favor, in connection with a guarded and modified form of State Bank, as I before remarked—will not in some measure be made a monopoly? What shall we then require? A deposit of stocks of the United States or of this State to an amount at least of the paper we deliver for circulation, besides a sufficient specie basis, for the immediate redemption of such paper as is returned for that purpose. How then will private banking be carried on, when it will require a capital in stocks and specie of at least one hundred and thirty thousand, for every one hundred thousand of paper they receive for circulation. I have no doubt it will be largely monopolized by our non-resident bondholders and their friends, as few among us can command sufficient means, without their aid, to commence the banking business. Mr. President, all banking from its very nature is a monopoly. True, all having funds can avail themselves of a general corporate law authorizing that species of business. To this I offer no objection; indeed I favor it, as I have already remarked.

It is also objected to the present State Bank, that most of its branches adopt a mode of loan by which they charge a greater amount of interest than would be allowed on regular discounts. I fear this is true. This could also be remedied in a new organization. Will it not require to well guard any charter granting general banking powers? There are restrictions in the charter of the present State Bank, to which we in a great measure are indebted for the soundness and safety of our present State Bank. First, sir, there is an annual report to the Legislature of the actual state of the Bank. Semi-annual examination of each branch bank by an officer of the State Board—a meeting of the directors of the State Board every three months to regulate discounts, issues, and deposits, and a bi-weekly report of each bank, to all the others and to the State Board, together with the mutual liability of each branch for the others, seems to be such checks and guards as to insure the solvency of this institution, even beyond a doubt. Doubts have been expressed of the State Bank being as prosperous as presented. To all who entertain those opinions I refer to the price of the individual stocks in the branches, constantly sought after by the directory and business men: well conversant with the affairs. What must the value be of the Stock of the State, which in case of failure would not pay a cent until every dollar of individual stock, would be exhausted? Mr. President, let me ask gentlemen who so much oppose a State Bank of any kind, and complain of its mismanagement, how they are to guard private bankers from running into excess? Where will be their reports, examinations, and wholesome restrictions by a State Board, controlling deposits, loans, and on what those loans are predicated? I confess, Mr. President, while I would cheerfully admit of private associations under general laws on the securities I have named, and shall sustain the ingrafting of such a provision in our Constitution, yet, sir, as this with us is an untried experiment, I would also authorize the Legislature to charter a State Bank properly restricted, similar to that named in minority report number three.

Another matter with me, Mr. President, is to know what the people desire in this matter. Are they divided on this subject? I am inclined to think they are. What then is our duty? Is it not to agree on such amendments to our organic law, as the people will approve of, when they come to act upon it? It seems so to me. Will not those of our fellow citizens favoring a State Bank, find its paper answer all the purposes of gold and silver, preferring it to any other mode of banking, vote against your amended Constitution if you preclude the Legislature from ever chartering one? On the other hand, if private banking is excluded, those favoring that mode will vote against amendments you may submit in your organic law to their consideration. It strikes me they will. Why not then leave these matters to future legislative action, throwing around them proper restrictions. It does seem to me this would be prudent; none could be established but such as would be safe, if thus guarded, and public opinion would call for such as was the people's choice. We would thus occupy a middle ground. Constitutions are matters of compromise.

Mr. President, we have in this State, a paper circulation of something over seven millions of dollars; one-half of which belong to our own banks; the residue to other banks—the whole is not sufficient to meet our business wants. If we then require at this time seven millions of currency, to meet our present wants, how much will we require when your present Bank withdraws the three and a half millions she has now, and will, in all probability have out, when the time to cease active banking business arrives. Another question arises—will we do the banking business ourselves, or will we pay tribute to the surrounding States, by leaving this field for bankers, other than our own? Or, will we try to occupy it ourselves? I trust we will do the latter. We can better judge of the solvency of banks among us, than those at a distance. And, if occupied at all profitably, we ought to prefer those profits realized by those who live among us and have a community of interest. To create an issue of seven millions of dollars of private bank paper as restricted in the section under consideration, we would require seven millions of stock, to be held as collateral, on which the bank paper would be issued, a sum of two and a half millions, at least, of specie on hand, to redeem the paper, as it was demanded; in all, a sum of money, it strikes me, that cannot be had by individuals in this State; without a serious withdrawal of means from other active business pursuits. The question would naturally arise, what would you propose? I would admit of private banking, under a general law, restricted as I have described. I would also admit the chartering of a new State Bank and branches, embracing the mutual liability, each for the other, with a proper Board of Control, to which, if good and ample security was given, I would lend our trust funds, to the amount of one million of dollars, requiring a similar amount from individuals, which should constitute the capital stock—on which three and a half millions of paper might be safely put into circulation. This bank to go into operation at the close of your present bank charter; then a much less amount would be required for the purpose of private banking. Or I would admit of private banking at once, granting the Legislature power to continue the present State Bank, under proper modification, until about 1862, a few years before we are bound to pay our bank bonds;—on those loans we are only paying five per cent., while we are realizing large profits for the common school funds of the State. Will we then pay off prematurely, those bonds, and realize no more profits on their investment? or will we modify some defects in the charter—extend it a few years, until a reasonable time, before the bonds are due; thereby increase largely our educational funds? are questions of expediency, worthy of our most serious consideration. Then, Mr. President, why not leave some discretion to the Legislature. For, should the private banking not meet the wants of trade and commerce, (and to us it is an untried experiment,) the law-making power could then give us the modified form of a State Bank. Is there not some danger in our going too far? Does not prudence demand that we should, in our amended Constitution, throw around those corporate powers to be granted, such guards and restrictions as will secure the bill-holders from all contingency, and prevent, under any circumstance, the suspension of specie payments. Leave all else to the good sense and sound discretion of future legislation, to adopt such as their judgment points out, or the public demands. As I have heretofore remarked, I am for permitting private banking, under a general law, predicated on stocks as collaterals, with proper restrictions. I would, at the same time, permit a modified form of a State Bank, well guarded and restricted as to interest, issues, and deposits, with the mutual liability clause, with a Board of Control; believing, as I do, that those two plans can be made, as in Ohio, to harmonize, and act in concert; for I cannot, Mr. President, conceive, even with the aid of the trust funds of the State, where we are to get a sufficient bank capital to meet the wants of this vastly increasing productive State.

All the banks we can thus establish will have every facility of loaning every dollar they can command to the active, solvent, business men around them. These cannot, in the nature of things, as they now are, have a surplus capital; consequently, there could be no inducement to hostile feelings of interest between these two different kinds of banks.

Mr. President, I have no favorite exclusive plan; I think we ought to meet in the spirit of mutual concession. I trust that the subject will be discussed with calmness—with forbearance. Let us act as becomes practical men, on this practical subject. If we do, I trust we can agree on some middle ground, giving as much satisfaction to the majority of the members and to the people, as could reasonably be expected.

Mr. President, I have, in a plain way, given my views—stated some facts. I now leave the further discussion of this question to gentlemen more accustomed to debate than I am. It is a question of vital interest to the people—no less than that of deciding what shall be their currency for years to come. Will it be one of our own formation, or will we take it from institutions formed by surrounding States? It is for this Convention to propose, and the people—when our labors are submitted to them—to decide. I shall further discuss this subject. I may, in the progress of our deciding, offer some amendments, if others do not; contenting myself by a mere explanation of their import.

On motion by Mr. NILES,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall).

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a call of the Convention.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN. Would it be in order, Mr. President, to move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until Monday next, with the view of taking up another section?

The PRESIDENT. The motion will be in order.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I desire to move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Monday next in order that the Convention may take up a section from the table in order that we may complete the business as we proceed. It is the first section of report number three, providing that the credit of the State shall never be loaned, &c. This section was laid upon the table, and I move that it be first taken up and disposed of before we proceed with the further consideration of the section now under debate. [Cries of "no, no."]

The question being taken on the motion to postpone, it was decided in the negative.

[Messrs. NILES and READ of Clark made some remarks, which will be published hereafter.]

Mr. NAVE. All I have to say, Mr. President, in regard to the question now under consideration, is, in the first place, that I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Gibson has introduced this proposition. I, for one, am disposed to meet this free Banking proposition upon its own merits or demerits. I do not wish to propose any thing in lieu of the proposition reported by the Committee, but I desire that the Convention should consider the proposition in reference to free Banking, and determine whether the people should have such a proposition imposed upon them or not. I shall, therefore, ask the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) to withdraw his proposition, and let the Convention take a vote upon the section as reported by the Committee.

Now, sir, we have heard much about this debt of a million of dollars, which was entailed upon the people of Indiana. But, Mr. President, admitting all that has been said on this subject to be true, let me ask if this is any argument in favor of free banking? Does that prove that we should resort to a more odious system—a system that has nothing to found itself upon by which the people can be secured in the issues of their banks. I insist that if we adopt the free bank system in lieu of the State Bank system, we shall do nothing more than increase upon the people of the State an odious issue of irresponsible paper. I ask you to say whether the issues of the State Bank have not been redeemed—whether they have not answered all the purposes for which they were issued? Is it upon the principle that they were not responsible, each branch for the issues of the other, that the State Bank is objected to? Is it that each individual branch was not responsible for the amount of its own issues, and, therefore, had not answered the purposes for which they were designed, that gentlemen have charged all the evil consequences which they alledge have resulted from the State Bank system, and have therefore concluded that the free bank system will answer a better purpose? Sir, this is no argument at all. It proves nothing whatever. Let me, for a moment, examine this free bank system. Before I proceed to that, however, I must take occasion to say that I differ from my friend from Laporte (Mr. Niles) in saying that the State Bank is a monopoly. I say, on my credit as a lawyer, that it is no monopoly; because, a monopoly is nothing more nor less than that which confers a right upon an individual, or a corporation, to the exclusion of every other person in the State. Then, sir, I hold that the State Bank has been charged wrongfully as to its character.

But let us look for a moment to the workings of this new-fangled machine, and that is the only way in which we can test the practicability of the thing itself. The gentleman from Laporte says that an individual, or an association of individuals, may establish a bank in one town, and that another individual, or association of individuals may establish another bank in the same town; and so on throughout the entire State. Now, let us put this machine into operation; let us have a "free bank" operating in every village throughout Indiana—four or five of them at Indianapolis, ten or a dozen at Madison, and as many at New Albany; let us put the whole machine into operation and what will be the result? Why, sir, each of those banks will issue its own paper, and what is to be the responsibility? Why, gentlemen tell us U. S. stocks, or Indiana stocks, or the stocks of other States, and upon no other security. Now, they issue their paper; it goes into circulation; each one of these banks is responsible only for its own issues, and the moment you travel out of the village in which such bank is located, your money depreciates, because it is the interest of the banks in the adjoining town or county to have it depreciated; and a man with such money cannot travel out of the State without being shaved some fifty times. This, sir, will be the result of the free banking system, and under this system if a man had to pay debts at the East, he would have no means of doing so without purchasing bills at a high premium. These free banks I hold to be utterly irresponsible; and if a run should be made upon them for specie what have they to pay with? Why, gentlemen tell us they have United States and other stocks, but they have no silver or gold, and consequently the banks must lose their credit and go down. This has been the case in every age of the world in which free banking has been resorted to. It has proved, in past experience, an entirely worthless operation, by which the industrious portion of the community have been prejudiced, and not those operating in banking. Take, for example, the argument of my friend from Clarke, (Mr. Read) who has just taken his seat. He tells you that no matter what may be the condition of banks, they invariably report themselves as solvent, even if they should go to the wall the next day; and more than that, that those engaged in them never fail to take care of themselves. Then, sir, I am for meeting this proposition for free banking now—not as a substitute for the reported section, but as an independent system, and I hope the Convention will vote it down.

Pending the question on the amendment offered by Mr. HALL,

The Convention adjourned.

Mr. READ of Monroe offered the following additional section:

Mr. RARIDEN. My greatest objection to incorporating this section in the new Constitution, grows out of the fact of not knowing what will be the effect of that provision exactly. If other gentlemen can trace out that result, they are more highly gifted than I am. It is not true, sir, that in every state and condition of society, equal justice can be done to every individual in it and the true interests of society at the same time be maintained. Individual rights must sometimes be sacrificed to public good.

Another objection is, that we cannot see the ten thousand circumstances that may and ought to influence the Legislature hereafter; we do not now know what will be requisite for the interests of society in the future, or the thousand contingencies that may arise. A case strikes my mind now, that illustrates my position. Here we have what is called the Falls of the Ohio river, and every man conversant with the interests of the State of Indiana knows that if a canal was constructed around, on this side of the river, at those falls, it would be a measure of permanent interest and glory to the State of Indiana, and the whole upper country.

It would not only afford employment for capital and labor, but it would remove the hazard and danger now attendant upon the river commerce. It would be a work of great public good, and great expenditure as well as profit. This, then, is one of the enterprizes open to the world, if we shall allow it upon just terms. And do you suppose for a moment, that a company would engage to construct that work if the State of Indiana were to reserve to itself the power of authorizing the construction of another canal along side of it, to destroy its profits? The idea is absurd.

If the State of Indiana decides that it will prevent the concentration of capital in enterprises for any useful purpose, let it be so; but if not, then throw open the field of competition to all. But what capitalist of any sense would engage in such a work if he is not to have the enjoyment of it when done? If an enterprise turns out profitable the State reserves to itself the right to destroy, by constructing another work alongside of it. And what man of any judgment will consent to it?

The Legislatures that assemble hereafter, should be presumed to have some little wisdom in regulating this subject, and I am opposed, therefore, to making any reservations that will bind their action for the future.

SATURDAY, JAN. 4, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BADGER, a delegate from Putnam county.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the committee on accounts, made a report upon Mr Sheets' account. They deemed the account reasonable, except the price of the carpet. This they thought too high, inasmuch as the Hall was used on evenings for other purposes than those of the Convention, which caused an additional amount of wear and tear.

It was moved that the account be laid upon the table, upon which motion the Convention divided—ayes 45, noes 28.

So the report was laid upon the table.

Mr. LOCKHART asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. Hovey, on account of sickness in his family.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Convention took up the resolution presented by Mr. MILROY on the twenty-eighth instant, relative to instructing the committee on phraseology, &c., to leave all Latin words out of the revised Constitution and substitute English words, conveying the same meaning, in their place.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved that the resolution be laid upon the table, upon which question the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 36, nays 86—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Beard, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Helmer, Huff, Kelso, Kilgore, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Robinson, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Tannehill, Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Zenor, and Mr. President—36.

NAYS.—Messrs. So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

The question being, Shall the resolution pass?

Mr. CLEMENTS offered the following amendment:

"Except so far as the same has a definite legal meaning."

On motion of Mr. DUNN,

The amendment was laid upon the table.

The question recurred upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. McCLELLAND thought there could be no difficulty about this matter. He did not deem it necessary to make any exceptions whatever; it was obvious that the meaning can be expressed in English. The Supreme Court of this State, speaking of the term "ex post facto," said: "The words ex post facto have a definite technical signification. The plain and obvious meaning of this prohibition is, that the Legislature shall not pass any law after a fact done by any citizen, which shall have relation to that fact, so as to punish that which was innocent when done; or to add to the punishment of that which was criminal; or to increase the malignity of a crime; or to retrench the rules of evidence, so as to make conviction more easy." 1 Blackford, p. 193. Scott, J. Again, the United States Constitution forbade the States to pass any "ex post facto law," which was defined to be "one which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed." 6 Cranch, p. 138.

Again: The term was defined in 1 Bouvier, p. 534, in the following words: "Ex post facto. This is a technical expression, which signifies that something has been, after another thing, in relation to the latter."

It seemed to him that the term in the English language very fully expressed what was intended to be expressed. And it should be borne in mind that in the Constitution this prohibition against passing "ex post facto laws," applied exclusively to criminal or penal cases, and not to civil cases. When gentlemen said that this language could not be rendered into English, all he would say was, that they should go and consult their dictionaries. Any law book in the State Library would prove conclusively that the term could be intelligibly rendered into English.

Mr. GORDON. I did not design saying a word in relation to this matter, but the conduct of some gentlemen seems to be so inconsistent that I cannot refrain from offering a remark or two.

It is but a few days since gentlemen expressed their willingness to receive into our midst tens of thousands of foreigners, and after a short residence amongst us, to place them on an equal footing with the native born hoosiers; but the very moment they happen to light upon a foreign word in our Constitution their antipathies are excited, and they demand that it be expunged. They have a great love for foreigners, but great hatred for foreign words. If this is not "buncombe" I do not understand the meaning of the term.

Mr. President, two thousand years ago our ancestors were barbarians, roaming through the forests and among the marshes of Europe. Their language was as barbarous as their manners and customs. As they became more civilized, by coming in contact with the more enlightened inhabitants of southern Europe, their language became more refined and their vocabulary more enlarged, by incorporating into it foreign words. It was by this means that the rude and barren language of our ancestors has become one of the most copious and refined of the living languages. There are many ideas coursing through the brains of American citizens, that could not be expressed in the language of our ancestors a few centuries ago; now there is scarcely a shade of thought that the mind can conceive, but can be expressed in appropriate words by us. This cannot be done by using only such words as our ancestors originally used, but it is accomplished by making use of any word that conveys the proper meaning, whether it be a Latin, Greek, or French term. Our language much resembles ourselves. We are a nation composed of parts of many nations, and our language contains words of many languages.

If, Mr. President, you will open Webster's Dictionary, you will perceive what a large amount of words of foreign origin there is upon every page of it. Many of them differ from the original words only by having a letter or two added to them. I suppose this is done for the purpose of concealing from English gentlemen with squeamish taste, their alienism under a native garb, and to sound more smoothly to their English ears. I do not pretend, Mr. President, to be much of a scholar, but I have heard persons say that to dress a foreign word in an English costume, is to anglicize it. The learned gentleman from Randolph (Mr. McClelland) the other day called it "Englifying" the word; and as he is some for the pure English, I suppose "Englifying" is the proper word. These words, such as habeas corpus and ex post facto, that this same learned gentleman is so much at a loss to comprehend the meaning of, have, by long and continued use, become part and parcel of the English language, and if he will take the trouble to look into Webster's dictionary he will there find them, and their definitions; but the word "Englify," which he uses, was unknown in the days of Noah Webster, and is not to be found in his dictionary.

I have no great preference of one word over another, and care but little what may be done with these words if other words can be substituted in their place that will convey the same meaning. But this cannot be done without great circumlocution, and I therefore think it would be as well to retain them, as their meaning is as well understood by the people as one half of the words in the English language. At least I think it would be well enough to leave this matter to the good sense of the committee of revision, without instructions. I shall be satisfied with their judgment in the matter, whatever it may be.

I have no fears that the foreign population among us will injure the purity of our institutions, nor do I fear that foreign words we use will impair the purity of our language. If gentlemen wish to make "buncombe" out of this thing they are welcome to all the good it can do them, but as I am not a political aspirant I shall not condescend to make use of it.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. It seemeth to me, Mr. President, that some Latin dog hath bitten my friend from Randolph (Mr. McClelland). [Laughter.] For fear that he may die of Latin-phobia we ought to adopt the resolution as soon as possible, hoping it may operate as a mad stone to draw the virus from his veins. [Laughter.] We are giving too much consequence and wasting too much time on this subject. I voted to lay the resolution on the table because I believed the committee on revision is composed of men of sense, who will do all the resolution requires without any instructions on the subject. As the resolution was not laid on the table I shall vote for its passage, as the readiest mode of disposing of the subject. I voted against the section adopted by the Convention on the motion of the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Morrison,) because I did not deem it proper that this Convention should set itself up as a schoolmaster to instruct future legislators about so obvious a duty. I would as soon think of voting to require the Legislature to observe the rules of grammar in the composition of the laws, as to direct them, as far as possible, to avoid the use of all Latin and technical phrases. Their own good sense would teach them to do this without any instructions on the subject from us, and I have made it my rule to vote against the insertion of all unnecessary provisions in the Constitution. They can do no good, and may do much harm.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I am neither a linguist nor a lawyer. I make no pretensions to any thing higher than to a reasonable amount of that very necessary ingredient in our organization, which we call "common sense," by the aid of which I wish to say a few words, for the benefit of those gentlemen who seem to be so much troubled at this effort to expunge from our Constitution those absurdities and technicalities which have so long proved a barrier with the masses of the people to an understanding of their own Constitution.

I had hoped, sir, that some gentleman of the bar would have arisen in his place and defended this proposed reform, as numbers of them favor it; but they seem not disposed so to do, as on other occasions.

I hope it is not because some of their brethren manifest a disposition to ridicule the amendment, not because they are fearful of being treated with contempt; I say, sir, I hope this is not the reason, for I am proud to know that we have not a few, who are not only willing, but desirous that these reforms should be made, even among our best lawyers. Yes, sir, even though the personal interests of that part of the brotherhood called pettifoggers should be sacrificed upon the altar of public good, and though the sacrifice should be made to bleed at every pore, knowing that its blood cannot be shed to seal a better cause.

Common sense requires this reform, the spirit of the age, and the interests of the people alike demand it. One of the arguments used by gentlemen in favor of retaining these technical terms is that they have been long in use, and that they are universally understood. Now, sir, this is an assertion, and it is but an assertion, for sure I am that it is a mistake in gentlemen, a gross mistake.

I have the honor to represent as intelligent a constituency as any gentleman perhaps on this floor, and I must say that they are not familiar with these phrases, and they demand the change.

Some gentlemen cling to these terms as if their hopes for future employment were suspended upon retaining them.

Mr. President, I could speak to the end of my limit on this subject, but I think it unnecessary, at least upon the pending question and at this time. I may perhaps say more in future should the circumstances demand, when the question of law reform is presented as reported by the committee.

At present I close by requesting that we have the yeas and nays on laying this resolution upon the table.

Mr. NILES. I protest against the insinuation thrown out by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger). There is no lawyer whose practice will be diminished to the amount of one farthing by this proposed change of law terms. If it has any effect, it will only tend to increase litigation by substituting new and undefined terms instead of those which have been in use for a thousand years, and the meaning of which is ascertained and certain. The proposition to use the simplest and most intelligible words in framing a Constitution and laws, nobody disputes. And I have this to say, that though I believe it not worth while for us to undertake to act the school master for those who may come after us, or to introduce needless and useless innovations, yet I shall make no opposition to such propositions as that now submitted, where it is evident that the only effect would be to subject my motives to misconception.

Mr. KELSO. I do not think there is a lawyer on this floor opposed to the passage of this resolution. And if the gentleman from Putnam supposes they are clinging to these phrases as though they constituted a prop of the profession, as a part and parcel of their practice, he is as much mistaken as he was when he attacked the gentleman from Posey. There is no great consequences attached to these phrases; hence we gain nothing by the retention of these words. In place of four or five words, the English meaning of some of these phrases would take up four or five lines, as has been remarked, yet I do not see as there can be any reasonable objection to it.

The gentleman from Putnam speaks of not understanding these Latin phrases. Now, sir, I do not understand Latin, yet I understand those phrases. But take that gentleman in his own profession and give him a Latin or Greek Bible, and he will not understand one word of it. Take the Christian world, and they differ as to the correct translation of the Hebrew Bible. The different translations, the different sects, would die fighting for them, although not one in a thousand might be able to translate a line of it correctly for himself. Let the gentleman at it himself, and I am prepared to say that he cannot make as good a translation as the old one. Why, sir, the Mormons have, or think they have made the discovery, that the original translation only contained about half enough, and with all the enthusiasm of pretended inspiration they have furnished the balance, and have published it in English; and my friend from Putnam will now admit that he does not understand the Mormon Bible, notwithstanding it is as plain as any other Bible. But he disbelieves its history, and therefore does not understand it. But you cannot have a more effectual plan of salvation than the two Bibles furnish, when taken together. The gentleman's Bible has come down to us through the Latin language, and one of the great difficulties about it at this day is, whether the English has been correctly or incorrectly copied from the Latin. Then, sir, if the original tongue is the more correct, why not suffer the very few maxims which are to be found in our statute books, especially when they are easier and better understood than they ever will be when rendered into English? I advise the gentleman to study his Bible and go to work and learn the Latin and Greek languages, and perhaps by the time the next State Constitutional Convention meets he will be able to explain these Latin phrases satisfactorily; and in every case where he can render them into good English and it does not take more than three times as much room to record it, I will go with him, provided it shall be my fortune again to meet him here.

But, sir, one thing is certain: that whenever he learns what I have required of him to learn, he will by that time know that the change of those phrases from the Latin to the English, the French, the German, or the Pottawatamie, will not the least affect the interest of the legal profession. I shall vote for the resolution, because it leaves the matter to the sound discretion of the committee; and with them I am content to leave the whole matter.

LICENSE.

The resolution heretofore offered by Mr. ROBINSON, providing that a section should be reported against the Legislature passing any law permitting license for the sale of spirituous liquors, and which laid over under the rules, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. R. said, having introduced this resolution, before the question is taken upon its adoption, I desire to have the attention of the Convention to a few words I wish to say in regard to it, I am one of those individuals who bow, and always expect to bow to public opinion, when that public opinion is right—when it is sound, when it has for its object the effecting of a good purpose. What the result of such a section as I have proposed if incorporated in the organic law will produce, I admit I am not at this time prepared even to decide. Some of the friends of the great cause of temperance here and elsewhere differ with me as to the probable results that will follow from the insertion of this section in the Constitution.

I would remark, sir, here, that I am not so much influenced—in offering for adoption this section—by my own feelings, as I am by what I conceive to be public opinion on the subject. We know that when we first convened here in the capacity of a Constitutional Convention, we had petition after petition presented to us from both ladies and gentlemen, engaged in the very important and wholesome reform now going on in the community on this subject. And when the Legislature first assembled, petitions of like character were presented to that body, asking them to prohibit, in future, the granting of license to retail ardent spirits. This has convinced me of one important fact, that whatever may be feelings of gentlemen in this hall upon this subject, the people abroad, who are engaged in this important reform, think that the section should be incorporated in the organic law, prohibiting the Legislature, in future, from granting any license, whatever, for the vending of spirituous liquors, leaving that traffic entirely without the sustaining arm of the law, subject only to the law of a correct public sentiment.

Those who wish to vend ardent spirits cannot complain of this law, for it gives them an open field, and relieves them from the burden of a taxation for license. We say to them that we place no restriction of law upon your traffic; we only desire that the State should not receive one farthing of the profits accruing from your accursed business, and that for countenance and support you shall stand or fall in accordance with public sentiment.

We say to the community at large, to the philanthropist and the Christian, the field is clear, gird on your armor, harness yourselves for the contest; go forth, and if you can, with the great lever of public opinion, level to the ground every grog shop in the country, let it redound to your eternal praise, and let future generations rejoice in the glorious achievement.

[Here the Chair announced to the gentleman from Decatur that his five minutes were out.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, sir, to the rule.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result: yeas 78—nays 44.

YEAS—Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Blythe, Bordon, Bourne, Bright, Butler, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Leckhart, Maguire, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, YAYS—Anthony, Ballingall, Beard, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Johnson, Kilgore, March, May, McClalland, McFarland, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Newman, Read of Clark, Robinson, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Work—44.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

INTEREST ON MONEY.

Mr. THORNTON offered a resolution which was in effect that a select committee of five be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing a section in the new Constitution relative to the interest on money, and that no forfeiture or penalty shall accrue where a rate not exceeding ten per cent. is charged, if designated in the note or obligation.

Mr. T. said: I have suggested a select committee because I was at a loss to know to what appropriate standing committee the resolution could be referred. I have named a committee of five, but if any gentleman think the number not sufficiently large it can be increased. It was remarked the other day by my friend from Putnam (Mr. Farrow) that the Legislature in 1831 repealed all the laws upon the subject of interest, and left the matter without imposing any penalty for exacting more than the legal rate. They soon afterwards repealed that act. My friend remarked that a great many bad consequences followed the enactment of that law. I might say with truth that those consequences were brought about more by the repeal, than by the origination of the act.

I have always believed, and that opinion is sustained by that of the most eminent statesmen, and able writers on political economy of the age, that the loan of the use of money, should be left upon the same footing as any other saleable commodity. Out of deference to the moral opinion of mankind, I would say that we ought to fix a restriction; something of the kind which I have suggested in the resolution ought to be adopted. I may say without fear of contradiction that our State bank, managed no doubt with a great deal of propriety, realizes from ten to fifteen per cent., although they cannot directly loan for more than six per cent., yet by dealing in bills of exchange they can realize a much greater profit. My object is to induce something like competition on the subject—to invite money into our country. I would be disposed to throw off all restrictions, though I know that might not meet with favor from this Convention, or perhaps from a majority of the people of the State. I do not know, sir, that there is anything in the Scriptures which forbids a man to make use of his money as he would any other article of merchandize; but I will not enter into any argument on the subject now. As I before remarked, I did not know what committee to refer this resolution to, so I named a select committee of five, and hope, as it is a resolution merely of inquiry, that it may be suffered to go to such committee accordingly.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I will vote for the resolution which has been offered by the gentleman; and I wish to give a few reasons, in addition to those already given, why I shall vote in favor of it. That we have a State Bank which has vested rights, and is legally authorized to take a higher rate of interest than is taken by private individuals, I say is true. And, sir, I think no one will contradict the statement that a very large amount of the capital of the State of Indiana, belonging to the farmers, is vested in the city of Cincinnati. Why, sir, is our capital vested there?—because the farmers can get ten per cent. for it there, while they can get but six here—a very material difference. I say we ought to grant facilities to our own citizens to invest their capital amongst us, and not be obliged, as they are now, to send their capital elsewhere for investment. I know, in my own neighborhood, of $50,000 being loaned in Cincinnati, by the farmers. What is the consequence? Independent of the other losses to which I have adverted, we lose the revenue which would accrue to the State, were that capital invested here, for it would then be subject to taxation. It strikes me that, under the restrictions proposed, it would be very proper to introduce such a principle into our organic law.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "not exceeding ten per cent. per annum." It will thus leave a man free to make his own bargain in regard to the loan of his money. It will require the Legislature to pass a law fixing the interest upon judgments; but as between party and party, it will leave them, as I think they ought to be left—entirely free in this matter. Individuals in this State have been restricted to six per cent. The State has been, in point of fact, a great usurer; for she has realized on the funds over which she has control, much more than six per cent. The consequence has been that capital, instead of being put in circulation amongst us, has been invested where the trade in it is less restricted. The object which I desire to effect is to get the capitalist to invest his funds here as best he can.

Mr. KELSO. Does that fix the limitation at ten per cent.?

The PRESIDENT. The original resolution does. The amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, is, to strike out the words "not exceeding ten per cent."

Mr. KELSO. Then I move to lay that amendment on the table.

Whereupon the Convention decided so: ayes 45, noes not counted.

The question was declared to be carried.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe moved to amend by striking out "ten," and inserting "seven."

He would vote against the resolution. He thought, unless the Convention intended to sit here until the 1st of May, that they ought to reject all propositions that proposed to bring in new sections. This was as wide and as difficult a question as the subject of banking itself. He proposed "seven" per cent., which was the highest amount fixed by law that he knew of, in any of the States of the Union. Every nation that had arrived at any degree of eminence in a commercial point of view, from the dawn of civilization down to the present day, had found it necessary to establish fixed rates of interest for the use of money. It was one of the first duties of a commercial people. He contended that money was not an article of property so much as it was an instrument of exchange. He maintained that the Convention ought not to entertain propositions which were purely of a legislative character; and he would take the occasion to say that the principle embraced in the resolution would not be placed in the Constitution without encountering his most earnest opposition.

Mr. RITCHEY moved that the resolution and pending amendment be laid upon the table; upon which motion the yeas and nays being ordered and had, resulted—yeas 84, nays 39—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, March, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevensen, Tannehill, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—84.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Chapman, Conduit, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Helmer, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Shoup, Sims, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, and Wheeler—39.

So the resolution and pending amendment were laid upon the table.

Mr. COLFAX offered for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Convention meet hereafter, at 8½ o'clock, A. M., instead of 9 o'clock, A. M.

I will state the reasons why I offer this resolution (said Mr. C). It must be evident to every gentleman that we ought to work a little longer in the day, if we expect to get through by the 1st of February. By meeting at 8½ o'clock, we could get through the routine of business by 9 o'clock, and at that hour proceed to the orders of the day. I think the members of the Convention could get here by 8½ o'clock without any inconvenience to them whatever.

Under the rule, the resolution lies over for one day.

Mr. GORDON moved that the Convention do now take up the orders of the day.

The Convention refused to take up the orders of the day.

Mr. McCLELLAND offered a resolution relative to the expediency of providing that hereafter no local law shall be passed, unless it cannot be provided for in a general law.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HAWKINS presented a resolution in relation to the expediency of taking an estimate of all agricultural, manufacturing, and products, every ten years; which was adopted.

Mr. MILROY offered the following resolution, which was not adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the practice of law and law reform, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing all distinctions in the character of evidence that may be admitted or rejected in courts of justice, on account of interest in the subject matter of the suit.

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section in relation to banking.

The pending question being on Mr. Hall's amendment authorizing a State Bank, &c.,

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. There is no subject, Mr. President, in which my constituents feel a deeper interest than they do in this question of banking; and, sir, I feel it my duty, however incompetent I may be, and however intricate the subject may be, to present their views to the Convention in as brief and succinct a form as possible.

I will premise, sir, that I am in favor of banks, and I think it is necessary that this Convention should recognize them. They are essential to all commercial people, and it is useless for us to say that we will not adopt a provision in relation to banks in our organic law: for whether we provide for them in our Constitution or refuse to recognize them, they will grow up, they will exist in some shape. It is not a question in which party is concerned; it is not a question in which the form of government is involved; it is not a question which appertains either to free or to despotic governments; but it is one which belongs to all commercial people; it is one which will be regulated by them. And it may be said in this connection, that in this government, where men are freest, where they are allowed, with the least restraint on the part of the government, to exercise their powers and faculties in a way that is most conducive to their interest. Where there is the most commerce, there will be found all the facilities which commerce requires. This is so emphatically the case that the red Republicans of France at this day are advocating a proper currency for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the people of France. I say this to avoid the conclusion which some gentlemen may be inclined to draw, that this is a question appertaining to one form of government more than to another. It is not a party question, though there may be questions arising out of the system upon which parties will be divided, yet parties have always been compelled to recognize currency in some shape or other.

Now in all governments it is an attribute of sovereignty to have power over the currency. It is granted to our General Government. They have power to establish a currency; they have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. In the exercise of this power the General Government has declared that nothing shall be a legal tender in the payment of debts except gold and silver; and they have exercised the power of regulating a currency in the shape of paper money, from the necessity of the case; and without stopping to inquire whether it is Constitutional or not, we have admitted that such authority is vested in the State Government.

Now I undertake to say that from the very nature of things banks and banking must be recognized by our government. The people, or the government, which is the same thing, must exercise authority over the subject, and it is far wiser that we should at once meet the question when forming our Constitution—as it is one over which we must exercise control—than to leave it to the fluctuating decisions of the Legislature.

Now it may be said that this is emphatically a commercial age of the world. Commerce, sir, consists in the interchange of the products of nations. It is carried on by individuals, and money is the instrument by which those products are transferred from one nation to another, and from one individual to another; and it is the medium by which the value of those products is measured. And, sir, it is hence a matter of national as well as of individual concern. And so multiplied are those products that gold and silver are found to be insufficient for the wants of commerce. Commerce requires the building of steam ships to carry over products to market. To this end money is necessary, and money is made a labor saving machine in the transfer of values between trader and trader, and between nation and nation. By means of commerce, Mr. President, the labor of men is brought to minister to the comfort and advancement of the happiness of all; and the various products of all nations are placed within the reach of men everywhere, and competition and energy and the products of skill of every sort are brought together everywhere where commerce exists. Thus the labor of all contributes to elevate and advance all. This is the history of the well-being of our race; and it would be going backward if we should seek to trammel this intercourse anywhere—if we should contrive any means by which, where nation is separated from nation, the light of one may be hindered from diffusing itself all over the world as it does at present. The advancement of science and knowledge is brought everywhere to bear upon the advancement of the happiness of mankind.

Now, independently of the advantages which I have just mentioned in a general way, which renders it necessary that it should be made an instrument of commerce, there is another advantage which is peculiar to paper money, which does not belong to gold and silver. Banks issue money: they increase the amount of money at the time when it is needed—at the time when it is necessary that men should be enabled to carry the products of their labor to market. When a farmer has his wheat and pork ready to carry to market there must be money with which to transport those articles, as well as roads and canals by which to convey them to market. Now it is clear that there can be no more gold and silver in the country than has been procured by the sale of those commodities which the country produces. But by means of banks a circulating medium is advanced upon the value of those commodities, and it is based not upon a fictitious value, but upon the value of labor already performed in the producing of wheat and other products of the farmer; and for the transfer of which to market banks are needed. Now banks can perform this duty, but gold and silver never can perform it, because the expense of the transportation of the precious metals is considerable. The trader borrows money from the bank, the bills of the bank being the representatives of actual value; he buys the produce of the farmer with these bills, which answer as money; he collects the produce and carries it to market; and when he sells it he brings back actual money and pays the bank. Now this is a transaction that is not based upon an ideal thing, but upon an actual and existing value. Now this is one great office of banks which cannot be performed by the precious metals.

I said that my constituents felt a deeper interest in this subject than in any other that ever came before the Convention. So far as I know they are in favor of a system of free banking; not because they are particularly averse to a State Bank, but because they are satisfied that the necessities of the State require another system of banking. Gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate have shown to the Convention that one great objection to a State Bank is, that it is a monopoly. The State Bank would never have been organized had it not been that the necessary banking capital could not be raised unless it was borrowed by the State. Individuals did not possess the necessary capital. The State had to borrow money for her own use, and she had to borrow money and advance it to individuals for the purpose of creating a banking capital; and sir, there could not have been a better system of banking than that, at the time it was put into operation. It has fulfilled all the expectations of those who created it. But, sir, it has outlived its era. We have reached a new one. We have reached an era which requires a different system: when the ability of the people has increased, and they are prepared to carry on banking operations upon a different system. I will, without detaining the Convention, illustrate the notice of this monopoly a little farther. Originally, in each branch of the State Bank, the State had a capital of eighty thousand dollars; individuals having a like amount. This proportion has been changed in some of the branches by an increase of individual stock. Bills to twice the amount of capital may be issued by each of the branches, under certain regulations to be established by the State Board. Now, the individual stock in one of the branches may be owned by ten or twenty of the individuals; it is now owned by a small number, and they have the power to increase the amount of individual stock to four hundred thousand dollars. And they have the control and direction of the branch bank. They elect seven directors, while the State elects but three; so that they have the entire direction of this whole amount of capital. They have the power to enlarge their capital to two and a half times its original amount, and having the power to control the whole capital stock of the branch bank, both individual and State capital. They thus multiply their capital four-fold; and, although gentlemen may say that the State has a supervisory control over the bank, yet, practically, it is not so. The State elects four directors and a President, and each of the branches elects a director for the State Board, so that not only in the branch itself, but in the State Board, individuals have the control of this vast machinery. Now, the objection that my constituents make to the State Bank is to this feature of it. This monopoly may not only extend, but I may say it does extend, beyond the power of making money by loans and discounts. They have not only a monopoly of the money, but a monopoly of the farmers of the country. Where the products of the country are collected in great quantities to be purchased, there is no means of paying for these products except by borrowing from the bank, or going abroad to other States to borrow money. Now, the most of the men who are stockholders in the bank, are also dealers in produce; they are merchants, and they make loans of money to themselves in preference to others; and, sir, the business of banking is so arranged, by means of bills of exchange, that they charge about thirteen per cent. per annum upon their capital. They charge, nominally, six per cent.; but reckoning the three days of grace, it amounts as near as may be to seven, and they charge interest on the bill of exchange at the rate of six per cent., so that the money borrowed actually costs the borrower thirteen per cent. They have, to start with, an advantage of six per cent. in the purchase of produce, and they have this other advantage over every competitor in the market; if they should loan to an individual a bill of exchange, they demand that he shall make immediate payment when it falls due, whatever may be the state of the market, and this forces him to sell to them upon their own terms. This gives them a monopoly in the market upon the sale of the commodity.

If there should be but one bank it will be an equal monopoly with the State bank. The same competition which sprang up with them in the business of merchandise would lead them to establish another bank. Here you would have competition, one set of men would be competing with another, and both in the purchase of the produce of the farmer and those connected with them in the sale of it, and the monopoly not only of the money but of the produce market would be destroyed in that way. This is not only of advantage to the traders, but equally so to the producers; because by this competition the highest prices which produce will admit of would be insured by a competition among the buyers.

Now, Mr. President, I will as briefly as possible examine the comparative security of the two systems of banking. The gentlemen who advocate a State bank say that it is far more secure to the bill holder than any system of free banking can be. Now what is the security of the State bank? What security does it offer to the bill holder? They have a capital stock amounting to $160,000 in each branch to redeem a circulation of $400,000. They have only this security apart from the responsibility of the stock-holders. Now the ability of the stock-holders depends upon the ability of the bank to pay their notes, and nothing more. It is true, as gentlemen say, that the State stands, as a stockholder, responsible for the ultimate payment of all debts that may be contracted by the individual directors of the bank. But if they admit that to be a sufficient security, the system which we propose is equally secure; because we propose to provide that the corporations under the free banking system shall deposit State bonds equal to the amount of all the notes issued. Now if the State bonds are good and sufficient security for a State bank, why are they not equally good and sufficient for a free bank? Can they have any greater security? Suppose that the bill holders should all come upon the State with their bills; how could the State redeem them except by the issue of new bonds, and sending them into market to be sold? So with a free bank. You have the bonds there, and you direct them to be sent into market to redeem the bills. Thus in the free banking system you have all the security which you have under the present system. You have the State bonds dollar for dollar to the amount of notes issued, and besides that the responsibility of the individual stockholders, as in the stockholders of the State bank; and how then can the security be less under the free bank system than under the State bank system.

But gentlemen say that the branches of the State bank are all bound together, and that consequently they are more likely to stand together than would a system of banks not tied up together. I grant you that they are compelled by their present charter to hold up the falling branches, yet when a crisis does come, the whole system has to fall at once, and then the evil is infinitely greater than under the system of free banks. Under that system a bank might fail here, and another at Wabash, and yet the great commercial business of the country would not be interrupted, because each would not be dependent upon the other, but each would be standing by itself; and the same system of watchfulness which the branches of the present State bank exercise over each other would be exercised under the free banking system. They would have to exercise the same degree of vigilance and watchfulness which traders do in inquiring into the condition, and capacity, and solvency, of their neighbors engaged in like business, and to whom they have to extend credit. They would find out in a moment if the bills of a bank were suspected to be unsound, and would immediately throw them out of circulation.

Some gentlemen say that this is a new system; and they object to try what they call "experiments." Sir, it is not a new system except in this country. It is demonstrated as the only true system of banking by Adam Smith, who was the first expounder of the true doctrines of political economy. He has demonstrated that this is the only true and safe system of banking. He wrote that book to break down all monopolies—all those systems of restraint by which the nations of Europe had trammelled the business of commerce as well as the rights of individuals.

Now in regard to the location of a State bank we all know that that is a matter which is determined by questions purely political. This is not so under the system of free banking. Its capital will seek out and find that place for its operations where it is most required. It will be invested in those products and to those amounts which the business of the country may from time to time require, and will adjust itself to the commercial wants of the times. Whereas, under a State bank, all this has to be regulated by political rule, without regard to the commercial interests of the State; and this is another advantage which the free banking system has over the State bank system.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's half hour has expired.

On motion, the rule was suspended.

Mr. CLARK (continuing). The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) I think offered this as an unanswerable argument against free banks. He said that the paper of the free banks would not be received in the eastern cities in payment of debts. Now I will admit that the paper of these banks will not probably pass much beyond the borders of the State. The same argument, however, applies to our present system of banks. Paper is constantly sent from Ohio to circulate in Illinois, but the moment they have banks of their own in that State, all such paper will be immediately sent back again. But the moment the gentleman from Hendricks reflects that the paper of our own State Bank is at one and a half per cent. discount in the east, I think he will see that there is no force in his objection.

I will admit that under the system of free banks, our paper would not be received at par in New York or Boston; but it would certainly be worth as much as our present State Bank paper is worth now. All negotiations of this kind in regard to the value of our paper in the east would have to be conducted through the medium of bills of exchange, and the free banks would undoubtedly sell them as cheap as the State bank does now; so that this argument operates equally against a State, as against free banks. I do not think it would be possible with any system of local banks to provide any paper which should have a uniform value all over the Union; and the transmission of funds from this to distant States, must be managed, as heretofore, through the medium of bills of exchange.

Now with reference to the exercise of control on the part of the State over banks, I will venture to say that if you permit the power of the Legislature to alter their charters, you will have the most complete control that you can exercise over such an institution. The reason why gentlemen dwell so much on the control which the State exercises over the State Bank, is that the State Bank is placed beyond the reach of Legislative power. You cannot change the charter, and the only way in which the State can exercise control is by appointing a portion of the directors. But if you reserve the power to change and modify or alter the charters of the free banks, you have a more complete authority over them than you would have by appointing two or three commissioners to inspect their transactions.

Well, sir, with reference to the interest which the State ought to have in banks, I say that it is not safe for her to have any interest in them except it be to preserve the citizens from loss. It ought to be the business of the State when it authorizes a corporation to issue what is called money, to see that there is sufficient security for those bills. When she has provided that there shall be sufficient security for all the bills issued under her authority, she has done all that she can do. The rest must be left to the course of trade and the exigencies of commercial operations. Now my friend from — (Mr. —) informed us that the only security which existed in Scotland is the individual responsibility of the directors of the banks. But, sir, this is by no means sufficient in the present condition of the country. We have not the same rigid and uniform laws for the collection of debts which prevail on the other side of the Atlantic.

And until we have the same system of laws for the collection of debts, it would be wise that there should be a better security than that of the individual stock-holders. If we had a perfect system of credit, we might trust the issues of these banks upon State bonds or other collateral security. But it must be evident to all that we will not arrive at that condition for half a century to come; and we must accommodate our system of banking as well as we can to the circumstances in which we find ourselves, and the times in which we live.

Mr. President, I have now said all that I purpose to say at present on this question; and without detaining the Convention further, I will conclude by thanking gentlemen for the patience with which they have listened to these remarks.

Mr. CARTER. I am aware that, on account of my youth and legislative inexperience, I should not enter largely in the discussions of this body, composed, as it is, of the talent and wisdom of the State; but I hope to obtain the indulgence of the Convention while I state my convictions in relation to the subject before us.

Among the honorable delegates of the Convention, I find a diversity of opinion; some favoring the present system, some, free banking, and others, again, opposed to all banking. Sir, I have been raised in a radical school; I have been taught that all banks were monopolies, and that all monopolies were wrong in the administration of government, and that the Government was walking out of its proper sphere, when it would lend its aid or encouragement to anything of the kind. I know that the party favoring no banking is in a minority here; and, in accordance with that belief, I am only left to adopt the most unexceptionable plan that may be proposed, and, if possible, at the same time, carry out the wishes of those who sent me here. Their preference, as I understand it, is State Banking, under stronger restrictions than those now imposed. But, sir, no currency can ever be so perfect as the one which has been the longest in use—that will be liable to less fluctuation. I mean the currency of gold and silver; but even upon this currency, age after age, attempts have been made to build a fictitious one, and, in every instance, the attempt has been more or less ruinous. And to prove this position, I need not pass the borders of our country for facts.

During the Revolutionary War, the most memorable period in our history, because producing results the most memorable the world ever witnessed, no less than three hundred millions of dollars worth of bills of credit were put in circulation, causing the most terrible results. Private bankruptcy became common, and the public credit was destroyed; soldiers fought in rags, and the blood of naked feet marked their course to victory; but to return home with only an appearance of money, which would neither add fuel to the fire, or meat to the table, or clothing to the body. In a period of twenty-two years, from 1817 to 1839, we have had no less than fifteen or eighteen revulsions or stagnations, caused by our system of banks. The most memorable was the one which occurred in 1837. By it arose bankruptcy, poverty, a suspension of labor, and universal distrust. The widow lost her savings, the laborer the result of his toilsings. Nor was it confined to individuals—States and Governments felt the shock, and through them again returned to paralyze the people. Bankruptcy and repudiation—poverty, aye, and legalized crime, in the absence of a sound currency, became the legal tenders of the day. Such, sir, is a short but truthful history of banking in the United States, thus far.

Now, sir, in these revulsions, who is the loser? Is it the capitalist or the speculator? No, sir; no! It is the mechanic and the farmer, and the man of ordinary means. Capitalists and speculators are the masters of every pecuniary revolution; they "ride upon the storm, and direct the whirlwind." It is true that they may sometimes be crushed by their own machinations; but, forever whirling on the wheel of fortune, if they are down from some cause to-day, the same cause brings them up to-morrow. Thus it is that we always find capitalists and speculators, not farmers and mechanics, who are daily crying for more banks. Sir, there is no reason in giving to fifty or one hundred men preferences and privileges which the law withholds from private individuals. No set of men have any more right to act than the most humble individual; but such is the effect of all charters for banking purposes, call it what system you may. All banks are created for gain, in which the rich can alone enlist; and their tendency is to elevate that class at the expense of all others—to give to a favored few the privilege of making enormous profits of the many who have not the means to enter in the same schemes.

I have said, sir, that all banking is a monopoly; and I add that it is a legalization of a business, which, from its operations, is unjust. It necessarily must be so. The bank issues more paper than it has specie. By many economists that is considered a safe bank which issues three paper dollars to one in specie. Now, if it is indeed safe, the bank just triples its capital; and if a bank was not established on a principle similar to this, there would be a comparatively small inducement offered for banking; for then dollar would only issue for dollar, leaving only a comparative profit. But, sir, under the principle of banking of which I have just been speaking, that of issuing three times as many paper dollars as the bank has specie with which to redeem them, the operation of a bank must be unsafe, for the simple reason that it promises every day to do that which it knows itself utterly impossible for it to do, if it "promises to pay" were at any time presented for redemption. In such an event, a suspension of specie payment is inevitable, unless banks have a new mode of liquidating their debts with only one-third of the necessary means. I know that banking men say that the interest, discounts, and deposits of the banks are always at hand, with which to redeem the paper. But here I still see a difficulty. If I understand the nature of deposits, they do not constitute the true capital of a bank, and if used by it, they form only a fictitious capital. Deposits consist of money or articles of value left in the hands of the bank for safe-keeping. Now, suppose, in the case of a rush on the bank, it uses these deposits. It may redeem all its paper, but the depositors suffer, so that it only changes the locality of the evil—saving the body of the people harmless, and injuring a few individuals, who have unwisely reposed confidence in the concern. If the bank does not use the deposits, it must fail; or, if still sound, the result of the argument is no less unfavorable to the creation of banks. It has left nothing but interest and discounts with which to redeem, so that we find again the bank making an enormous profit. But, however great the profits of banking may be—and however safe banks may be in their operations—still I regard them as monopolies fraught with evil. And, sir, I do not believe in the soundness of banks under the old system. I believe that, if a concerted run should take place against almost any bank, from the effect of an alarm, a panic, or a rise of specie, say for exportation, the bank must stop, and wind up as best it can, leaving the people to recover from their reverses as best they may.

Banks can contract or expand the circulating medium at pleasure; and they hold in their hands the entire control of the currency of the country, by now issuing and conferring favors largely, and now withdrawing their money from circulation, and refusing accommodations. This power is one of the arguments against banks. When they expand their currency, as a matter of course, a depreciation of money takes place. If depreciated, creditors, in the payment of their dues, are injured; while, on the other hand, if a contraction occurs, the very reverse is the effect. It is true, this does not destroy the aggregate capital of the country; but it does injure private individuals. And, sir, the banks, having in their power the expansion and contraction of currency, have often the opportunity, and always the desire, to speculate on the community through this very medium which they have themselves created. To accomplish this purpose, the banks can easily combine. They will enlarge their discounts; they and their speculators will enter the market and buy and sell. A sudden contraction takes place, property falls, and the bankers pocket the profits, and the people are robbed and swindled. Again the bank will refuse to accommodate its old customers, but will loan to the directors and their particular friends. Those customers must have money; they receive it from these men at higher rates than the bank is allowed to loan, and the bank indirectly, through the agency of its minions, makes another swindling operation.

The capital of banks is not only fictitious, but it gives to others capital of the same character—men who themselves own nothing.

So long as we have a paper currency, so long will specie be driven from our State. No banking paper that we can give to the people will be found good in a foreign market, and the result is, that we must use paper at home, and send our specie abroad; or, what is worse, have it locked up in the vaults of our banks. Sir, a hostility to all banks was the best political lesson I was ever taught; and I pray that the day may soon come when gold and silver may be the only circulating medium known to the country, and that this State, above all others, will withhold powers and privileges from corporations, which have neither "bodies to be kicked or souls to be damned," while it refuses the same privileges to private individuals.

But, sir, I apprehend the effort most strong here is to establish the system of free banking. The arguments in its favor are most plausible, and it comes to us clothed in the enticing garb of freedom. Sir, I love freedom. The idea which it conveys is sublime. It is the watchword of our nationality. But, sir, I know no freedom, no true independence to the people of this State, in such a system, unless it be indeed a freedom from its existence and its evils. We are told that free banking is a part and parcel of the democratic doctrine of free trade. I think not. Free trade and free labor is a privilege which every citizen should possess and exercise in the ordinary pursuits of life, but it is a thing totally different from the monied monopolizing of free banking. The freedom of manufacturing paper money at will, I have yet to learn to be part of the democratic code. The appellation of free to anything aristocratic, or any monopoly, is a contradiction in terms, and a prostitution of the noblest word in the English language.

Free for whom! The rich monopolist—for a poor man cannot bank under any system. Free for what! For the establishment of the same evils of which we now complain; free for the same exactions, unless it be in the shape of interest, that the gentlemen so strongly condemn in the operations of the State Bank; and if the system is adopted, we will find the same profits made on bills of exchange and the discounting of notes. The main difference between free banking and any other system is that it only opens the door, to let the "stealings," become general, to establish fifty or one hundred monopolies instead of fifteen or twenty.

Sir, I see many objections to the establishment of free banking. The system is altogether in favor of aristocracy. A rich man can engage in the business, but a man of ordinary means must necessarily be excluded. The former can go and buy State stocks drawing interest, deposit them with the proper officer, get his bills, loan them, and make discounts on his neighbors, and thus draw at least double interest—a thing which no private individual dare do under our law.

This aristocracy can control the money power of the State, and the State itself; for "money is power." They have always in all States made their influence felt, if not why have bankers had, and why do they continue to demand, so much partial legislation?

And a strong argument against the free banking system is that many of the old chartered banks of New York were quite anxious to surrender their charters and operate under the general law. It could not with them be a matter of conscience, but a hope of gain. Establish free banks, let them exist in numbers, the result is, they must have officers. It cannot be expected that they will have the same practical skill and knowledge that those possess who have the management of larger concerns, so that the danger in this view becomes greater just in proportion as you enlarge the number of banks.

If you establish free banking, the tendency for expansion and contraction of the currency becomes proportionably greater to the number of banks established. Where there are few banks, as a matter of course the danger is smaller. And now, let us have ninety banks in this State—let a revulsion take place—and the evil resulting will be inconceivable; let a combination between these banks be formed, and a heavy demand for money exist, and they have it in their power to swindle at will.

And, sir, nothing can be a greater curse to a community than the creation of small banks: and of necessity those established here must be small, for we have comparatively little ready capital in this State, it being all invested in land and internal improvements. Now, sir, these small banks will be established in small places—every town and village will cry for a bank. They will exist where capital is not turned more than once or twice in a year. Continued inducements will thus be held out for men to obtain favors who do not need them, and which, if obtained, would do them a positive injury. And, sir, let me here remark, that some of the enemies of the State Bank are those who do not succeed in obtaining their wants from her, and it is a pity that they do not know that the Bank is thus doing them a favor.

Sir, we are an agricultural community. In the Eastern States the case is different. They are built up by commercial and trading men. Here we rely on the products of the soil. And, sir, I have always understood that the friends of banking say that it is especially adopted for the benefit of the commercial portion of community. Then establish a bank in one of our inland towns, where capital is turned but once or twice a year, and our merchants and farmers get favors from the bank—let some unfortunate change take place in the circulation, and the result will be most unfortunate to the citizens of that town. Merchants must break and farmers mortgage their homesteads.

Sir, the more banks you establish the more bills must issue. They will be of every description, and the counterfeiting of bank bills is no small item in calculating their disadvantages. Their bills will be counterfeited, and the crime will be more extended in proportion to the number of banks. Yet they lose nothing by the rascality, neither do the money operators and the speculators, for they are well skilled in detecting; but the hardship and the loss falls on the laboring portion of community, the farmer and the mechanic, who have not made steel plates and signatures their whole study, but who have engaged themselves in the more honorable occupations of life.

If you establish a free banking system, you will at once flood the country with a paper currency, running down to the lowest denomination. Every county, village, and family, will be flooded with one dollar "promises to pay," which will drive away from circulation all specie, leaving only a paper currency. That done, let a revulsion come and we will have the scenes of eighteen hundred and thirty-seven acted over again; we will have an anarchy; not of government, which the will of the people or a strong arm can overcome, but an anarchy in banking and currency, carrying with it consequences so ruinous to every hamlet and village, that time itself cannot wholly destroy. And, sir, we have not yet recovered from the effects of eighteen hundred and thirty-seven.

But, sir, a bank of some kind must be established. I believe it is the wish of the majority of this Convention, and the wish of my constituents. We are hedged in by our sister States with banks; if we have no paper currency we must use theirs, over which we have no control and of the safety of which we can know but little. We will be liable to be deceived and to be injured, without having any redress. Imperious necessity, then, compels us to guard ourselves against any such result, by establishing a banking system of some kind. And, sir, as I said before, I would have felt myself bound by the wishes of the county I represent, to favor a system of State banking, notwithstanding the eloquent reading of Jackson's farewell address by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read). And, sir, I regret I was not here when the article reported by the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) was acted on, which destroyed one of the main features of the present State Bank; but a mournful and imperious necessity called me from the exciting scenes of this Convention to the fireside of home, to perform a too mournful duty. In favoring a State banking system I do not wish to be understood as the friend of the State Bank as it now exists. Such is not the case. I would throw around it all the stringent restrictions that could be imposed.

But, sir, I must speak of one of the propositions that has been proposed to this Convention. It is called a State Bank, divesting the State of all interest in the concern, but making the State responsible for all the debts of the bank. A more ruinous system could not be devised to rob and beggar the treasury of the State of Indiana. Why should the State be its endorser, responsible for all its acts, and still obtain none of its profits, or but a small portion of them! From such banks may the treasury and the people of the State of Indiana be delivered.

Since the State has hereafter to have no interest in any bank as a stockholder, by the act of this Convention, I wish some other good system. I wish a State Bank and branches in which the State shall not be a partner, except as may be occasioned by the loan of the trust funds, to be amply secured, by their preference in payment in case of insolvency. This is my plan:

"Sec. 1. The Legislature may authorize the establishment of a State Bank and branches thereof, to go into operation after the expiration of the charter of the present State Bank.

"Sec. 2. The State shall not be a partner or have any interest in said bank or any of its branches, except as may be occasioned by the investment of trust funds of the State therein as loans, which funds shall be secured by their preference in payment in the case of insolvency, over the stocks of any individual in the bank.

"Sec. 3. Neither the bank or any of its branches shall, either directly or indirectly, receive any more interest than shall be allowed by law to persons loaning individual money.

"Sec. 4. The Auditor of State shall register and counterign all bills or notes issued or put in circulation, and security shall be required for their redemption in specie.

"Sec. 5. The billholders shall be entitled to preference of payment over all other creditors, in the case of insolvency.

"Sec. 6. The stockholders shall be individually responsible to an amount in proportion to their respective shares of stock, for all the debts and liabilities of every kind.

"Sec. 7. No authority shall be given sanctioning the suspension of specie payments in any manner.

"Sec. 8. The capital of said bank and branches together, shall not exceed five millions of dollars.

"Sec. 9. The bank and branches shall not issue more than dollar for dollar on the amount of security deposited,

"Sec. 10. The stock of said bank and branches shall be taxed, as other property, for State, county, township, and corporation purposes.

"Sec. 11. The branches of any bank which may be established under this article, shall be mutually bound for each others liabilities.

"Sec. 12. The Legislature shall provide in the charter of said bank, a supervisory control of the same.

"Sec. 13. The Legislature shall not extend the charter of the present State Bank, or allow it more privileges than it now possesses."

This proposition embodies nearly my views on the subject, and if an opportunity offers, I will submit it to the consideration of the Convention, though I have no doubt it will undergo many modifications. It yields one point to those who are opposed to any connection between State and corporation; but at the same time, in the shape of loans of trust funds, gives the State a direct interest in seeing that the operation of the bank is safe, while it also gives to the State a supervisory control of the banks, as she now has over the old State Bank. It has another good feature of the present bank, that of making each branch liable for the acts of the others, which will be a strong point gained. It is one of the great safe-guards of the present system. By the plan proposed by the friends of free banking, and which is now under consideration, we have no such provision. By the section now under debate, each bank stands disconnected from all others. The people cannot know of the safety of ninety banks as well as a few. The same is true of the banks, and the result is, that each bank will be distrustful of the others, and thus become mere shaving shops. But adopt the other plan, and all the banks will operate in harmony, mutual reports will be made, each bank will know the operation of the other, and the people will have a confidence in the system.

I also propose to increase the capital of banking in our State, and still place a limit. Five millions of capital will be sufficient for the purposes of the State, and no greater amount being allowed, we will be saved the danger of the State running riot in banking. The plan has, too, all the good qualities of free banking; individual liability, and security first made, being incorporated in the plan. It limits the issue of the bank to dollar for dollar, and makes the stock liable, as individual property, for all kinds of taxation. The plan proposes all the good qualities of both systems, and at the same time avoids all their evils. And at a proper time I will submit it, if a more acceptable plan is not proposed. I have only one desire—to have a good sound currency, in which the farmer and mechanic, the banker and the capitalist, shall be secured, and, at the same time, limit the profits of banking.

Mr. MAY proposed to amend the amendment by striking out all after the words "General Assembly," and inserting the following:

"The General Assembly shall not hereafter establish any bank, or corporation with banking powers, nor continue beyond the term of its present charter any such bank or corporation already established, unless upon and after the separate submission to the people, at some general election, of the question of "bank, or no bank," a majority of all the electors of the whole State voting at such election, shall vote in favor of banks."

Mr. HALL. As I am in favor of adopting some system of banking, I am anxious that we should adopt the best system we can get, and at the request of several gentlemen, I have agreed to withdraw the amendment which I offered yesterday, in order that the whole question may have a fair start. There are several delegates on this floor, who are opposed to all banking, and they say that it is proper, before the question is taken whether there shall be this or that bank established, the Convention should first decide the question, whether or not there shall be a bank at all; and if that question is decided against them, they will then have an opportunity of making up their minds whether they will go for a free banking system, or for the maintenance of the present State Bank. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. It is too late. The gentleman cannot withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HALL. The amendment has not been acted upon in any way, I believe; and if I am correctly informed, I can yet withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is now the property of the Convention, and there is an amendment to it pending.

Mr. MAY. It is not my intention, Mr. President, to detain the Convention with any lengthened remarks, but I must be permitted to say, that I am one of those who believe that a bank, such as we have now, in this and the adjoining States, is entirely unnecessary. I am not now prepared to give, in detail, the reasons which have operated upon my mind, to bring me to this conclusion; but I will say, that the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) in his convincing argument the other day, satisfied me that free banks are very undesirable; and the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) has satisfied me that a State Bank is not what is needed in this community. I hope, sir, that some gentleman will follow me, who will give, more conclusively than I think, has been shown, by any gentleman who has yet spoken upon the subject, the reasons why we need those institutions which we have so long had. If there are no gentlemen who are able to do this, it seems to me that that side of the question certainly lacks that kind of argument which will satisfy a reasonable mind. I believe that there are many on this floor, who think, with me, that no banks are needed; and if none, I will say, that I am ready to defend the proposition I have now submitted to the House.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to lay the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment, on the table.

Mr. MAY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hugin, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—89.

YAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Berry, Borden, Brookbank, Chandler, Chapman, Dunn of Perry, Fisher, Foster, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Kinley, March, May, McClelland, Milligan, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wolfe, and Wunderlich—43.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Gibson on the table.

The reading of the amendment being called for, it was read by the Secretary.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the amendment on the table, and it was agreed to.

Mr. READ. Is there anything now before the House?

The PRESIDENT. There is—the original section of article number twenty-four; and the question is, Shall it be engrossed for a third reading? [Loud cries of "no, no, no."]

Mr. SHOUP proposed to amend by striking out the section, and inserting the following:

"The business of banking shall be free to all, on such terms and conditions as the Legislature shall impose in a general law for such purposes, subject to the following restrictions:"

1st. No banks shall directly or indirectly charge or receive any greater rate of interest than individuals shall be allowed to charge or receive.

2nd. The bills or notes of all banks shall be registered by some proper officer of State, and ample security, readily convertible into gold or silver, taken for the redemption of the same.

3d. The stockholders or owners shall be individually responsible for the debts of such bank.

4th. The bill holders shall have preference in payment in case of failure.

5th. No law authorizing the suspension of specie payments shall be granted.

Mr. EDMONSTON If no gentleman wishes to discuss this proposition, I propose to lay the section and amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered.

A division of the question was called for, when

Mr. EDMONSTON withdrew his motion to lay the section and amendment on the table.

Mr. HAMILTON desired that the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) should be read.

The amendment was accordingly read.

Mr. HAMILTON said that his only objection to the amendment was that no security was named.

Mr. BASCOM proposed to amend the amendment by striking it out and inserting the following:

"There shall not be established or incorporated in this State any Bank or banking company, or moneyed institution, for the purpose of issuing bills of credit, or bills payable to order or bearer."

Mr. B. said, I have but a few words to say upon the subject—that the amendment I have offered is part of the old Constitution which has been praised so much in the Convention; and I hope we will retain that portion of it. But, sir, I offer this amendment at this time more for the purpose of obtaining an expression of the sentiments of the anti-bank party in the Convention. If the vote given on the motion to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Steuben (Mr. May) on the table be any test of the state of parties here, then it is clear that the anti-bank party have the power by their votes to decide which system of banking shall be adopted—the free banking system or a continuation of the charter of the State Bank; and I do not know but it might be well for us to hold a caucus, especially when we know that both the other parties have held caucuses.

Mr. COOKERLY (in his seat). You have a perfect right to do so.

Mr. BASCOM. I am obliged to the gentleman for his information. I believe I knew that much before. But, sir, if we are to have banks of some kind or other we shall then know where to place ourselves; for if this Convention is going to create banks, I for one must do all that I can by every vote I can give to restrict them to the utmost. I want to throw around them the strongest guards which the human mind can invent, and for this reason I desire to find out what kind of banks we are going to have, or whether we are to have any banks at all.

But, sir, I want no better proof with which to go before the people to show that all banking should be abolished, than the speeches that have been made upon this floor; for if they have not been made out to be the veriest swindling shops in the world then I am much mistaken. One party advocating the free against the State bank system makes that system out to be a perfect monster, which is continually gnawing at the very vitals of the State; and the State Bank party on the other hand make out the free banks nothing better than so many swindling shops. Now if both parties speak the truth, then I say let us abrogate the whole system. I hope we may first have a test vote, so as to know whether or not the Convention have determined to have banks in some shape, or no banks at all.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. In order to accommodate the gentleman with an opportunity of recording his vote on this question, I will move to lay his amendment on the table. [Loud cries of "no, no, no." "Let us have a direct vote."]

I would simply ask gentlemen whether in attempting to abolish banks they can abolish all paper from the State; and finding that this cannot be done, I would ask them further, whether it is better to have bank paper circulating among us the securities for which we know are deposited at home, or whether we shall have the paper of foreign States without knowing much of its means by which its redemption is to be secured?

Mr. KENT moved to lay the amendment offered by Mr. Bascom on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 89, nays 43:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foley, Fisher, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wunderlich, and Zenor—89.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Berry, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Chandler, Chapman, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foster, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hardin, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Smiley, Tannehill, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Mr. President—43.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. KELSO moved that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention did not adjourn.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend by striking out the section and inserting the following:

"There shall not be established or incorporated in the State any bank or banking company, or monied institution for the purpose of issuing bills of credit or bills payable to order, or bearer, unless it be a State Bank and branches, not exceeding one branch for each county in the State, to be established at such place or places as the Legislature may prescribe, or the directors of the State Bank may select; provided there be subscribed and paid in specie on the part of the individuals, a sum equal to two hundred thousand dollars; Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the General Assembly from adopting the present State Bank and branches, with such additions and restrictions as may be deemed proper."

Mr. K. said he did not wish to argue the question, for he was not prepared to make a speech. He merely offered the amendment for the purpose of testing the strength of the friends of the Bank. I am aware that there are three parties here—the State Bank party, the free bank party, and the no bank party; and, sir, as we have now been discussing the subject for two or three days, I am anxious to ascertain what is the strength of each party. It is for that purpose that I offer the amendment.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELSO. Before the call is proceeded with I will move that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

The yeas and nays being taken on the motion to lay the amendment offered by Mr. Kilgore on the table, they resulted as follows—yeas 75, nays 57:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carr, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—75.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Bicknell, Bowers, Brookbank, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tannehill, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—57.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I move that the subject in relation to banks be re-committed to the committee on banking. [Loud cries of "no, no, no."] If gentlemen prefer to have another committee I have no objection to refer the matter to a select committee. My own opinion is, that the committee on currency and banking, might put the thing in such a shape as would enable the Convention to act upon it in a more speedy manner than any other committee or even we ourselves can do.

Mr. WATTS. I hope, as a member of the bank committee, that this section will not be re-committed to that committee.

Mr. BIDDLE (interposing). Let it be a select committee of five.

Mr. WATTS. The majority of the committee it is true were able to report in favor of one proposition, and that was, that we would have a bank of some description, but without chalking out any particular features which that bank should sustain. I hope it will not be re-committed to that committee.

Mr. RARIDEN moved to amend, by instructing the committee to report a proposition favorable to the establishment of a State Bank.

Pending the question on the amendment of Mr. Rariden,

On motion of Mr. COOKERLY, the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, JAN. 6, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BABE.

The journal of Saturday was read and approved.

Mr. READ of Clark presented a memorial, embodying resolutions adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Jeffersonville, Clark county, relative to free banking. Mr. READ said, as the committee on banking have made their report, and the subject is before the Convention, I move that the memorial be laid upon the table, which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. The committee on the "Executive" department, to whom was referred the second section of the article upon that subject, relative to the veto power—with certain instructions, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to make the following report:

The Secretary then read the report; it was as follows:

"Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee to whom was re-committed the 23d section of No. 17, with instructions to strike out all in the 113th and 114th lines, after the word "Houses," and insert the 22d section of the present Constitution, prefixing the "and" before the same, have amended the section, as instructed; it reads—'And every joint resolution shall be presented to the Governor, and, before it shall take effect, be approved by him, or, being disapproved, shall be re-passed by a majority of all the members elected to both Houses. And every bill which shall have passed both Houses of the General Assembly, shall be presented to the Governor; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon the journal, and proceed to re-consider it. If, after such re-consideration, a majority of all members elected to that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be re-considered, and if approved by a majority of all the members elected to that House, it shall be a law. But in such case, the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered upon the journals of each House, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor, within five days—Sundays excepted—after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general adjournment prevents its return—in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.'"

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, it will be discovered by gentlemen, that the section just read is essentially, literally, and positively, the section contained in the old Constitution. And, inasmuch as that section, in my opinion, is not calculated to answer the purpose, as it ought to do, under the new regulations which we shall have to make, in reference to biennial sessions, I shall offer an amendment to it. I do not ask the concurrence of the Convention in that report, for the reason that I now move to concur in the adoption of the section, with an amendment, which amendment is, to strike out the section and insert the following, as a substitute in full.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Marion, that there is no question of concurrence. The committee have amended the section under positive instructions from the Convention, and through their Chairman have reported the same back. The question will be upon its passage.

Mr. MORRISON. Then, sir, I move that the section be re-committed, with the following instructions: "provided that bills vetoed by the Governor, may be passed by a majority of all the members elected to the two Houses, to be determined by yeas and nays. Bills to become laws unless returned within three days, unless a general adjournment prevents a return, in which case it shall be a law, unless the Governor, within five days after such adjournment, shall file the same, with his objections thereto, in the office of the Secretary of State, who shall lay the same before the General Assembly at its next session, for action, in the same manner as if it had been reported by the Governor."

I will call the attention of the Convention to the alteration which I make. We provide, in the new section, that the Governor shall have but three days instead of five, at the close of the session, to consider bills presented to him. And there shall be no new bills presented to him, during the two last days of the sessions, so that he will not be permitted to pocket a bill, but must decide upon it, one way or the other. If he have not time to examine a bill and return it to the Legislature, previous to the close of the session, he can file it in the office of the Secretary of State, to be presented to the next Legislature, whether the session be a called or a regular one. By this means, there can be no skulking. So far as the veto power is concerned, under the operation of this provision, it will be nothing more than a mere revisory power—nothing but what can be controlled by a majority of the Legislature. Again, in regard to joint resolutions, the proposition contains simply a provision that all joint resolutions which require the signature of the Governor, shall go through the same formula as bills. That is sufficient to indicate to the Legislature, at all times, the course to be pursued in regard to resolutions of this character. I hope the Convention will re-commit, in order to make the change which I have suggested.

Mr. SPANN inquired if the amendment was in accordance with the instructions which had been given.

Mr. MORRISON. I will reply to the gentleman, that I have literally complied with the instructions given to the committee, and reported the section so amended, but now move again to re-commit, with the instructions I have read.

Mr. SPANN. It strikes me that we have no rule permitting such a proceeding. If this Convention give positive instructions, we have no right to disregard them. The mere fact that they failed to make a report, [A VOICE. They have made a report,] the suggestion to re-commit again, with instructions, appears to me to be improper. I have no opposition whatever to the proposed amendment; I merely view it as an informal proceeding.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will remark that the Convention re-committed this section, with instructions. This morning the committee reported the section amended, according to the instructions given by the Convention, and the chairman of the committee now moves to re-commit the section, with other instructions, which is proper and formal.

Mr. WOLFE. It appears to me that the first motion would be to concur in the report. Would it be proper for the Convention now, whether concurring or not, to re-commit?

The PRESIDENT. There is no question of concurring. The Convention directed an amendment to be made and the committee merely did its bidding, and it comes back in the manner directed.

Mr. MAGUIRE observed that he had no particular objection to the proposition, except to that part of it which provided that no bill should be sent to the Governor during the last two days of the session. He did not see what use there was in having the Legislature in session if it were not at liberty to send bills to the Governor for his approval, until the end of the session.

The question recurred upon the motion to re-commit, with instructions.

Mr. GORDON. Is it in order to amend the instructions now?

The PRESIDENT. It is, sir.

Mr. GORDON. Then I move to amend, by striking out the words "by a majority of all the members elected," and inserting "by three-fifths of all the members elected to that House."

I wish just to say a word in relation to this amendment. If this amendment be adopted, it will not place in the hands of the Executive any greater power than he possesses under the present Constitution; it will be about the same.

Mr. KELSO. All the difference is in regard to the number.

Mr. GORDON. Under the present Constitution a bill can be passed in the House, by thirty-four members; the majority of a quorum. Then if the Governor veto the bill, it will require fifty-one votes to over-rule that veto; a majority of all elected. That makes a gain of seventeen. So it takes seventeen votes to over-rule the veto of the Governor under the present Constitution. But if the provision be amended, in the manner which I have suggested, it will require sixty to pass a bill after being vetoed; an increase of nine only. So that in point of fact, there would not be as much power in the hands of the Governor as under the present Constitution.

Mr. KELSO remarked that if a majority of the members elected, after having been advised by the Governor of the imperfections of a bill, and his objections to it, thought fit to pass it, he was of opinion that they ought to have the right to do so.

Mr. BORDEN observed that he understood the Convention had several times decided upon incorporating in the new Constitution the provision contained in the old instrument upon this subject.

Mr. WOLFE proposed to amend the instructions, by striking out the word "three" and inserting "five."

The motion was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Gordon's amendment, and was not sustained.

The question then recurred upon the motion of the gentleman from Marion (Mr. Morrison) to re-commit the section, with instructions, and the Convention divided thus—ayes 54, noes not counted.

So the section was re-committed, with instructions.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the section in relation to banks.

The PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Pepper) to re-commit.

The question being upon re-committing, with the pending amendment, it was put, and lost.

The question then turned upon the following amendment, which was offered by the gentleman from Franklin.

Mr. BORDEN. If it be now in order, I will move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin.

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. BORDEN moved to amend the amendment, by submitting an article in favor of free banking, providing for banking associations under general laws, prohibiting the passage of laws tolerating the suspension of specie payments, providing for a registry of notes and ample security, for the redemption of the same, the stockholders of such associations to be individually liable for all debts and liabilities of every kind, in case of insolvency the billholders to have the preference, no greater interest than allowed by law to be received, the General Assembly may also pass a law imposing other and further restrictions, provided that no such law providing for a general system of banking shall have any force or effect until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the electors of the State at some general election, and been approved of by a majority of all the votes cast at such election.

Mr. BORDEN stated the object of his amendment to be, to leave it optional with the Legislature to pass any act on this subject as the wishes of their constituents directed. Also, in case the Legislature should pass any act of the kind, to insure its submission to a vote of the people, for their approval or disapproval.

Pending the question, on motion,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day.

The pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. BORDEN to the amendment of Mr. SHOUR.

Mr. OWEN. It is not my purpose to make a deliberative argument at this time on the general subject of banking. Under other circumstances, perhaps, I should have done so; but I believe the Convention will hardly expect it from me at the present moment. I should not have risen at all to say a word on the present occasion but for the purpose of replying to some observations which were made by the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso).

Sir, there may be very excellent and sufficient reasons against what is sometimes called the "system of free banking"—but which, in my opinion, ought not to be so called. If established under proper guards, it ought rather to be called "a restricted or general system of banking." I say there may be good and sufficient objections against such a system, but most assuredly the gentleman from Switzerland did not state them. One of his objections was, that it would not do to have security by United States or State stocks, because the value of such securities is exceedingly fluctuating. He reminded us, truly, that our own bonds had been down to sixteen or twenty cents on the dollar, and inferred that such might be the case again. Now, in my opinion, there is quite as much certainty as there is in anything yet to come—for all things human are more or less uncertain—there is quite as much certainty as there is in anything in prospect before us connected with the action of human beings—that these stocks never will materially depreciate again. As it regards the depreciation of the stocks of the United States that could not happen without a total disruption of this Union, or its severance into two republics—one Northern, and one Southern. Sir, I will not even talk of such a state of things; I pray God that if such a disastrous event should ever happen I may not be here to witness it. [Applause.] I make no calculations for a contingency like that.

Then as to our State stocks, I do sincerely believe, that we have learned—dearly indeed by experience, and experience is the best teacher, though he charges severely for his lessons—such a lesson in regard to public debt that almost all Conventions, meeting as we do, will place in their Constitutions restrictions in regard to public debt similar to that which we have already passed. If they do, the result will be, in all States as in ours, that their securities will appreciate in value; or, at the least, will remain as good as now they are. I say, that looking at this matter as reasonable men, we cannot expect that these securities will materially depreciate. Sir, it is not proposed to take these securities at their full par value, but to take them at their market value—at the value at which in two hours, or at most in twenty-four hours, they can be converted into specie in the markets of Philadelphia or New York, or Boston. Our four per cents, in a few years to be—come fives, are now at 82 or 83. Their present par value to make them equal to sixes would be 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ only. The friends of general banking propose, that all stocks taken as security, shall be, or be made to be, equal to stock bearing six per cent. Then our State stock would be taken at 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ only. At that rate it would not only be as good as specie, but about twenty-three per cent. better. A hundred thousand dollars of our State stock, taken at 66 $\frac{2}{3}$ would be worth a hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars, and could be immediately cashed, so as to bring that amount in specie.

It is for this reason, that these stocks, thus taken, as a basis for bank issues, are a better security than gold and silver.

Again, if we could be certain that gold and silver would always remain in the vaults of a bank ready to meet such demands as might be made upon it, that would be one thing; but all experience in the history of banking tells us, that it is not so; that it is with gold and silver in banking vaults, as it is with the cups and balls of the juggler. You see the ball placed under a cup; "presto, pass!" and the ball is gone. The specie remains in vault during a few hours, or days, or weeks. It is counted; and then there is nothing to prevent its being transferred, the next hour, or the next day, or the next week, to some other bank, there to be counted over again. This is so notorious that I need not farther allude to it here. I say, therefore, in this connection, that I consider these stocks to be far more permanent, absolute, certain security than gold and silver can be as a basis for bank issues.

I am opposed, sir, to a portion of the New York system of banking—to that portion which permits mortgages to be taken on real estate as security. Ultimately, they may be good; immediately they are not good; and to secure the bill holder, it is not sufficient that the security should be good at some time in the future; it must be immediately convertible. I am opposed to any system which is satisfied with any security in banking, except that which can, in one, two, or three days, be converted into specie without sacrifice. Now we know this to be the case with United States stocks, or with any stocks of solvent States. The holder can telegraph to New York or Boston to-day, and tomorrow his stocks can be sold at their market value; at all events by dropping a half per cent. below it.

I am in favor of a system of banking—if banking is to be adopted at all—where there is sufficient attestation of the fact that this bill which a man takes out of his purse and holds in his hand, has, corresponding to it in certain safe vaults, its representative in value. I am in favor of bills being countersigned by the Auditor, and that his counter-signature shall not be placed there until he has in his vaults the value of that piece of paper. I would have no other paper as money but such as bore that attestation. The gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) supposes, and uses it as an argument against this system of security by stocks, that when the unfortunate holder of a note finds that it is not paid, he is to come to the Auditor; the Auditor is to tender to him a thousand dollar bond, and demand the change; and if he cannot make change, how, says the gentleman, is he to have payment for his bill? Cannot the gentleman imagine some better mode of managing than that? Has he so little experience in commercial affairs, as to set up that objection as a bug bear? Of course it would be otherwise arranged. A power of attorney ought to be given to the attesting officer or officers to sell the stocks out whenever he or they shall be informed by the protest of its notes, that a bank has suspended specie payments. I am in favor of that sale being made within ten days. No longer grace would I give to those who send out notes, without the ability to redeem them. But the idea of tendering a man a thousand dollar bond under such circumstances is rather new to me—very surely there is no bank of snow for that buck to be caught in. I think he will get away. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELSO (in his seat.) I guess we will catch you there, before we have done.

Mr. OWEN. All right, if you do; as there may be a temporary and slight depreciation of stocks, resulting from those fluctuations to which the money market must always remain liable, I am in favor of this power of attorney; to be granted to the Auditor of State, containing a clause that it shall be lawful for that officer, if he find the stocks depreciating, to withhold the dividends until they make the stocks good; and I am farther in favor of having these stocks to the full amount, dollar for dollar, before any bank notes are issued. Before notes to the amount, say of one hundred thousand dollars, shall go out of the Auditor's hands, there ought to be, safely locked away in his vault, the value in stocks of the United States, or of this, or other solvent States, of one hundred thousand dollars, over and above this; then there is the necessary specie capital of the bank. But there should be, at the least, this one first security.

I am asked, whether I am in favor of saying that there shall be a general system of banking! I am not. I am in favor of introducing into the Constitution, a clause purely restrictive—not creative—not declaring that there shall be a general system of banking, or any other system of banking. I am in favor of leaving that matter wholly to the Legislature, or, in other words, to the people, who will instruct the legislators as to whether they want a system of banking at all. If they are satisfied to take the bank notes of other States, coming in upon them, as is the case in the State of Illinois, then they will instruct their representatives that there shall be no banks; and in that case, no banks let there be. But if the people decide to have banks, then I desire a set of Constitutional restrictions in advance. I would, then, leave the matter to the Legislature, with certain restrictions. I would make a provision in the Constitution—not a creative, nor yet a negative provision; but simply a restrictive one.

Sir, in regard to the present State Bank, there are some good features about it. The mutual responsibility of the branches is an excellent feature; a feature which has saved the bank, established its reputation, and made its money good. If there is to be a State Bank at all, that feature should be imperative. The chief objection that I have to a State Bank, is, that it is a monopoly; and I do not use this word in the odious sense in which some gentlemen delight to use it, but in the strict, technical sense, only. It is a monopoly; a granting to one class of men, certain privileges and immunities which you do not grant to another class of men, under the same circumstances, and upon the same conditions. It is a violation of that very clause, introduced by the gentlemen from Monroe, (Mr. Read) and which we adopted the other day. Some gentlemen say that that clause has nothing to do with free or State banking. Sir, I say, without hesitation, that when I voted for that clause, I knew well that I was voting for a clause which could not be carried out if we declared that there shall be any monopoly in banking; if we declared that A., B., and C. should be allowed to establish a State Bank, and that E., F. and G., and all the other letters of the alphabet, should be denied the privilege. As being a monopoly, I am opposed to a State Bank.

I am opposed to it for another reason. You cannot make such a charter perpetual; common sense protests against that; it must be subject to renewal. You may make it for five, or ten, or fifty years, but at the expiration of that time, a question comes up, Shall the charter be renewed?

A similar question was once presented to Andrew Jackson, when the United States Bank induced Congress to renew her charter, and the President was asked to approve the renewal. Fortunately for America, her National Bank and her Executive, then stood opposed to each other. Each possessed vast power. That struggle of giants convulsed the nation. Had it been a compromise instead of a struggle; had the President of the United States, with the unbounded popularity he then enjoyed, chosen to combine with the President of the United States Bank, for any sinister object, who shall estimate their united strength? It was the fashion a few years ago, to talk somewhat idly and vaguely about the union of the purse and sword. That would have been such a union, in very earnest. The President—the Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, the source of all executive power and patronage, on the one hand, and on the other, the Bank, wielding a capital of fifty millions, granting accommodations to the amount of a hundred millions; the Great Regulator, the Commercial Ruler, the Mighty Institution, possessing the sinews of war and dispensing or withholding, for the moment, at her nod, plenty and prosperity throughout the land, without distrusting the strength of our form of government, we may devoutly pray, that it may never be tested by the influence of a conjunction so ominous.

Four millions of dollars were paid to the State of Pennsylvania for a charter less valuable than that which was vetoed in 1832. No government upon earth ought to grant to a company of individuals a privilege worth four millions of dollars. While such grants are considered within the province of legislation, political corruption is as certain as the rising of the sun. I have already had occasion to express the opinion, that the power which is inherent to-day in such a sum as four or five millions of dollars, corresponds to that which lodged, five hundred years ago, in a steel-clad army. A legislative body cannot more safely be tempted by the one, than intimidated by the other. You may as well plant men, with arms in their hands, around your State House, besetting its entrance and threatening its inmates, as to place in the path of duty to be trodden by your representatives, a seductive pecuniary temptation amounting to millions of dollars.

Sir, even with such temptation in the way, our National Government happily escaped the threatened danger. What averted it? The personal character of an executive officer. But that system is ill-guarded and indefensible, which relies, for its sole protection against dangers so threatening, upon the personal character of one man.

The temptation, in the case of a proposal to renew the charter of the State Bank of Indiana, is of identical character to that which assailed Andrew Jackson, and is admitted to have corrupted a portion of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The difference is in degree only, not in substance or effect. While our State shares in a banking monopoly of its own creation, what security have we against the recurrence, here at Indianapolis, of scenes, involving a smaller stake, indeed, yet similar in character to those enacted in Washington in 1832?

I shall vote, sir, against every provision that may be introduced here to make imperative the establishment of a State Bank, or the establishment of a general banking system. I shall vote to prohibit the State from being a stockholder in any bank. But I shall vote, also, against any clause positively forbidding a bank with branches, mutually liable for each other. That is a favorite idea in many portions of the State; and to exclude it would endanger the adoption of the Constitution. For that reason, though opposed to it, I am willing to leave it an open question.

But I am not willing to leave the whole subject of banking as an open question, without certain general restrictions thrown around it. Past experience shows that it is not safe to trust to State Legislatures without such restrictions.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to detain the House but a short time upon this question, and the detention shall be very short, for this reason, if for no other: that I do not know a great deal about it. The object of any party in establishing banks, I have no doubt, is for the purpose of making money. Bankers, I repeat, have but one object, and that is to make money by their operations. But, sir, the country has another object. The object on the part of the country I take to be this: that by banking establishments it should be furnished with a convenient medium of circulation—one that is good, and that will answer all the purposes of the community. The country needs banking institutions for the purpose of carrying on its commerce. The commerce of the country, limited as it is, could not well be carried on without banks or a system of credit. Hogs, cattle, wheat, and everything of the kind, have to be purchased, and we have not men of capital, or, at least, men who keep the capital by them, to purchase the produce of the country. They must be purchased on a credit on the part of the purchaser, or the banks must credit him, and give him cash in hand on his bill. This is one object on the part of the country in having banks—that they may obtain credit; to convenience the purchaser, that he may buy up the produce of the country.

Now I hold that a system of free banks will never accomplish this object; that it cannot effect the conveniences of the object of having banks placed at suitable points and distances in the country to enable persons to purchase the produce of the country. But before I undertake to show that this cannot be done under a system of free banking, I wish to notice the argument of the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Bidle).

Sir, we are frequently led into error by the adoption of false principles. The gentleman from Cass says that "money is the standard of value." He says that it is the measure of value as a pint is a measure of water or a bushel a measure of grain. Now I hold that money performs no such office in the country. It is not a standard or measure of value, and can not be. A standard, Mr. President, measures the same amount every day. It is always the same. A pint or a bushel is the same to-morrow that it was yesterday, or has been to-day; but contains no such measurement. It is a representation of value, but not a measure of value, because it may not be the same to-morrow that it is to-day. A hundred dollars in money may buy a hundred bushels of wheat to-day, but not so at another time. It is not, therefore, permanently the standard of anything. Nor can it be so; and we are led into error when we say that it is a measure or standard, instead of being the mere representative.

Let me illustrate: you send a ship load of wheat to England, and they send you a ship load of something back, and the difference in value of the two ship loads is paid in money, so that when we take it as a measure, and take into consideration that money has an intrinsic value that should not be disturbed, we are led into error. Money has an intrinsic value just as wheat and corn have an intrinsic value, and no more. But the gentleman supposes that you might establish a system of banking that would disturb the value. If you increase the currency you disturb the value of gold and silver. Now let us examine this matter: He says that this objection applies to State banks but not to independent banks. Let us look at it a little. The gentleman says it does not apply to independent banks. How does he propose to establish them? He will buy a million of State bonds, for which he pays a million of dollars. That money goes into circulation as it was before. He brings here his million of bonds and issues a million of paper upon their security. Now, when this is applied to his theory, does it not disturb the currency just as a State bank would do under the same circumstances? Most certainly it does. It adds a million to that which is already in circulation, which must have a tendency to cheapen money. If that million which he paid for his State bonds was put out of circulation, then you would not disturb the currency; or, in other words, "the standard of value."

Then the gentleman's theory as applied to his own system is worth nothing. It must fall to the ground in the estimation of any individual who can see an inch before him. So much, then, for the gentleman's theory and his plan that will not disturb the standard of value.

But, Mr. President, we have had a State Bank, and gentlemen say that it is a monopoly. Sir, if I purchase a million of State bonds, and the State permits me on that security to issue a million of notes, by which I draw interest on both, is not that a monopoly? But gentlemen say that the system is free to all. I say that it is the greatest humbug that I have heard of for the last half century. Sir, none but the rich can bank. They say that it is free banking. I ask you where is the farmer or the mechanic that can bank? Then, sir, if the State Bank system is a monopoly, the other is much more a monopoly; and the one has an advantage in this respect over the other.

But, Mr. President, the great object of banks in this country is to enable the farmers to receive cash for their products—that the men who sell their products are not to credit the purchaser, but that the banker should do the crediting business. And how is that? You sell your hogs, or your cattle, or your grain, and you get your cash for them; but strike out of existence your banks, and I ask you where you are to obtain your cash for your produce? Sir, you must then sell your produce on credit; and the whole business of the country must be done upon credit alone.

Now, sir, if you adopt a system of banks throughout the country that cannot be sustained, and you do the very same thing, your business must be done upon credit. Well, Mr. President, you can have banks at different points of the State, but the principle of one should be the principle of all—the mutual liability principle. Had it not been for this principle, your bank at Bedford would have been down long ago. But that principle above all others sustained it, and but for the mutual liability principle, not one bank in the country would have sustained itself. Look at the course of trade and see whether you can sustain these free banks in the State. How does it move? You have commercial points to which your produce is always moving, such, for instance, as Madison. The commerce is moving continually to that great commercial point from which it is shipped to the east. Now I say that your independent banks cannot be sustained in Indiana as they can in New York, for this reason: New York is near the great head of our commerce. They send their money from home to buy your produce, and the distance is a great item in banking, for the further you send your notes away the longer they are in returning, and the more interest you realize. This money is good in the State of Indiana for another reason. You purchase your goods in Philadelphia and New York, and that kind of paper to the merchant who supplies your goods is good to him because he purchases his goods at these great commercial heads, and this money is good just as far as their merchandise is extended through the country. Their money, I say is good, but how is it with your free bank money? Take the money of a little bank here, and I am willing to admit that it will be good and safe in its locality; but how are these banks to sustain themselves in competition with the banks at New Albany, and Indianapolis, and Madison? Here is your produce bought up by your merchants and shipped to New York. Your bankers at these points are enabled by these shipments and the merchants living at the same points, to make the exchanges with the merchant in the east. Your banks furnish them with bills of exchange, but they are not willing to take your bank bills and travel a hundred miles into the interior of the country and ask for bills of exchange there. No, sir, they will go to the banks in the neighborhood of the place where they make their heaviest purchases or shipments, and thus your banks at New Albany, and Madison, and Indianapolis, will be good when your banks in the interior are worth nothing at all, because the banks of the interior cannot send their money a great distance beyond them, and the laws of trade must in the end break up these banks unless they are sustained by the mutual liability principle. Now let me ask why is this? Is it the interest of the banks at Indianapolis, and New Albany, and Madison to sustain these banks? No, sir; their interest is to break them down, because by doing so they will bring to themselves the business of the whole country. Then I say that these banks will sweep down all the little banks, and your chief banking business will be done at the great commercial points, and the rest of the country will have to say "good-bye" to banking. If you make these institutions sustain the banks of the interior then they will be sustained, but in no other way.

But, Mr. President, there is another thing that will operate on this matter very powerfully, against all the banks of the interior. This banking is to be done by men of capital, and you may search the State, from one end to the other, and wherever you find men of large capital, you will as certainly find them in favor of independent banks, and opposed to the mutual liability principle. They wish to bank themselves. Now let a man commence banking, at Indianapolis or Madison, with a capital of two or three millions of dollars, and how are the branches of the interior to sustain themselves? Whenever it is the interest of bankers, having a large capital, to make a "run" on those of smaller capital, they will do so, and will break them down. Then I say, that under this free banking system, the whole banking operations of the country must be done by a few men of large capital, at the great commercial points; and whenever the merchant wants an accommodation, he must go to these points. He cannot be accommodated in the interior of the country. Now, sir, whenever the country tries the experiment, they will find that these things are true; and I am anxious that the Convention should not tie up the question in such a way that the Legislature may not have the power to alter it, at pleasure, whenever the requirements of the country may demand an alteration. I look upon the proposition of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Hamilton,) as being the best thing on the subject, and it is what I should be glad to see adopted. I will read it, for the purpose of showing what is best to be done now.

If we were in New York, I should have no fears; but as we are in Indiana, remote from the great commercial head, we cannot expect our commercial operations should be the same as operations at New York. Here is the proposition:

"The Legislature may authorize the establishment of a new State Bank, with Branches, to go into operation after the expiration of the present Bank charter, under such regulations as may be provided by law; but in no case shall the State be a partner, or have an interest therein, or in any branch, except as may be occasioned by the investment of any trust funds of the State therein, as loans. And the safety of the funds so invested, shall be secured by their preference in payment, in case of insolvency, over the stocks of individuals in the bank."

Now, Mr. President, the words "State Bank" here signify nothing. It is not necessary that it should be a State Bank similar to the one which we have now established. It says that there shall be a bank and branches. It leaves the question entirely open. It does not say what the security shall be, or what it shall not be. It does not say that you shall establish a branch similar to the one you now have, but simply that you may provide that there shall be a branch, and leaving the whole details of it to the Legislature. I tried to get an opportunity of moving this proposition as an amendment to the proposition now before the House, and I trust that we will consider it carefully before we have done with this question. And I repeat again, that we cannot have branches established through this country to enable the commerce of this country to be carried on as we should desire, without the mutual liability principle. That principle cannot be applied to independent banks, but it may be applied in some form to a State Bank; and I must say that it is the most essential principle, in my estimation, when we regard the safety of the billholder and those whose business requires them to use banking facilities.

Mr. PETTIT. I regret, Mr. President, that I am not able to bring more learning to this subject, than I possess. I will, however, give my views upon the subject, such as they are. I have risen, Mr. President, rather to say what I will not do, than what I will do upon this subject; I have risen rather to say what I will not vote for, than what I will vote for. I always listen with great pleasure to the delegate from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) on all subjects on which he may speak, but I must say, that this morning I listened, with unusual pleasure, to his remarks upon this question. He showed the Convention that he had pried deeply into the subject—the whole subject of currency. He directed our attention to its rise, its progress, its fall. All these points alike underwent the powerful scrutiny of his examination. Sir, I was glad to see that gentleman coming round to what I regard as sound views on the subject of currency or banking.

I will not, however, tarry longer to pass encomiums or eulogies on what he said, or on that gentleman's head or heart. His talents and his worth are known to, and I trust appreciated by, every gentleman on this floor.

The subject of banking and currency, Mr. President, is said to be an abstruse one. It is said that it requires a great deal of learning, and that of an especial kind and quality. Now if this be true, I must admit, that of all other subjects, I am the least qualified to discuss or debate this one. It is told to me, that there is an immense amount of financial learning; that, in short, to stamp certain papers and endorse them, and turn them over, and put them in this pigeon hole to-day, and in that one to-morrow, and a third one next week, and to take them from this corner of the vault and put them in that, exhibits a great deal of financial skill and learning, and that it makes money. Now, with all due deference to great financiers, I must be allowed to say that I do not believe anything of the kind. If there be learning in that, I at once confess myself ignorant of the subject, and ought not, therefore, to detain the Convention.

But, sir, I have not risen to say what system of banking I will go for, but to say that I will not go for any system, unless certain provisions and restrictions are adopted, among which are the following:

In the first place, any system of banking, to secure my approval, must be equally open to all, whatever restrictions may be imposed; and wherever there is any restriction to be imposed, let it be imposed upon all alike.

In the second place, the stockholders must be individually liable for all the debts and liabilities of the bank.

In the third place, the State must not be a partner in the bank.

In the fourth place, there must be ample security to the bill-holder.

These four fundamental propositions must be found in any charter or any project that can gain my vote, or my support. Why so? In the first place, I recognize that principle which I have more than once avowed during the session of this Convention, for which I have drawn my political sword, and thrown away the scabbard—which demands that all members of the body politic shall have equal rights and equal privileges. Restrain one, and you must restrain all; set one free, and you must set all free. That system, and no other, can get countenance and support from me. Sir, upon what pretence, at this period of civilization, it can be said that a few men should have political or pecuniary advantages over others, I do not know. I ask for no such advantages. I would spread out the broad platform of equal rights; and I would place all men, and all men's children, upon it, and tell them to scramble for the prize, whether it be money, or honor, or political distinction and preferment.

Then, sir, let me ask, does the State Bank of Indiana occupy this position? Will any State Bank that is proposed to be organized, occupy this position, and leave us all occupying that standing, upon the same basis of equality of rights? Sir, you say to me, a private individual, that I shall not loan my money, but at a certain per centage. Sir, I ought not to have said "my money," or to talk about money at all, for, in God's truth, it is little I have, and when I get it, I never can keep it. [A laugh.] I, sir, have none to loan. But I make the simile. You say that I shall not loan my money, but at six per cent. But you say that a privileged few, whom you arrange into a political corporation, with the power of making all the currency of the State—you say to this one hundred, or six hundred stockholders of the State, out of a million of population—you say to them that their dollar may count to them as two, three, or four dollars. You say to me that I shall not loan my dollar for more than a dollar; and yet you say to these men, that each of them may loan his dollar for three dollars, thereby obtaining eighteen per cent. per annum, while I am not to have more than six cents increase or interest upon my dollar. Now, sir, is there any justice, any equality, any right, in this? Is there the germ here, that we should seek to find, of political equality, when we are moving away the rubbish, to lay anew the political foundations of our Government, on which all may stand, with equal right, and equal power, and equal interest? [Applause.] Sir, so much for that proposition. To gain my support, it must have this proposition in it, in the first place.

Secondly, the stockholders must be liable for all the debts and liabilities of the bank. Why not? Do you say that men may go merchandizing, or farming, or to any other business or avocation of life, and not be liable for their contracts, or for their mishaps, or for their wild and reckless indebtedness? No, sir, no. And here again applies the fundamental principle, that in trade you should not give one man an advantage over another. Why should not all business be carried on according to the dictates of every man's judgment, or of every man's interest? Leave every one free. Leave government to its legitimate duty, and you will find that its sphere of action is contracted indeed. All the duties and liabilities of a government to the individuals composing it, are small, and in a small compass. It consists simply in protecting the weak against the strong—and in giving redress for wanton or accidental injury done. You should say, therefore, to your fellow-citizens: "You are all put upon a par. Go and do the best you can; preach if you please; practice law if you please; make shoes, or tinker, or tailor, or do anything else your fancy chooses; and when you find that one business is no longer desirable, then change it for another, which may suit you better. You are all as free as the air; judge for yourselves, what is best and proper for you to do. Let each man contribute to the State, as much as is necessary to keep up your laws." That is what I would say. You must have men to enact and enforce your laws, and these are all the legitimate subjects for which money should be taken from the pockets of the people.

Now, sir, I protest that the State should not be a stockholder in any such scheme as this, and I object on this principle, that the money of the State is derived from everybody in the State. However unjustifiable it is, it is the money of every man, banker or no banker, though he may be ever so averse to risking his own money; the State comes forward and says: "I will risk it for you," thus driving a man to be a banker whether he will or no. There is no fairness, no justice, no equality in that. I say, let each man bank who will, as I would let every man make shoes or clothes, or follow any other vocation in life. Then, sir, the stockholders must be liable for all the debts and liabilities of the bank. It is but a partnership, like any other partnership; it is no more nor less. It is merely two, or ten, or a hundred, or five hundred men united together, for the purpose of making a currency on which to make a profit, just as they would in vending goods; and for all their contracts I would make each one who would have shared in the profits liable, just as I would make the partners of any other copartnership concern liable for the debts of the establishment. Yes, sir, I would make them each liable for the redemption of all the paper which they may issue.

On this next proposition I may, perhaps, with the indulgence of the Convention, be allowed to tell an anecdote. ["Consent! Consent!"] The State must not be a partner. Now of all the fallacious, and absurd, and ridiculous propositions which I ever heard—and I mean what I say to the fullest extent—is the proposition that there is any propriety in the State undertaking to make money from the people for the benefit of the people. [Great applause.] And that, sir, is the allegation in favor of a State Bank. You say that the State Bank has accumulated a large amount of money. Why, sir, who did they make it from? From the customers of the bank? or in other words, from the people of the State. The State is the people, and the people are the State. Now, to make money from the people for the benefit of the people, is the grossest solecism that I ever heard contended for; and it is only fitly comparable to the anecdote which I once heard of three boys. An aged farmer who was excessively proud of his children, and was always lauding their sharpness and capacity for business and trade, praised in a very particular manner one transaction which occurred between his three sons. It was a very rainy morning, and they could not work out of doors. They went, however, to the barn to attend to their cattle before breakfast, and that being done they went to trading with each other. Well, all the capital they had to trade upon was their jackets, and by way of showing their skill in bargaining they sold and re-sold, and swapped and re-swapped their jackets until each one had gained three dollars profit on his operations, and when all was concluded each had his own jacket. [Laughter and applause.] Now that is precisely the situation of our banking operations; nothing more and nothing less. It is utterly absurd to say that you can sustain this one and skin that one, and rob a third and cheat a fourth, all for the benefit of the same men. [Applause.] There is no truth in it. It is an absurdity, covered with a flimsy gauze, well calculated to deceive and delude; but it does not delude that man who probes this thing to the bottom.

Well, sir, I do not propose to go more fully into the subject of currency. I am satisfied, however, that the plan as detailed by the gentleman from Cass this morning, (Mr. Biddle,) is not only the best, but that it is a safe one; and that it secures to all the same rights, is in the first place the darling object with me. From that ground I cannot be driven; on that ground I will stand alone. I will stand from the opening to the close of this Convention, on that proposition, that all the people of the State should be on a par, that the restriction of one should be the restriction of all, and the liberty of one the liberty of all; and from that position I cannot be moved.

Now, sir, I must notice one proposition that fell from the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) this morning, for whose opinions in matters of law I entertain great respect, and certainly no disrespect to him personally, but I must be allowed to controvert that position; and that is, that we can do nothing with the State Bank; that it must live out its life; that it has vested rights. Sir, I hurl to the winds as trash, all your declarations as to vested rights. There is nothing of it; I pronounce it a fabrication, without a foundation on which to stand. Sir, tell me not of vested rights in a State of freedom where all are equal. Let me say to you that the first and the only one, the one that lies above and below all others, the first that I recognise as a vested right, is the right to have equal laws, equal institutions, equal privileges, and the right to resume these whenever they have been temporarily taken away. The vested right of the people to be equal, is far above and far below all others. It stands as an impenetrable fortress against which the light armed troops of monopoly will dash without effect, and but to be defeated. Demand for your people political and pecuniary rights, and these secure all other rights. Tell to me that the State may make a vested right in a bank! Then, sir, your honorable Senators and Representatives to-day in your legislative halls, may go and continue this charter forever. They may make it perpetual if you please, and then say that it is a vested right. And must it last forever, even though the worm be gnawing at your very vitals? Are all your interests to be prostrated before this mighty dragon? Will you tell me that there is a vested right in the few to cause all the evils which have been so vividly portrayed in this Convention? Have these few all the vested rights and the people none? [Applause.] No, sir; no! This doctrine is neither of the law nor of the gospel. There is no truth in it. There is no vested right but the vested right of the people. Whenever a man is born in this broad land, he has a vested right; and that vested right is, that the laws shall be equal by which his rights are to be secured; that none shall by law be placed above him, either in political or pecuniary advantages. There is the whole doctrine of vested rights; the paramount right of the people, and not the paramount right of the few.

Mr. President, I have not made these remarks with any design to attack the bank, or any other vested rights. I am perfectly willing that that institution should live out and shave out its miserable existence. [Laughter.] Let it go on. I will not undertake to make any bitter attack upon it. I will not undertake to be a prophet or the son of a prophet: but I may be allowed to express my firm conviction that that bank like all others, when it comes to be wound up, will be soul less at any rate. You tell me that that bank has made a large profit; that it has accumulated an immense sinking fund, but I ask gentlemen to point out to me the number of banks or shaving shops, or paper machines, or whatever else you may choose to call them, that have been established in this Union, that have ever wound up and paid out of their stock all their liabilities? How many out of your million of banks, that ever did run out, and divide out their stock as it was put in and redeem their bills? You cannot find one out of five hundred that have ever wound up solvent, nor will you find one in five thousand hereafter. They cannot do it. I will not say that it is the business of this Convention or of the present Legislature to withdraw from the State Bank the capital stock, the saline fund, or the college fund, or the loan fund, or the school fund, all of which have been deposited there, and I trust, for the benefit of the rising generation, that that too will not be absorbed; but I will not say that I have not my misgivings on the subject, for I do expect when seven years more shall come round and the State shall say "pay me back the money I deposited here as capital stock—the million of specie which I deposited," that the bank officer will say first and foremost "Oh, you withdrew your patronage from the bank, and we have to stop; our paper was out largely and it took all the specie to redeem our bills. Now here is an old banking-house or two and a few protested or slow notes; you may have these in place of your specie." "Oh then," says the State officer, "give me back the college fund?" To which the bank replies, "That is all gone, too. And you cannot much regret that for the college is an aristocratic institution which ought to be levelled to the ground." "Well then" says your officer, "if that is gone, do give me the saline fund." And he receives for an answer, "Oh, that is a matter of no consequence, there is plenty of salt coming from the Kanawha and the lakes. There is no necessity for salt." [Laughter.] Then last of all, staring and wild with anxiety in his countenance he says, "For God's sake give me the little pittance that belongs to the rising generation, the money that belongs to the boys and girls; give us that that they may learn to read and write, and know their rights and learn the history of your wrongs and oppressions." And they will answer you, "no, we have sunk that fund on purpose that we might keep them in ignorance, that they might not know how we have wronged them."

Mr. President, I have not got my own individual consent to believe that any system of paper issues will ever be found to be ultimately solvent, or beneficial to any community. It is the baseless fabric of a vision; it is evanescent as the air and though it may apparently be good and available for the time, it will be found to be worthless and good for nothing. I have not therefore got my consent—I have not brought my own judgment to be satisfied with any such system at all. But, sir, I represent a constituency who are confiding, and to do my own will as against theirs, I would not under any circumstances. I am not in the habit of talking of my constituents. I more usually talk about principles, but let me say that the people that I represent are a free banking people. What kind of free banking with restrictions they left me to say; but they said, "go against the State Bank of Indiana. We are willing it should live out its fitful days, whether it should die in peace or be haunted as a murderer." I am willing that it should live out its time, and if proper restrictions could be obtained I would go for a system of free banking by which all the citizens of the State should have the same rights and privileges. It is idle to urge as an objection, that the rich few only will bank. That may be true. You cannot give to all men riches. That is impossible. But leave the door open—leave the road free for all to walk in; and this is all that they ask and all that they can ask. Sir, I do not propose to make all men equal in every respect. If a man has got but one eye, I do not propose to give him another. I do not propose to use the plastic hand of nature and restore the amputated arm. I do not propose to give a man wealth where industry or fortune has not given it to him; but I do propose that all men shall have equal rights and liberty to acquire wealth and happiness and comfort. [Applause.] I will not detain the Convention longer.

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, JAN. 7, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BADGER, a delegate from Putnam county.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The pending question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Allen to the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin.

Mr. MATHER said—

MR. PRESIDENT: Before we proceed with the orders of the day, allow me to call the attention of the Convention to the fact, that one of our most worthy associates is absent from his seat in this Hall this morning, mourning the loss of one on whom his every hope of life or joy on earth seems to have concentrated.

The wife of my colleague, Mr. Beach, died in this city on yesterday, and will be buried to-day at 10½ o'clock.

To those who are really acquainted with my colleague, and know the strong social feelings of his heart, his attachment to his home and his family, I need not say that this event has overwhelmed him with sorrow. And if it is ever right for man to mourn or sorrow, when the will of God is manifested toward him, those of us who know the character of the deceased, and her many noble qualities of mind and heart, feel constrained to acknowledge that our friend mourns not without cause.

Although it might appear to the public to be altogether appropriate for the Convention to adjourn for a few hours upon an occasion like the present; yet, considering the very great length of time we have been engaged here, and knowing, from the quiet and unassuming character of my friend, his dislike to force his grief upon the attention of others, as his friend, I will not ask the Convention to do so.

But as there are quite a number of the delegates, who come from the immediate section of the State where my colleague resides, and design to absent themselves from the Convention for a few hours, for the purpose of attending the funeral services, I will ask for myself and those friends who desire to attend, that, while thus absent, the Convention will not take any vote upon the important question now under consideration.

[Mr. LOCKHART then addressed the Convention. His remarks will appear hereafter.]

Mr. NILES. I rise, at the suggestion of many gentlemen, to move an adjournment until two o'clock, P. M., in consequence of the death of the wife of the Hon. W. Beach, delegate from Elkhart county, in order to allow his friends in the Convention to attend the funeral. It would be out of place here to pass any eulogium upon the deceased; but it strikes me that it would be no more than showing a proper mark of respect for the memory of a worthy woman, and an evidence of sympathy for our friend in his great affliction, to adjourn over until the afternoon.

Mr. N. then moved the adoption of a resolution embodying the sentiments above expressed, which was unanimously adopted;

And then the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the orders of the day.

The pending question being on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. Borden,

Mr. READ of Monroe. I have, Mr. President, for a subject so extensive, but a short speech to make. In the outstart, I wish distinctly to say that I am opposed to any and every system, bearing what name soever it may, which authorizes any man or any set of men to coin paper into dollars, to circulate as the money of the country.

I believe in the words of Mr. Webster, "that of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind, none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money;" and that "this is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field with the sweat of the poor man's brow." I wish these words, so true, and so powerfully said, could be made to ring in the ears of every voter in the State of Indiana.

The scheme of paper credits to circulate as money, is utterly indefensible upon any sound principles of political economy. It is condemned by all experience. It enables the few to fix the value of all property, and to exercise a tyranny over men, which no despot upon the face of the earth, at this day, dares to do. As money is the standard by which we measure value, it is the same as though we should grant to a favored few the power of lengthening or shortening the yard stick at their own discretion, or of changing the weights and measures, which regulate the buying and selling of all the products of the country.

Were the question of paper money a new one, from the sentiments which have already been expressed on this floor, it would find few advocates here. This remark applies just as much to the gentlemen of one political school as to those of the other. But I must here say that because other States adopt and legalize a vicious system, I cannot recognize it as legitimate reasoning, that we must do the same thing in self defense. It was this very process of argument that so long kept up the system of commercial restrictions—the Chinese wall system of commerce—against the common sense and the philosophy of the world. No one defended the system as good in itself. But it was held, that because one nation sinned against the great laws of commercial reciprocity, all nations must do the same thing. This kind of teaching in morality would be in this wise: Honesty is best, provided other men would only be honest, but inasmuch as they will not be, we must be dishonest by way of self defense.

Look at the report of that part of the committee in the Ohio Convention which favors banking. Their argument is, that in Ohio they cannot give up the practice of circulating paper credits as money, because we of Indiana, and other States, will not do the same thing; that it will bring upon them a tide of paper not so good as their own, and which they cannot control. We, in our turn, report exactly the same argument, and in similar words.

According to this reasoning, we can never have any reform. We must forever go on in the same course of error, because others do; and these again must do the same thing from the necessity of following our example.

Banking, as we have it in this country, is an ingenious method of enabling men to live on the money they owe. It is nothing less. Every bank bill is a certificate that somebody is in debt. What is bank borrowing? You go to a bank—you give what? Why, your credit. You get what? Why, the credit of the bank; but with this slight difference, you get no interest upon your bill of credit; but upon their bill of credit you pay, as the case may be, some seven or twelve per cent.

The greatest living political economist well pronounces the system from "beginning to end a compound of quackery and imposture;" and again, "an engine of unmixed evil."

Under this system, with fewer causes of commercial embarrassment than is existing in any other country upon which the sun shines, we have suffered from constantly recurring commercial disasters and revulsions beyond all other countries. More free from scarcity, from general pestilence, from war, than others—almost wholly exempt from these evils, which are elsewhere the causes of commercial embarrassment—we have through the agency of paper money brought down upon ourselves all the results of these frightful scourges and curses of mankind.

McCulloch in his great work, the Commercial Dictionary, says, "that had a committee of clever men been selected to devise a scheme by which the public might be tempted to engage in all manner of absurd projects, and be most easily duped and swindled, we do not know that they could have hit upon anything half so likely to effect their object, as the existing American banking system."

At one time, it fills the country with gambling, speculation, and fraud; at another, with the wrecks of bankruptcy. Now, the delirium of commercial excitement; then, the collapse of prostrated business and ruined credit. So long as we have the system, we must, every ten or twenty years, perhaps oftener, run the same cycle of expansion, contraction, and explosion. The capitalist only is profited. He only, reaps a rich harvest, amidst the wide-spread ruin. The laborer, the man of moderate means, is always the loser. After the great crisis of 1837, in our large cities, laborers, both male and female, begged employment, for their very bread; and that in a land overflowing with plenty. Tell me of the tyranny of the English Edwards, and Henrys, and of other despots, in debasing the coin of the country. We do the same thing, and to a much more ruinous extent, when we permit the debasing of the currency by paper.

The only paper which can be safely tolerated, and which produces no disturbing effects upon the value of property, is bills of exchange, which are founded upon the products of the country, and certificates of deposit, which represent actual specie, and used for business convenience, and to prevent the labor of counting.

The transmission of coin is not needed, to any great extent, even in the largest commerce. The whole is done through the medium of bills of exchange, representing exports and imports. Thus, it has happened in a commerce of two hundred millions, between Great Britain and the United States, that not two millions of specie has passed between the countries; and, perhaps, not even a dollar of that needed in carrying on this commerce.

The gentleman from Vanderburg, (Mr. Lockhart,) in his speech of this morning, referred to the immense products of the Wabash valley, and the banking facilities required in its exportation. This commerce can be carried on, great and increasing as it is, should it even go up to hundreds of millions, as it will in a few years, just in the manner in which all great commercial operations are now carried on. How much does the Indiana State Bank do, in this great work of exporting our products? Just next thing to nothing. The presence or absence of the institution, even now, would no more affect this immense commerce, than the presence or absence of the gnat upon the horn of the ox, would affect the sturdy and quiet old animal.

It is astonishing how little, either of specie or of corporate promises, has to do with the commerce, either internal or foreign, of any country. In England, by an actual examination of the stamps issued at the stamp office, it is ascertained that the business turning upon bills of exchange, is not less than twenty-five hundred millions of dollars, while all the specie and bank bills of the country, are not over twenty per cent. of that sum. In the United States, no one estimates the internal trade done upon bills at less than one thousand millions of dollars; but all the paper money in the country is not over one hundred millions. This shows the fallacy of the argument in favor of paper money, as a business necessity.

In principle, I am wholly opposed to it. It is, as Talleyrand once said, strength in the beginning, but in the end, it is weakness. All wealth is the result of labor, yet, strange enough, the man who does the labor, never has the wealth. In other countries, the direct operation of government takes it from him; in the United States, paper money, more than any other one cause. It has not a single countervailing advantage.

Gold and silver are money, and, say what men will, nothing else is money. Other things may, it is true, be the signs of money, but gold and silver alone are everywhere acknowledged as such, and pass current in all the marts of the civilized world—at New York, at London, at St. Petersburg, and at Canton.

The Constitution of the United States declares, that no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in the payment of debt. Thus the great commercial truth, that gold and silver alone are money, is, in the United States, an axiom of constitutional law. But in practice, no people ever so far departed from this truth.

The voting of this Convention, I suppose, settles the question, that paper credits are still to be issued as money, under the authority of the new Constitution. It now remains, to determine the best and safest guards to incorporate into the Constitution, in order, as far as possible, to prevent the evils of such credits. I will at once say, that I would not adopt any system of banking, as a part of the Constitution. But I would, first of all, forbid the State from becoming a partner in any such system of banking, and then lay down restrictions for the security of the bill-holder.

I am, sir, most happy to find, that so few in this body, advocate the old system of State partnership in banking operations. This is the feature in our present system, which I have chiefly opposed, at home and in this body, and to which I will never give my assent.

My worthy friend from Owen, (Mr. Dobson,) insists that free banking has upon it the smell of salt water. Now, that may be true. I shall not defend free banking. But I will say, there are smells more unhealthy, than that of salt water. Government banking smells of monarchy; and not only that, it sends forth a strong and most offensive odor of public debt. It originates in the creation of a public debt, always. It did so in Indiana. It aids in creating public debt. It has done so in Indiana, and but for the State Bank, our debt would never have been what it is. The Bank of England, the mother of government banking, commenced in a government loan. It helped the government debt onward, until it is now beyond computation. This debt has changed the whole face of society. It has filled that country with palaces and with poor houses. It has divided the people in the following ratio: six paupers to one gentleman. National debt, stimulated and kept up by its convenient mistress, a national bank, has done more to produce this condition of society, than all other causes combined. The union of church and state has not proved so great a curse, as the union of bank and state. The one and the other are monstrous and incestuous unions—contrary to the spirit of a republic—and, so far as I am concerned, as an humble citizen of Indiana, I will, to the last, forbid the banns.

But we are told of the control which the State has over its own bank. Well, sir, the bank is much more likely to control the State than the State the bank. General Jackson, in his farewell address to the American people, on this point well says: "Such an institution will be pregnant with the same evils (yes, he says the same evils) produced by a Bank of the United States, although its sphere of action is more confined, and in the State in which it is chartered the money power will be able to embody its whole strength, and move together with individual force to accomplish any object it may wish to attain." Whether this has proved true in Indiana, I will not undertake to say. The privileges and exemptions which it has from time to time exacted and obtained, sufficiently show its power in controlling legislation.

State banking! What is it? Why it is giving into the hands of a few, money belonging to the whole people, borrowed upon their credit and for which they are responsible, to control and manage, and thereby enabling them and their favorites, so far as the bank funds will permit, to manage and control all the business of the country.

How may this be done, and how is it actually done? You want a loan, say five thousand dollars, for any business operation. You present yourself to the bank, with the very best paper. The first question is, What do you wish to do with the money? If you wish it for an operation competing with a bank director, or a bank favorite, you will be very likely to be quietly refused.

When the banker deals upon his own money, it is his own business. But when he asks me to give him State money to drive me from the field of competition, I will not consent to it. Sir, it is utterly wrong. It can never be reconciled with the principles of justice or of equal rights. We condemn in other forms of governments, the granting of stars and garters and titles of nobility. By a section already adopted, we have forbidden these distinctions. But this is a small matter; it is the merest nothing compared with giving to a few hundred men in Indiana the money of the State, with which to control the business and the property of the State.

The argument of the State becoming a business operator to make money off her own citizens, is not worth a serious refutation. It is simply an absurdity. Besides, it is easy enough to show that however it may be with individuals the State, in the long run, never does make money. The State makes the losses, the individuals concerned make the gains. What has been will be, to the end of time. The man must be blind to all exaerience and deaf to all sound reasoning, who seriously expects the State to make money by engaging in business, either in its sole capacity or as a partner. The thing is too preposterous for serious debate.

But, Mr. President, what are the proper and best safeguards to be applied to whatever system may be adopted?

In addition to individual liability and the control of State officers over all issues, the great source of safety to the country is the requirement of special collateral security, for the redemption in gold and silver of the bills or notes issued; such security not to be in the hands of the banker himself. All securities which he has in his own keeping are nothing. They may be in the vaults to-day and out of them to-night. It is all one as though a man were required to endorse his own note. Such endorsement may be very good, but it is quite useless. The simple object of the security is to make it the interest of the banker at all times to keep on hand specie for the redemption of his paper. The safest security, because always convertible, is Indiana or United States bonds. This is a security, too, which the banker can best give, because while held in pledge it will yield him a dividend. It has still another advantage. The dividend may always be retained, as required in the Ohio banking law, to make good any depreciation in the stocks.

This requisition, upon its very face, bears evidence of safety beyond any banking restriction which has ever been devised. If it fails there is but one step further; and that is, the total destruction of paper money.

But it is objected, your securities will not be sufficient. Then, I ask, is it better to have no securities at all? Suppose, upon this system, a bank does fail—a thing which will not often occur, because it has no interest to fail—there is, in the first place, all the capital of the bank, which is in its own control; and there is, besides, the collateral security, which is under the control of a State officer.

Another objection is, that it will require too much capital to bank in this way. Undoubtedly it will require capital, and more of it than upon any other plan. This is admitted by all who understand the system.

But the very evil heretofore has been, that men without capital have attempted to bank, have exploded, and thrown the losses upon the public. It is objected, first, that the security is too little, then that it is too much. Objections beautifully consistent, and as profound as consistent! But if the requisition of security in stocks of dollar for dollar is not deemed sufficient, counting the stocks at their market value, but not above par, ten per centum beyond that amount may be required. This has been proposed in other States, in order to make "assurance doubly sure;" and it is said that such requisition would not prevent banking.

If any man proposes to bank upon credits, whether State or United States, I say at once, it will never do. I favor no such scheme. But if, in addition to the capital which under the existing system the banker is required to have, he must superadd his own personal liability and a collateral security not in his own hands, how, in the name of common sense, does this make the bank less secure, so far as the billholder is concerned, than he would be without these securities.

Unless there are securities in other hands than his own, all rules laid down by the Legislature, such as requiring a certain proportion of specie to the issue, are utterly futile, deceptive, and good for nothing. The rules may be very wise and necessary, but it is for the bank to observe them or not, just at its own discretion.

But, sir, I must step aside from my purpose to make my respects to my friend from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Lockhart,) and to assure him, that I do not give up the principle of the taxability of State or United States bonds. The question of equal assessment and equal taxation, I trust will not be given up. The subject is now in the hands of a committee. The people of Indiana demand equality in the burdens they must bear in supporting Government.

But since the allusion of the gentleman, I must say to him, that I hold, that moneys on hand may be taxed—that moneys loaned to individuals may be taxed, and that no less, moneys loaned to governments may be taxed.

I hold that it is not nor ever was the law, that a man may withdraw his property from taxation, by investing it in stock of any kind. In the case of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland, Chief Justice Marshall says, as to the bank stock belonging to its own citizens, "it still continues liable to taxation, as a portion of their individual property, in common with all other private property in the State." Money of an individual invested in United States stocks is surely "private" property. But the case always referred to on this subject, is the Charleston city case. The city taxed the United States stocks—a majority of the Supreme Court held that the tax was unconstitutional, as being a tax levied "upon the contract subsisting between the government and the individual. Had the interest of the citizen in the bonds been taxed, or his income derived from them, the implication of this very decision is in favor of the power. It is not, however, my purpose to argue this point, but to re-affirm my opinion, that not only is it not justice, but not law, that there can be in our midst a privileged class, living in affluence and enjoying all the benefits of government, and yet escaping all its burdens.

But, Mr. President, to return to my subject: I will support no system of banking, as a system, whether State or free. I will support principles and restrictions only, without which no system, with my consent, shall exist. I will never vote, that the Legislature shall create banks of any sort or description. I will vote that they shall not create them unless coupled with certain restrictions and liabilities, leaving the power, under such restrictions and liabilities, in the Legislature, to be exercised or not, according to the will of the people.

Sir, the following three propositions relating to this subject, have for many years constituted a part of the proposed creed of one of the great political parties of the State of Indiana, (the democratic party,) and have conspicuously adorned the columns of the newspapers under their control in every part of the State. It appears to me, that they are principles worth something more than "to point a moral, or adorn a tale;" or even to form a heading for a newspaper, or secure votes to a party. I think they have a definite meaning, which ought to be carried out in practice. These principles are:

1. "No connection between the Government and banks.
2. "A gradual return from a paper system.
3. "No grant of exclusive charter and privileges by special legislation to banks."

I shall, sir, favor those restrictions, which in my opinion will the most certainly secure these principles, and at length bring the country to the true commercial and constitutional medium of exchange. By the general adoption of a species of securities which will gradually disappear, this object will be accomplished, and banking will be restored to its legitimate sphere, which is not the emitting and circulation of bills of credit.

Were I to consult my individual views only, I should first and last, in the beginning and end, under all circumstances, without compromise or concession, record my vote as I do my opinions, against the whole paper credit scheme of money, under any form or restrictions.

These, sir, are my sentiments in the abstract and in the concrete, and the same which I maintained before I was a candidate, and such as I have endeavored to maintain as a delegate in this body.

Mr. FOSTER said—

MR. PRESIDENT: The subject under consideration is one of much importance; and it depends upon the action of the Convention in relation to this question, whether it will be for the weal or the woe of the people of the State. I know that it is somewhat irksome to listen to an individual recapitulating the same arguments that have been heretofore used, and, perhaps, much better used, by other gentlemen; but, as Elihu said to the three friends of Job, I also wish to give my opinion; and, although I may coincide with several gentlemen who have gone before me in the result at which they have arrived, my illustrations may be somewhat different from theirs.

I was much pleased the other day with the remarks of the gentleman from Montgomery (Mr. Carter). I may be allowed to say that I coincided with him in the drift of his observations; but, when the vote came to be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wells, (Mr. Bascom,) I must confess that I was somewhat startled—though not for the first time in my life—to see how far a man's practice would differ from his theory; for what he asserted in one breath, he voted against with the next.

Sir, I will not undertake, like the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) to go into a philosophical investigation of this question, nor, like the gentleman from Switzerland, (Mr. Kelso,) into a statistical argument; but I intend to make a few brief remarks, in compliance with a duty which I owe to myself and to my constituents; and I am sorry that my respected colleague and myself differ so much on this matter. It is true, as he has said, that, during the campaign, when canvassing for a seat in this Convention, that he did avow his principles in favor of free banking, just as I did, in the alternative of bank or no bank, in favor of State banking; but I undertake to say that, while a considerable minority of the people of Monroe are opposed to all banking, and but a small minority in favor of free banking, a large majority of the people of that county are decidedly in favor of a State Bank in contradistinction to any other. [Great applause.] And, Mr. President, I will state further, that those in my county who are opposed to all banks would, in the alternative, prefer a State Bank to a free banking system. Sir, I am well acquainted with the people of that county. I have resided among them for more than twenty years; and I think I may say, without egotism, that I am better acquainted with the sentiments, the resources, the wants, and the wishes of the people of that county than my colleague; for I am in more daily intercourse with them than he is, and that, perhaps, necessarily arises from the difference of our avocations in life. [A voice—"At him again."'] I am happy to find, Mr. President, that, like myself, he is opposed to all banking in the abstract. Now, sir, it will be remembered that, at an early period of the session of this Convention, that gentleman read us the farewell message of General Jackson. He has given us a second reading of it to-day, and I now move that it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on to-morrow [Great applause and laughter.]

Permit me now to pay my respects to the two very eloquent gentlemen from Tippecanoe and Posey. I must confess that I was utterly astonished at the demonstration which they made. The gentleman from Tippecanoe raved like the wild bull of Basham. Yes, sir; and I must say that, when I see men of such talent as the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and men of such high aspirations as, the gentleman from Posey, I was utterly astonished to discover that, in all they had to say, there was nothing but declamation. They reminded me very forcibly of an incident that occurred some years ago. A very honest Dutchman was invited to a party by a neighbor who moved in a little higher circle than that in which he was accustomed to move. He determined to accept the invitation, and thought he would conduct himself with great propriety. He said to himself that, when we would go to the door, he would knock very politely, and inquire: Is the Colonel at home? That he would then pay his respects to the lady of the house; and, once obtaining admission, he would pay particular respects to the young ladies. Well, he had all this in his mind, was perfectly prepared to conduct himself with great propriety, dressed himself in his best clothes, went to his neighbor's house, knocked at the door, and, by some unfortunate accident, had forgotten all his previous arrangements; and all that he could say when his knock was answered was, "Who keeps the house?" [Laughter and applause.] So it is with the two gentlemen from Tippecanoe and Posey. After all their declamation, it just amounts to this: "Who keeps the house?" [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, we have been favored with a relation of the history of banking in this country; and in the remarks made by gentlemen disparaging allusions were made to the continental money which was used during the war of independence. Much as it is to be regretted that that money was bought up by speculators, and that the real advancers received but little in return, let me say to gentlemen that that money fed and clothed our hungry and naked soldiers, and that in all probability, but for that money, we should yet have been under the British yoke. [Applause.]

Now, in the establishment of the United States Bank we all know that that was a solvent institution, that it was founded upon the credit of the Government, and that, although it was a monopoly, it yet afforded vast commercial facilities. But the difficulty was this—it had not a sufficient basis; it was founded not merely upon the credit of the Government, but the Government had not sufficient stock in the institution to control it, for it only owned one-fifth, amounting to seven millions, while private individuals owned the balance amounting to twenty-eight millions.

The private stock-holders had the control of the institution to all intents and purposes. Had it been under the control of the United States, had Congress been able to control it in the same manner in which our Legislature controls the State Bank of Indiana, there is no doubt that that Bank would have been in existence to this day. But, sir, that institution—or rather I should say the directors of that institution—treated the Government with contempt and disrespect. The Government Directors had no voice in its management; and if they even ventured to express an opinion as to what was proper to be done in regard to the interests of the Government, they were not only disregarded, but hooted down. We all know the persecutions to which Mr. Whitney, one of the directors, was subjected, because he acted the part of an honest man.

Now what was the fault of that Bank? It was not merely a bank of discount and deposit; it was not merely a dealer in bills of exchange, but it entered the arena of commerce; and that was the first reason of its downfall—because it embarked in speculations which were not germane to the interests of the institution.

But, sir, even an institution of that kind, is, in my opinion, infinitely superior to your independent banking establishments. No doubt gentlemen recollect that some thirty years ago, no less than forty-three banks were manufactured in Kentucky; and that, at the expiration of one year, only three of them were in existence. It is true that there was a commercial crisis, and no doubt that helped to hasten their downfall; but it is equally true that that crisis was brought about by speculators and scoundrels. Well, sir, the most amusing thing that I know of in the way of banking, is this: We used to estimate the value of paper by gold and silver; but some years ago they established a different principle, making paper the standard; and under that standard the Spanish dollar varied from one hundred and one to an hundred and five per cent.—paper being the standard and the precious metals bringing a premium. Thus, a paper dollar was at par, while the specie dollar was above par, when indeed and in truth, the paper was at a discount. This was certainly an anomaly—such as I hope we are not soon to see again.

But, sir, I am a little astonished at the course which some gentlemen have taken on this question; and inasmuch as politics have been heretofore adverted to, I may be permitted to allude to them. And I must say that when I see a number of whigs on this floor, advocating the free banking system, I am inclined to put my own construction upon the course which they thus pursued. I know that they were always in favor of a National Bank, although they deprecated the idea during the Harrison canvass. Well, sir, they now repudiated a National Bank, just as they have repudiated a great many other doctrines which they could not stand by, and which the people have long ago repudiated; and now they wish to appear a little more democratic than their neighbors; and as a last resort, as a last plank to cling to, when the ship has gone into pieces, they wish to establish a free banking system. And let me say this is for political effect—that it is to revolutionize the State; that while they now forget to talk of the United States Bank, and a protective tariff, they will cling to this free banking system and make it a party question throughout the State; thus endeavoring by this means to ride into office and obtain the government of the State if they possibly can. [A voice—"But they can't do it."] While then, I am opposed in the general to all banks whatever, I am perfectly willing to admit that it is necessary that we should have banks of some character. Had we no banks, the State would be inundated with the paper of Kentucky, and Ohio, and other States; and how easy would it be for an individual in any of those States under the free banking system, to borrow fifty or an hundred thousand dollars and come into our State, and purchase our hogs, and cattle, and mules, and grain, and leave us their rag money in payment, hardly escaping with our surplus produce beyond the borders of the State, before this money is discovered to be perfectly worthless. Now, sir, this would never happen from any institution under our own control. With a banking institution established here we would at all times be able to understand its condition. We would know nothing of the banks in Kentucky, and Ohio, or elsewhere, and we would not, consequently, be at their mercy. Sir, that is one strong reason with me why we ought to establish a bank of some kind, so as to keep out of circulation the money of other States.

But it is contended that all banks are monopolies. I have no hesitation, Mr. President, in admitting that they are all monopolies—whether they are State Banks, or free banks, or independent banks; and I am disposed to say that if there should be any monopoly in the State, in the shape of banking, it should be in the hands and under the control of the State, and not in the hands of speculators. Banking, when well conducted, is known to be profitable. I heard a friend of mine say that last year, when in Ohio, the directors of banks hardly knew what to do with their dividends. They had to increase the salaries of their cashiers, and other officers, and even when that was done, they were able to share a dividend of twenty-five per cent. upon their stock. Now, if banking is profitable, I want the profits to go into the coffers of the State. If the profit is made from the people, as was boasting said yesterday by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) let that profit go into the State Treasury, and return again to the people. Let it be applied to the liquidation of our State debt; let it pay the expenditure of the government, or let it go to the education of the rising generation. If, on the other hand, you establish free banking all over the State, all the profit that will accrue will go into the hands of a board of speculators, united together for the purpose of fleecing the community.

Mr. President, I have been somewhat astonished to discover that most of the gentlemen of the bar, on the floor of this Convention, have advocated a system of free banking, in opposition to a State Bank. Now, sir, I think it would be quite as well, if those gentlemen would take the beam out of their own eye before they attempt to take the mote out of the eye of their neighbor. I have not heard the first gentleman on this floor make a proposition that the practice of the law should be open, and free to all. Not one of them, Mr. President, has made any such proposition. They talk of monopolies, and they yet sustain a monopoly among themselves. Every man may preach who chooses. Every man may practice medicine if he chooses; but no man may practice law unless he has undergone an examination for the purpose, and obtained a license; a license that may be procured, whether the requisite talents are there are not. A license is to be obtained; and no matter whether the applicant has one or five ideas above an oyster, if he comply with certain forms, he can be permitted to share in the monopoly of the bar.

Mr. NILES. I believe there is no gentleman of the bar on this floor, who is not perfectly willing to meet the gentleman from Monroe and abolish all exclusive privileges to lawyers.

Mr. FOSTER. All that may be very true, Mr. President, but I should like to see it carried out in practice, and my allusion has only made the gentleman wince.

"The flesh will quiver where the pincers tear—
The blood will flow where the knife is drawn."

(Applause.) Sir, it is known that all the learned professions are open except the profession of the law; and I have seen an individual, notwithstanding the provision in the old court, and the Constitution of the United States, forbidden to plead his own case in a court of justice. Sir, the course of the gentlemen remind me of a circumstance that occurred in Virginia, an anecdote which, with the consent of the Convention, I will relate. [Cries of "go ahead," and "let's have it."] There was in that State a celebrated preacher by the name of Weems; a man whose name will long be remembered; who wrote a life of Gen. Washington, of Franklin, and of Marion, and, perhaps, has done more than many voluminous writers, for instilling a love of country and patriotism in the minds of the youth of our beloved country. He had obtained considerable notoriety, and, as is often the case with men of his class, he was not unfrequently subjected to impertinent arrogances. One day, as he was approaching the court house, at Goochland, a lawyer, in company with others of his fraternity, standing on the steps of that building, observed, "Here is parson Weems coming; we will have some sport." The parson approached the court house, and was accosted by Mr. Morris, after the compliments of the day, as follows: "Mr. Weems, a curious circumstance occurred this morning, which I must relate to you. As I was coming to court, passing a creek, I saw a man fishing. I asked him, in a very genteel way, what he was fishing for? 'The devil,' was his reply. Aye, said I, do you get any bites!—do you get any nibbles? 'Yes,' said he, 'nibbles and bites both; but I can't catch him.' Well, said I, what are you bated with? 'Only a parson,' was the answer." "Well," said Mr. Weems, "I, too, passed a brook this morning, and saw a man fishing." I inquired of him what he was fishing for? He answered he 'was fishing for the devil.' The devil you are, said I; do you get any bites? 'No,' said he. Do you get any nibbles? 'No,' was the answer. What are you bated with? 'A lawyer,' said he. How do you account for your want of success? 'Why,' was the very significant answer, 'because Dog wont eat Dog.'" [Great laughter and applause.] Thus it is, Mr. President, that while the gentlemen of the bar, with an exuberance of patriotism, go against all monopolies, they still take good care to keep up their own. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, what is this celebrated free banking system? It is admitted, on all hands, that the course pursued in the State of New York is this: An individual, or a company, who wishes to commence banking, goes and purchases United States, or State Stocks, and deposits them with the Auditor, or Comptroller. The officer then issues bank paper to the same amount as the stock deposited. This is only as collateral security, and there need not be a single dollar of specie deposited as a basis, for the redemption of this banking paper. It is well known, sir, that money men are foolish enough to believe that bank stocks, or State stocks, are far superior, as a security, to specie. Mr. President, I cannot coincide with such an opinion. We all know that stocks are liable to a great deal of change. Sometimes they are appreciated, at other times they are depreciated. They may be at par to-day, and below par to-morrow. They are nothing like a true standard of value. A company of men may deposit a hundred thousand dollars of State stock to-day, and in less than three months that hundred thousand dollars may not be worth fifty thousand dollars. But when you deposit specie—the gold and silver—in the vaults of the banks, it is there; and it is unchangeable. It speaks for itself. It is not liable to the mutations which are brought about by the falls and the fears of the stock exchange. Then, to establish a free banking system in this State, it occurs to me, would be nothing more than to establish a corporation of monopolies.

My respected colleague intimated to this Convention, that when he was canvassing for a seat on this floor, he hardly heard a single voice raised in favor of State Bank. Let me tell that gentleman that I advocated a State Bank, and that if I had the power, the State should be the only stockholder, and that all the profits realized by banking should go to the State Treasury, and lessen the amount of the people's taxes.

But it is said you cannot have a State Bank unless one-half of the stock be held by individuals; because they understand banking better than your State officers. All I have to say in reply to that is, that if you make your defalcation an act of felony there will not be so many stealings in future as there have been heretofore; and I have no doubt that under such a resolution you might have a good banking system under the control of your own officers, having rash penalties annexed.

But it is said the only legitimate way to bank is by means of bills of exchange. Now men are known to fail in the commercial world, and it is very doubtful whether your free banks could establish a correspondence in London, or at Amsterdam, or Berlin, or Copenhagen, or Petersburg. And under these circumstances they could not enter largely into commercial transactions unless they were in partnership with some well known house in New York, or Philadelphia, or some of the eastern cities. And you will find that the paper issued by individuals under a free banking system established in this State, would not probably, go further, than the county in which it was issued. You may go to Louisville or Cincinnati, and with such paper as would be issued under that system you would not be able to purchase goods except at an enormous discount; and the discount would be much greater were you to take that paper to eastern cities. The whole result then would be, that we would have in the State nothing but a batch of "shin plasters." These, of course would be of no service so far as commerce is concerned. They would not answer the purposes either of banking or of commerce. On the other hand, if we establish State Banking, let me tell gentlemen that the credit of the government will give to such a bank its solidity, and if part of the resources of Indiana are embarked in a State Bank the implied faith of the State will have more effect in making such a currency good and receivable in other States, than all the free banking systems that you can adopt.

As I remarked in the outset, I merely rose for the purpose of giving my opinion. When the question was presented here of "bank or no bank?" I voted "no bank;" but I shall hereafter vote for a State Bank with proper restrictions and modifications in contradistinction to the free banking system. I wish it to be understood that I would desire that the present State Bank should be wound up whenever the term of its Charter expires. It is well known that you cannot make them wind up their business before that time. They have vested rights; and I believe in them, the opinion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe [Mr. Pettit] to the contrary notwithstanding. And while that bank is winding up let us be making preparations to establish another bank, throwing around it proper restrictions; and above all that the note holders under all circumstances shall have preference in payment. I care not how coercive your restrictions may be; I go for the restrictions, and by no means for the free banking system, under any circumstances.

[Mr. HENDRICKS next addressed the Convention for upwards of an hour. His remarks will appear hereafter.]

MR. CHAPMAN. I have no desire to make speeches upon this or any other subject, but I cannot resist the impulse which I feel, to expose the errors of some gentlemen, in relation to the position occupied by the friends of Bank reform, as I understand it. Almost every thing thus far said by the friends of the State Bank, has been grossly erroneous, so far as the New York system is concerned, and I have before me unquestionable authority to sustain my assertion. I mean, sir, the volume of statistics from the Secretary of the United States Treasury, relative to the condition of all the banks in the Union, which was published by order of the present Congress, and copies of which are in the possession of many members of this Convention, as well as myself. It is to me a matter of surprise, when gentlemen have at hand an authentic document like this, that they will persist in denunciations without the slightest foundation, in fact, to back them. If they do not altogether misrepresent, this testimony conclusively shows that they totally misapprehend the real history of the New York system.

Among other statements equally erroneous, it has been said that thirty-one out of the one hundred and four free banks, so called, had proved total failures, and that all the rest were likely to meet the same fate, and thus demonstrate the rottenness of the system. Now, I will prove the utter fallacy of these statements by reading two short extracts from the document. The first is from the official report of the Comptroller of New York, under the date of December 30, 1848. He says:

"Since the passage of the general banking law, thirty-one of the free banks have been closed by the Comptroller, whose aggregate circulation at the time of the failure was, - - - -	$1,417,545 00
Am't redeemed by the Comptroller, - - - -	1,357,424 00

Leaving the outstanding circulation, including $4,069 of Atlas bank certificates, - 60,121 00"

The Comptroller who made this statement, was no other than Millard Fillmore, now the President of the United States. However I may regard his political sentiments, I place some reliance upon his official statement of facts. Other gentlemen of this Convention will not readily question his veracity.

But for further illustration, I will read from the report of the Comptroller of a subsequent year, dated January 2, 1850. Speaking of these same thirty-one failures, Washington Hunt, the successor of Fillmore, says:

"Since the passage of the law, (General Banking, passed 1838,) thirty-one have failed, and were closed by a sale of the securities pledged with the Comptroller. In most of these cases, the proceeds of the securities were insufficient to redeem the entire circulation; therefore a pro rata dividend was paid to the bill holders, and certificates issued for the balance, payable out of any additional means which the banks may have possessed. But in every instance, a small portion of the circulating notes are still outstanding. The presumption is that they are mostly lost, and will never be presented. The question is, what shall be done with the funds remaining in the Comptroller's hands for their redemption? The amount thus held is $32,819 79, belonging to thirty banks; and as a majority of the failures occurred almost ten years ago, there is no probability that this balance will be called for by the bill holders."

I might read many other extracts, demonstrating the superiority of the security system of New York, over any other ever adopted in this country; but I will merely invite gentlemen to read and examine for themselves. They will find evidence enough in this document alone, not only to disprove and overturn their assaults, but also to show conclusively the great superiority and safety of that system over our own.

The majority of the failures, of the New York banks, under the new system, took place "ten years ago," says the Comptroller. Have gentlemen all forgotten that all the banks in Indiana were insolvent at the same time? I am aware how easy it is for a majority of the people to forget such events, but I have a vivid recollection of this one, for I took an active part in rousing the public mind to the necessity of forcing a resumption, notwithstanding the friends of the banks generally, declared it would be ruinous to make the attempt. The State Bank and branches remained thus suspended for more than four years, shaving the people at the rate of from 5 to 15 per cent. on exchange, and until enough had been thus speculated from the people to enable the banks to resume. Even at the last, it took the hardest kind of legislative screwing to force a resumption, and the act requiring it was passed in the face and eyes of the report of the then President of the Bank, who protested that a resumption of payment would be ruinous to all concerned.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish my position to be misunderstood. I am personally hostile to all systems of paper-money banking, such as have heretofore existed in this country. I do not believe in the necessity or propriety of making every bank a manufactory of paper money: and in this feature I have long conceived lies the chief evil of American Banking. No other country tolerates such a monstrosity, nor is it in any degree requisite to the business of legitimate banking, which is merely the borrowing and loaning of credit, and transactions in exchange. Take away the privilege of making paper currency, and you might very safely permit the banking business to be just as free to every man, as any other business whatever.

But the friends of the State Bank system not only adhere to this evil in its worst shape; they go further. They seem to believe in the doctrine of Bank and State, quite as firmly as any people heretofore have in that of Church and State. We are in the habit of saying that governments should be divided into three departments, but we, in fact, have a fourth, and it is the most powerful and privileged of all. Some gentlemen seem to reverence it as much as ever did zealous devotee a Church Establishment. Without a State Bank department, they think we can have no good paper money, and they are as sincere as those who believe that there can be no religion without an "established church" and "no church without a bishop." I doubt, sir, whether such gentlemen have yet ascertained whether or no "saltpetre will explode."

Yes, sir, we have not only a regular bank department, under our present Constitution, but we have by law, irrevocable by the General Assembly, clothed it with the most important powers of legislation, affecting the currency, and credit, and property of every citizen. Some gentleman has objected to the term "bank parlor," as mere slang. Let those who thus regard it, go the elegant chamber of the State Bank, if they can obtain permission, and they will not only see cause to change their opinion in that particular, but they will have the gratification of seeing the legislative hall of the Bank. They will not find it as wretched a place as that in which the representatives of the people meet. In the well-appointed hall of the Bank, periodically assemble its representatives, and in secret conclave, pass laws relative to credit and currency, according to their sovereign will and pleasure. But its power of positive legislation is no greater than its negative. Gentlemen express the greatest fear and alarm at the very limited veto which we give to the Governor, who is elected by and is responsible to the people. But they have not a word of objection to the power which the Bank possesses by its charter—that of an unqualified, unrestricted, unequivocal, and imperative “vested right” to veto any act of the General Assembly relative to the Bank. It possesses this monstrous power, and may exercise it any time, without responsibility to any body! And all this, in addition to that influence which associated wealth always can easily exercise over legislation generally. No act of the General Assembly, concerning the bank, can be passed without its assent; and I have never known an act defeated which it desired to be passed. This alone would determine my vote against the perpetuation of such a system.

But another objection is that State Banking depends upon State borrowing and State debt. This is admitted by its advocates. They admit that the people would never submit to a tax to raise necessary capital, for the benefit of those who might be entrusted with its management. The capital for any future bank must be borrowed, as it was borrowed for the present bank. That was really the commencement of the State debt which has crushed and disgraced the people of this State. The Bank debt led us into the debt for “Internal Improvement.” All our subsequent follies, in my opinion, may be traced back to that original error.

We are told of the “profits” of the system of State banking. But I maintain that the State has not made a cent by it, even if we disregard what I have just alluded to. The old State Bank which preceded this was a total failure, though it is now almost forgotten. Under the present system, we lost a million of dollars of bonds sold to the Morris Canal and Banking Company—we lost some eight hundred thousand dollars, by the attempt of the bank to bolster up the Internal Improvement system in its last throes—the school fund has been encroached upon to expand the dividends of weak branches—the people were shaved out of thousands by the suspension of 1838 to 1843; and I have not a doubt that ultimately every dollar of the State capital will be sunk.

I admit that the Bank has been comparatively “well managed” for the last seven years, and has acquired general confidence. But this has nothing to do with the “system.” The experience of other States as well as this in time past, proves the system to be wrong. So disastrously has it worked, that six States by their Constitutions prohibit banking altogether—Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri, (in her Constitution of 1846,) Mississippi, and Louisiana, with her great city of New Orleans, which perhaps does as much mercantile business as our whole State. This experience, and these results, are certainly worthy some attention.

As to the “economy” of the system, take the single item of salaries. They amount to $30,000 a year for bank officers alone, I believe—to say nothing of banking houses and other items—about half the expense of the State government proper. This is pretty good pay for handling the million of capital belonging to the State. I will agree to do it for a quarter of the $30,000, and honestly, too, notwithstanding the sneers of gentlemen in its interest on this floor.

But I oppose the system for another reason—its liability to affect or be affected by political considerations. The whigs sustained and justified its first suspension because its management was in the hands of their partizans, and thus delayed resumption. The same thing might happen under democratic ascendancy. And unquestionably it will always be the case, that the influence of the Bank will be used in favor of that party which is most willing to sustain it. As to its effect upon the common business interests of the community, whether its managers be bad or good, I have no doubt that the principle of competition must ever be superior to that of monopoly.

The mutual liability of the branches for each other's debts, I admit is a good feature—the best of the whole concern. But this was borrowed from the New York safety fund system, with this difference in favor of that system that the fund was taxed against the banks and was put into the custody of a State officer, instead of being kept by the banks themselves, as is the case with our State Bank. But though this is a good check on the operations of the branches, it is of but little use, under our system, to the bill holder; for when a “crisis” comes, it will be surrendered on the plea of the “public interest,” as the last suspension proves.

The creation of a currency is a sovereign attribute, and if we delegate such a power to any body of men, we should exact the most ample security against the abuse of that power. I will vote for such security, and as much of it, as any other man will do—dollar for dollar, and more if I can get it. This much has been accomplished by the new system of New York. That requires collateral security to the full amount of bills issued, for their redemption in specie, and in addition to this, holds each stockholder individually liable to the amount of his stock. And yet gentlemen express alarm at its insecurity, and suggest that it will fail under some imaginary contingency. It weathered the storm created by the operations of the United States Bank, while all our banks failed; yet possibly an earthquake might trip it up. It would not take half an earthquake to trip up our State Bank again. [Laughter.]

With the exception of the mutual liability feature, borrowed from the New York safety fund system, our State Bank is but a miniature edition of the United States Bank. As long as it enjoys the credit and the capital of the State, and a monopoly of business, it will flourish. Deprived of these advantages, it could not exist. Even with these, a great deal depends on its management, and this may be good or bad, according to accidents.

The general system, similar to that of New York, which is proposed by one party on this floor, is vastly superior in every respect. It affords ample security to the bill holders, which is placed in possession of an officer of State; it admits of competition, that best regulator of all business, to every necessary extent; and it is always subject to the control of the Legislature. But some gentlemen object to this system, because they say it is new and untried. If they will examine the documents and laws, they will find it has existed twelve years. Our own system has existed but sixteen, which is only four years longer, and those additional years were less than the limit of its suspension. So they do not gain much on that point. In addition to features above named, there is in the New York system, personal liability of the stockholders to the amount of their shares, which in effect is two for one, besides the amount of specie which every bank must necessarily keep on hand for the prompt redemption of bills.

But other gentlemen object to the system, for fear of its influence upon the Legislature. Here again it is infinitely superior to our system. It is directly the interest of banks under the general security system, not only not to ask favors for themselves, but those first established, are, on the contrary, directly interested in exercising whatever legislative influence they may possess, to induce the Legislature to exact still better securities from all who come after them, so as to shut out competition as much as they can. There is anything but danger to the community in an influence thus directed. Perhaps as a means of safety, it is equal to any thing that could be exacted by law.

But, sir, it was not my intention to enter into a defense of any system, in detail. In my view, it is not necessary for us to adopt any one in particular. It is enough for us to impose such restrictions as will secure the people against loss. I presume some system or other will be adopted, and it has long been my opinion that whatever kind it may be, we should make it subservient to a settlement of our State debt. This is the great reason why I favor a general system similar to that of New York, which has worked so well during the last ten years. The only way in which we can expect soon to bring home our State bonds, is by some such process as this. It is out of the question to think of raising money by taxation for such a purpose. But if we create a business necessity for them, they will gradually return without difficulty. This demand can be created by requiring them, not as a basis, but as collateral security in the business of banking. We can then by law levy a tax upon the banking privilege, for the liquidation of the interest on the State debt, and ultimately for an ample school fund.

Gentlemen who favor the State Bank object to this proposition, because they say it will raise the value of the bonds; and because the interest upon them will have to be paid to foreigners. It seems to me the futility of all such objections is self-evident. All must admit, that sometime or other, we must pay these bonds dollar for dollar, and the annual interest. The sooner we can get them home, the sooner shall we cease to pay the interest abroad. They would gradually become the property of our own citizens, and the interest, which in 1853 will exceed $300,000 a year, would gradually be paid at home instead of being sent to a foreign country. It seems to me that such a consideration as this, so easily effected, is infinitely more important as a great measure of public policy, than any prejudices which gentlemen may entertain in favor of the State banking system.

As to the broad intimations that this proposition originated with the bondholders of New York or London, and that members of this Convention have been corrupted by certain means, I have only to say for myself that no approaches of the kind have been made to me. Other gentlemen can answer for themselves. I do not forget that similar charges were made when the settlement of the State debt was accomplished under the Butler Bill. If money was then used, I got none of it; but perhaps that was because, in that case, I happened to be the first person who proposed the basis of the settlement; or because I fought against the details of the long-tailed bill for the purpose of getting the best possible bargain for the State.

The return of the State bonds, and their reduction to a domestic instead of a foreign debt, is the first great object I have in view. I support the new and secure system of banking as a means conducive to that end. But I would also say to those professed anti-bank men, who avow so much alarm at the project, that I support the new system also, because it approximates nearer to anti-paper money views, than any system ever before devised in this country. It is better as a measure of correct business policy and safety, by far, than the State Bank, which latter system no vote of mine shall aid in perpetuating. I would prefer the honest platform of no paper money at all, rather than to give such a vote. I am willing to permit banks for the reasons I have given, though I will readily vote to impose all proper and reason-enable restrictions. If they can stand the restrictions which I propose, I am willing to risk them.

Before the question was taken, the Convention adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. READ OF CLARKE,

On the subject of "Banks," delivered Friday afternoon, January 3, 1851.

Mr. READ of Clarke said—

MR. PRESIDENT: I do not intend to detain the Convention more than a very few moments. In rising to say a few words on the subject of banking, it is not my intention to make war upon the present State Bank, for I will do that institution the justice to say, that during the last eight or ten years its business has been well transacted. The managers of that bank have acted with great prudence and forethought, for which they not only deserve our thanks, but the thanks of the country at large. I must say, however, that I am opposed to the principle on which that institution is founded—more, perhaps, because it is a monopoly, than for any other reason.

Now let me call the attention of the Convention to what is the present situation of the charter of the State Bank, under the present Constitution of the State. Sir, you have no less than thirteen monopolies throughout the State in the shape of Branch Banks; and that charter provides further that there shall never be another branch established without the unanimous consent of all the branches; and if you renew that charter, it will of course continue with that restriction. Now, for example, there is Logansport on the Wabash river, which, in the course of time may grow up to be as large, and populous, and wealthy, as Cincinnati or Louisville. Indeed, it is now a flourishing and commercial place, and yet she never can have a Branch Bank of the State, or the facilities of obtaining money which such a branch would give; and why? Because all the branches of your State Bank will not consent to it. This would be equally applicable to other points in the State. We had some experience of this a few years ago. They obtained a district and an act of the Legislature authorizing them to establish a Branch Bank agreeably to the provisions of the charter. The necessary amount of stock on the part of individuals had been obtained. As I am informed, they got the assent of every branch in the State until they came to their neighbors at Lafayette, and they objected. Oh, shame on such a selfish board of directors! Now is not that a strong objection to the system? Why should men in one part of the State have such great advantages over those in another part of it? I say it is wrong, and this Convention has a right to repress it. I have no special anger against the Bank itself. For eight or nine years it has done its business well; but I object to its principle on the score of its being a monopoly.

Now a few words relative to this million of dollars of which we have heard so much. I think I understand that matter; but if I do not I have some records that will help me out. In the year 1839 or 1840, a bill was introduced into the Legislature authorizing the President of the State Bank to borrow a million of dollars for the purpose of increasing the capital stock of the Bank of Indiana. Mr. Merrill went on to the east, and whether he or his agent negotiated the money I am unable to say, but they sold upon short credit a million of bonds of the State of Indiana to the Morris Canal and Banking Company, and Mr. Merrill had hardly returned home before he received notice from that institution of their inability to meet their liabilities. He immediately returned in order to get the bonds, but he was told that the bonds had been sold to the United States Bank, and from there had been transferred to European capitalists. That is the true history of the matter, so far as my memory serves me. That money was borrowed, or bonds sold, and your farms and the farms of our constituents are now mortgaged for the payment of the money. Yes, sir, that money was borrowed, or at least the State bonds were sold directly to increase the capital stock of the State Bank. At any rate if there had been no bank, that money would never have been borrowed, and there would not consequently have been any loss. [Consent.]

Now, in order to sustain this argument, I will refer to the documents, and the first one, I believe, is from the pen of my friend from Marion (Mr. Maguire). It is in the Auditor's report of 1848. At the conclusion of his report on this subject, he says:

The amount of bonds issued on account of the State Bank, it will be seen by the above, is	$2,412,000 00
The amount on which the Bank pays interest is	1,390,000 00

Difference	$1,022,000 00
------------	----------------

This sum, although a loss by the Bank, is transferred to the internal improvement system, with what propriety, or by what authority does not appear by any record of this officer. The loan was made for the purpose of obtaining funds with which to increase the capital stock of the Bank. It proved unfortunate; a small portion only have been realized. With what propriety it was turned over to the internal improvement account I am unable to determine. Although, in either case it was a loss to the State, yet it would seem proper that in winding up both the internal improvement system and the Bank, the accounts should have been so kept as to show that each had borne its own disasters.

But the fact of the matter was this—the State at the time was paying neither principal nor interest. She cared but little or nothing about it. The cry of “repudiation” was loud and long at that time of day—though I believe that our people never seriously thought of repudiation. That was the case, and in order to save the Bank, the State shouldered the amount. I think these are the facts relative to the million of dollars, and that they cannot be successfully gainsayed by any member of this Convention. Then in the next place, you find the common school fund—that fund which was designed for the education of the poor children of the country—attacked and taken. Now what has become of that fund? Gentlemen talk of the Bank making eight hundred thousand dollars for us; but if they run up the account current, they will find that instead of making anything, the Bank has lost, and would stand indebted to the State, taking into consideration near a million of dollars lost as alleged to heretofore.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). I will believe it if you will prove it.

Mr. READ. I am proving it as fast as I can. Have a little patience. He goes on to say—

This fund, derived from the Sinking Fund, which is controlled by Sinking Fund Commissioners. It consists, as provided for in the one hundred and fourteenth section of the Bank charter, of the residue or profits of the Sinking Fund, after discharging the loans negotiated by the State for the payment of its stocks, the amount of interest thereon, and incidental expenses, and is set apart as a permanent fund for common school education, under the direction of the General Assembly.

From the organization of the Bank until the passage of the act of February, 1841, (chapter 121 of general laws,) the fund was left to accumulate in the hands of the Commissioners. By the act referred to, all payments of this fund into the State Treasury were declared loans to the State, and to be on an interest of six per cent.; and the General Fund is so charged, and the Common School Fund credited on the books of this office.

This fund would have been paid into the State Treasury from year to year, in current funds, but for the passage of another act of the General Assembly. This is the act of January 31, 1842 (general laws, chapter 68). This act provided for the issue of five per cent. scrip, commonly called five per cent. bank scrip, to pay the indebtedness of the State to the Bank, for advances by the several branches, to carry on the internal improvement system, amounting to seven hundred and twenty-two thousand six hundred and forty dollars, principle and interest to the period of adjustment, and made this scrip receivable for all debts due the Sinking Fund.

Thus you see, sir, that the Bank was so anxious to obtain Eastern funds, upon which, of course, she might make a per centum, that she advanced to contractors the enormous sum of seven hundred and twenty-two thousand six hundred and forty dollars. True, this was a debt against the State, at least in equity; but, sir, if this money had not have been so liberally distributed with the contractors, what would have been the result? The question is easy answered. The contractors would have suspended, the bubble would have burst, and our glorious system of 1836 would have been blown up at an early period, and this sacred sum saved from utter loss; but, to save the Bank from the danger of insolvency, the State was compelled, from the necessity of the case, to issue this five per cent. bank scrip based upon the Common School Fund.

Now, sir, if the Bank had not advanced the money, there certainly would have been no loss to this Common School Fund; and if our banking institutions had been in the hands of private individuals, they never would have advanced to contractors the amount heretofore stated; if they had, it would have been their own loss, unless authorized by the Legislature to do so, which I presume would not have been the case; if they had, they would have stood upon equal footing with other creditors of the State.

Then, sir, there is another account which I contend would never have been lost; because the contractors, as I have said before, would have stopped their work at an earlier period. At any rate, Mr. President, the facts are these that there are between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars which are lost, which have been taken from the poor children of your country; or, if you recover it, you will have to levy a direct tax upon the people for the purpose, because it is a debt which we honorably owe to the School Fund; and if we ever pay it, we will have to tax a people that are already taxed to the eyebrows, for the purpose of making the deficit good.

There is another provision to which I will call the attention of gentlemen. The present charter provides that when any of the branches was not able to pay six per cent., its charter might be wound up; yet, when one or more of the branches were not able to pay that dividend, they went on from year to year, declaring a dividend of one, two, three, and four per cent., and took the deficit out of that fund to pay the interest on the amount originally borrowed for banking purposes. Then, sir, I am for dissolving all connection with the State and banks. I have no hostile feelings to the Bank, and can have none; for, let me say, I am an humble stockholder in that institution.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). Is that a fact?

Mr. READ. Yes, sir, it is a fact; but I do not stand here as a stockholder, but as the representative of my constituents. [Applause.] Now, I appeal to every gentleman on this floor—and I see many grey heads here as well as my own—whether we have not had the most ample experience of the workings of this system? We had once before a State Bank of Indiana, whose paper was received as gold and silver throughout the whole Mississippi Valley; and if an individual should have chanced to get up at that time of day and speak a word against it, he would have been in danger of losing his scalp. I speak politically. And what has become of that Bank? Why, sir, I have a hundred dollar bill in my pocket now of the Branch Bank of Brookville, and I have some idea of calling on my friend over the way, from Franklin county, (Dr. Berry,) for payment, or at least for some information about it. Sir, that Bank has long since gone by the board; and I will ask you if there ever was an instance of a State Bank in these United States, or, at least, West of the Allegheny Mountains, that ever wound up in a state of solvency. I never knew of one yet that did not come out insolvent. But I trust, for the character of mankind, at least, that the present State Bank of Indiana may be an exception.

True, the State Bank of Indiana may wind up solvent, particularly if the State steps forward and meets all her losses. Sir, it has been ascertained that, under this State Bank system, there have been lost in the United States upwards of sixty millions of dollars. Is it not, then, time that we should open our eyes to the matter—that we should look back upon our past experience and remember that like causes produce like effects.

And, Mr. President, when the bank fails who are the losers? Is it your bankers, or your sharpers and shavers? No, sir, they always manage to keep the run of the game. It is the farmers, the mechanics, and the laborers of the country who suffer—the men who are engaged in their daily toil, and who never think about breaks except when they have the misfortune to find that the bank paper they may have is utterly worthless. It is they who suffer most, and not the Shylocks of the bank or the stock exchange. Sir I am here to represent those farmers and mechanics; and I call upon this Convention to guard their rights, as I have no doubt they will do.

Mr. President, I am well aware of what causes a break up of those institutions, except in those cases where downright rascality is the cause; it is mostly from favoritism. Look, sir, at the suspended debts of the Branches of the State Bank amounting to about four hundred thousand dollars. I speak in round numbers. Indeed it may be over that sum. It was considerable over that amount in 1846, if I have made the calculations right, and I think I have. It too often happens that when the honest industrious farmer or mechanic knocks at the counter of the bank and asks for an accommodation, that he is refused, sometimes for one excuse and then another; mostly however upon the plea, that the Bank is not discounting any new paper; having run up to the limits of the charter; at the same time those favorites have been accommodated at the tune of one, ten, and twenty thousand dollars, and consequently when one of those favorites fail, the loss is great. Now, sir, if the bank will examine her suspended debt, she will find but little loss from the farmers, mechanics, and laborers.

The Banks all understand how to make favorable reports. I never knew one yet that did not. I recollect well that a very short time before the utter failure of the State Banks of our sister State, Illinois, that the Bank reports of that institution declared it to be solvent, and showed resources more than sufficient to meet all liabilities, and appeared to place it too beyond all doubt; and in less than twenty-four hours, I might say, it all sunk in the gulf of ruin and destruction. No one ever yet saw a bank report that was not perfectly favorable to the creditors, even if the bank should break the very next day. All who have carefully examined the Bank reports in most cases, annually made to the Legislature of the different States, must be struck with the very imperfect manner in which many of their statements are made out; the absolute ignorance, neglect, or misrepresentations and misstatements they contain.

Well, sir, you may ask me what kind of a bank I am in favor of [A voice—"Aye let us hear"]. No matter whether it be a State Bank or a private bank, I am in favor of one that will protect the note-holders, either by individual responsibility, or by funds deposited as collateral security for their redemption, or both united. ["Consent, consent."]

The safest way to make a sound paper currency, is to have at all times ample security for its redemption in possession of the State. In order to make this security ample, it should be not only sufficient in amount, but should be of such a nature, that it may be readily converted into cash without loss.

Should a general system of Banking be adopted in this State, it can hardly be doubted but it would prove beneficial. It would create a demand for our own State stock. The interest paid upon them, would be paid to our citizens. Every person who held a bank note, secured by such stock, would have a direct interest in maintaining unviolated the credit of the State, and would give a sound and uniform currency.

Then I would propose, for the present, State bonds, or bonds of the United States, or bonds of other States which pay their interest regularly upon them.

Should a general system of banking be adopted upon these same principles that now exist in the State of New York, I am satisfied that it would prove to us one of the great radical reforms of the day, upon the subject of banking. The free banking system was adopted in 1838; this was its origin in this country, although it had existed in Scotland, and other countries, for many years; here it was altogether experimental; their first plan, in part, proved to be insufficient; that is, there was a few failures, and some loss; but nothing to compare with those banks of special incorporated charters, during the same length of time. They have, however, learned wisdom from past experience, and have now adopted a system that all admit works well; indeed, it may be said that there is, or very near, a perfect system in banking. We were all astonished at a phenomena in banking which lately took place in that State, under their present general banking system, as it now exists there. One of the banks at Buffalo lately failed. They stopped payment, as the saying is, for want of funds. Well, what was the result? Instead of the notes on the bank depreciating, and becoming worthless, as is universally the case with chartered banks, the notes of the bank, in a few days, actually advanced, and brought a premium of one-half per cent. Now, sir, this appears strange; that when a bank breaks, that the paper advances; but no more strange than true, in this case. The security given to the State, by the bank, in the first place, to secure the note-holder, was immediately converted into cash; and, being Eastern funds, commanded this premium.

That, sir, would create a sound and wholesome currency.

Now one or two words in reply to my friend from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) a man for whose judgment I entertain the highest opinion. As he led off in the dance on this question I will turn my attention to him for a moment. [A voice—"Now take it Rariden."] Mr. President, that gentleman threw in here what he undoubtedly meant for a scare-crow. He told us that we were to have railroad, and plank road, and other corporative stocks, as a foundation for this system of free banking. This, sir, is the first time I ever heard the thing suggested. I believe the thing never was suggested until yesterday. I then received it as a scare-crow and consider that he was the author of the project; but I trust that it will not scare members from doing their duty on this occasion; we have all seen scare-crows before to-day. But the gentleman went on to read a part of Governor Wright's message to show what great loss the State had sustained from this kind of capital escaping taxation. Sir, there is a great deal of puffing in most all messages, except those which were delivered by the present occupant of the Chair—Governor Wallace. [Laughter and great applause.] Well the gentleman quoted the Governor's message showing the great contrast in the property as assessed by the county assessors at Madison, New Albany, and Indianapolis, and as it is assessed by the several corporations at these places. Now this is the fact about that matter. When present valuation was made, it was made some four or five years ago, and it was under that valuation that the assessment was made to which the Governor refers in his message. It is known that in these cities property has advanced in that time in many cases over a hundred per cent. The city assessor makes his assessment off the present value, but the county assessor takes the valuation made four or five years ago; and that, sir, will readily account for the difference. Do not understand me as making any objections to Governor Wright's message—far from it, sir, that message does honor to the man; in short, it can't be beat; I merely wish to show the discrepancy between the two assessments.

Again, sir, these towns have many local improvements to provide for. They go on improving their streets, and having large sums to raise for this purpose, they sometimes look out for an assessor that has liberal views and high notions, and in this way property is often valued at two prices, and this is another reason why property is valued more highly by the city than the county assessor; for it will be recollected that they cannot levy a tax higher than fifty cents to the hundred dollars, ad valorem.

This, sir, is about all I have to say upon the subject. I do not intend to trouble the Convention again unless I may feel called upon to reply to remarks made by gentlemen. I repeat again, that I have no hostile feelings to the State Bank. It has done well for the last eight or ten years. She has maintained the credit of her paper; she has acted in that sphere in which all banks should act. And as to telling me about speculating in bills of exchange and discount, why, sir, that is all moonshine; for establish what bank you will, they will do the same. And when gentlemen say that she is yielding large interest to the stock-holders, I can tell them that she never yielded me more than eight or nine per cent. in the aggregate, after deducting out the annual taxes, when money was worth ten per cent. That bank has kept within her proper sphere of business, against which I have not a word to say; but when I look upon the character and the history of all State banks, I have come to the conclusion that if we are to have banks at all, we should have them upon the broad principles of justice (equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none), and make them perfectly secure, for the redemption of their paper, for that is all that the people want in relation to any bank; and for that principle I will go, whether you adopt a State bank or a free bank.

I will, at the proper time, present to the Convention the following article for their consideration, and trust that it may, or some other of a similar nature, be adopted:

The Legislature shall have no power to pass any act granting any special charter for banking purposes; but incorporations or associations may be formed for such purposes, under general laws.

The Legislature shall have no power to pass any law sanctioning in any manner, directly or indirectly, the suspension of specie payment, by any person, association; or corporation, issuing bank notes of any description.

The Legislature shall provide by law for the registering of all bills or notes, issued or put in circulation as money, and shall require ample security for the redemption of the same, in specie.

The stockholders in every corporation and joint stock association for banking purposes, issuing bank notes, or any kind of paper credit to circulate as money, after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two, shall be individually responsible, to the amount of their respective shares of stock in any such corporation or association, for all its debts and liabilities of every kind, contracted after the said first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two.

In case of the insolvency of any bank or banking association, the bill-holders thereof shall be entitled to preference, in payment, over all other creditors of such bank or association.

This, sir, is my system, or rather the New York improved system; and, in my humble opinion, if adopted here, all is safe, and above all, the note-holder will be made secure.

I am, personally, no great advocate for any banking system. I believe it would have been a happy thing for this country, if there never had been a bank in it. But they have been fastened on us; and I doubt the policy of abruptly breaking off from them. And besides, our sister States would furnish us with a paper currency, over which we would have no control. It appears to me, that expediency requires that we should authorize the Legislature to furnish that currency, with proper guards and checks, and, above all, security for the redemption of their notes. This, sir, is what I believe the people want.

The individual who passes counterfeit money, is punished by the laws of the land. He is treated as a felon, as an enemy to society; and the individual who passes bills on a broken bank, is treated with not much less severity. But they who issue bills, which are from five to fifty per cent. discount, are gentlemen and bankers—complained of a little by those who suffer, at the moment of their losing, to be sure—but they are wealthy bankers, or brokers, and they are taken by the hand, wherever they go. They are quite the gentlemen. They made money out of the public, and no inquiry is made, respecting their moral honesty. Sir, I am done; and I thank the Convention for their attention.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 8, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CHARY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication from the superintendent of common schools, in reply to a resolution of inquiry adopted by the Convention.

Mr. PRATHER moved that the communication be laid upon the table and three hundred copies ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the committee on the legislative department, reported the following section in compliance with the instructions of the Convention:

"SEC. — The members of the General Assembly shall receive for their services a compensation to be fixed by law; but no increase of compensation shall take effect during the session at which such increase shall be made. No session of the General Assembly, except the first under this Constitution, shall exceed sixty days, nor any called session forty days."

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the section pass?

Mr. CARTER. I move, sir, to suspend the rules requiring the yeas and nays to be taken upon the passage of the section.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. BORDEN. I am under the impression that the committee was instructed to provide that the members of the General Assembly were to receive a certain sum for the first sixty days. [Cries of "Oh! no."]

The yeas and nays were then taken upon the passage of the section, and resulted—yeas 82, nays 27—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, March, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milhgan, Mooney, Morgan, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of O., Pepper of C., Pettit, Prather, Read of C., Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scot, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—82.

NAYS.—Messrs. Blythe, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hogin, Huff, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Moore, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Spann, Thornton, Wheeler, and Work—29.

So the section was passed and referred to the committee on revision.

BANKS.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the subjects of banks.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, this question has been already pretty fully discussed, and I feel as though it would be occupying the time of the Convention to no purpose for me at this time to enter into a full discussion of this question in all its bearings, even if I was capable of doing so. I will however ask the indulgence of the Convention while I make a few remarks. The question as to whether we shall have banks or not has already been settled by a decided majority of this Convention, and therefore needs no further comment; but the next question, and it seems much the most difficult one to settle, is, what kind of a banking system we had better adopt. Some gentlemen here are in favor of the present State Bank system, others are in favor of a free or general banking system, while others are in favor of a kind of amalgamation of the two systems. Now, sir, I am not particular by what name you designate the banking system which we shall adopt, if it shall contain in its provisions certain principles which I deem essential to the existence of a safe and wholesome currency, I shall cheerfully vote for it without regard to the name it may bear. The principles to which I allude are as follows: first, that ample security shall first be required to be deposited with a State officer for the redemption in specie of all bills to be put in circulation by the banks; second, that the stockholders shall be individually liable, at least to the amount of their stocks, for all debts and liabilities of the bank; third, that the State shall in no case be a stock-holder in any bank; and fourth, that any citizen or number of citizens of the State who shall comply with the provisions and requirements of the law, shall have the right to establish a bank. These are some of the most essential safeguards which I hope to see thrown around the banking system in the State of Indiana—restrictions which I regard as absolutely necessary to the existence of a safe currency. In regard to the kind of security which the Legislature should require as a basis for banking, I do not think that it is necessary to specify in the Constitution, for this reason: It is impossible for us to know at this period what kind of securities will be the most safe and the most available in twenty, thirty, or forty years hence. There may be in ten, fifteen or twenty years from this time other securities besides State stocks which would be even more acceptable and more safe and available than any we have now; and, sir, it does seem to me that this is a matter that peculiarly belongs to legislation; it is a matter that they ought at all times to have the control of. Why, sir, suppose it should so happen hereafter, as has been prophesied by the gentleman from Vanderburgh, that State stocks should depreciate, although we are willing to admit that they would be the best securities at this time, if it is left in the hands of the Legislature they will have it in their power to correct this difficulty by requiring the banks to increase their securities or to substitute others which would be safe, and thereby keep the currency sound. Again: it does seem to me that gentlemen are anxious to legislate for all time to come; that they are not willing to commit to the hands of posterity the right to determine for themselves mere questions of expediency for fear that they will exercise that right injudiciously. Sir, to me this is a narrow view of this matter. I do think that we can with safety confide something to the honesty and intelligence of the people. There is another view of this question. These State stocks will, in all probability, in a few years be paid off and redeemed by the State, and if the Legislature should have no right to substitute other securities for banking, however safe they might be, the result would be that the banks would be compelled to wind up, however important it might be for the country that they should continue their operations. Sir, I can see no good reason why this right would not be safe in the hands of the people, to be exercised by them through their Legislature, from time to time, as circumstances and their best interests might require.

As to the proposition whether the State should be prohibited from being a stock-holder, I am equally clear.

I am satisfied as I have stated upon another occasion in this house that the State should not engage in banking or any other enterprise for the purpose of making money. Sir, the duties of a State government or any other government are plain—it is to protect the citizen in his legitimate pursuits and in the enjoyment of those rights and privileges which belong to him as a freeman; and when it has accomplished this, the great object of government is attained, leaving the rest to individual enterprise under the direction of wholesome laws. In regard to the extent of the individual liability of the stockholder I am not particular whether it is to the amount of his stock or whether it is unlimited. I believe that I would prefer having it unlimited; nor do I suppose for one moment, as has been asserted on this floor, that this provision would prevent capitalists from embarking their capital in banking. Sir, it would only make the stockholder watch over the operations of the bank with greater vigilance—it would then partake more of the nature of a mercantile partnership, and would secure for the bank that industry, prudence, and economy, which is necessary to the success of any enterprise. While on the other hand it would give credit to the banks by giving community greater confidence in their safety, and thereby give a wider circulation to their paper. This, it seems to me, is the legitimate result of such an organization, the tendency of which would be not only to benefit the stockholder or banks, by increasing their faculties for doing business; but would also benefit community by a sound and safe currency. But, sir, I regard the other proposition giving to all the citizens of the State the same right to establish a bank by complying with the conditions, as being the best and most republican feature in this system of banking. Sir, it would be useless for me to enter into a detail of the objections which might be urged against the present State Bank system, one of the most prominent of which is, that it is a monopoly, and it is sufficient to say that monopolies have ever been the source of oppression and fraud, and the just cause of complaint in every country and community where they have been tolerated. Sir, it is granting by law to a certain number of citizens of the State rights and privileges which are not extended to all under the same conditions; and this of itself in my mind ought to be a conclusive objection to every friend of equal rights. Sir, so long as we contend for equal rights—so long as we hold that men are equal and stand upon the same broad platform of equal rights and equal privileges—so long we should never give the sanction of law to a monopoly of any kind whatever; for whenever we do we give the lie direct to one of the cardinal doctrines of which we boast as freemen. By making the system general, and extending to all the same rights under it, we not only obviate this very odious feature, but we invite into the field the same salutary and wholesome competition in banking which now exists in all the other departments of trade and occupations of life. Sir, there is nothing better calculated to increase the facilities of trade—nothing which tends more to stimulate and give energy and activity to the business of life—nothing so well calculated to compel men to accept and be satisfied with fair profits, and to deal fairly and honestly in traffic than a proper and fair competition; without it our mechanic shops and mercantile houses would be converted into places of extortion and fraud; yet, sir, to my mind there would be just as much injustice and impropriety in prohibiting by law the establishment of more than one store in a certain town, or of more than a certain number in the State, as there is in prohibiting any more than a certain number of banks; for banking and commerce are intimately connected, one giving facilities to the other; and it seems to me that they ought to be subject to the same legitimate competition. Sir, I look upon this feature in the general banking system as being better calculated to recommend it to the favor of the people of this State than any other feature in it, for it contains the very first principal upon which rests all our notions of free government and equal rights. It was contended by the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr. Kelso) that under this system it would require some nine millions of banking capital in order to supply a basis for banking in all the places in the State where banks would be desired, and that the State would have to issue more bonds for that purpose. In answer to the gentlemen's argument I would just say that I do not suppose that any friend of free banking ever dreamed of requiring the State to furnish capital to individuals for banking purposes. That, sir, is the State Bank system, and must have been the source from which the gentleman derived this idea. I would as soon require the State to furnish capital to the merchant or mechanic to carry on their business, as to require the State to furnish capital for banking. No, sir, we only ask the State to give to all its citizens the same rights in this matter—open the door to all who will comply with the conditions, and say to all that you have equal rights and equal privileges secured to you by general laws, and this is all that is due from the State, the balance you must do for yourselves. But, sir, there is another important result that I conceive will be accomplished by this system, it is this: each bank will stand upon its own foundation, unconnected with others, which will prevent them from concentrating their efforts for the accomplishment of objects beneficial to themselves alone, and their power to expand and contract their issue thereby very much lessened, and their means of doing injury in this respect almost entirely defeated. Sir, when all the banks in the State are banded together by one common interest—when the interest of one is the interest of all, is not their influence to be dreaded if it ever should be their interest to exert it in some cause which would conflict with the best interests of the community, and is it not important for us to guard against such influences, and to keep banks, as well as every branch of trade, within its proper and legitimate sphere.

The gentleman from Vanderburgh says that, if free banking had been established under our present Constitution, at the organization of the State Government, that the country would have been flooded with irredeemable and irresponsible bank paper. Sir, it occurs to me that this is begging the question. I have no doubt but this is his opinion, but might not the gentleman be mistaken; nor does he show in what way a paper currency, based upon ample security, deposited with an officer of State for its redemption, and having in addition the individual liability of the stockholders, would be irredeemable and irresponsible. Sir, if a paper currency, secured in this way, would be irredeemable, and the bank irresponsible, I ask the gentleman if it would not be ten times more so under the present State Bank system, where there is not one farthing of security of any kind whatever—resting solely upon the honesty of the banker. The gentleman says that a number of the free banks of New York have failed, and that some of them paid only seventy-six cents on the dollar. Now, sir, the reason that they did not pay and redeem all their circulation is because the officer whose duty it was to take the security, did not require ample security; and the stockholders were not individually liable; and I undertake to say that, if, in addition to the securities which they did take, the stockholders had been individually liable, that every dollar of their notes would have been redeemed, and not one cent would have been lost to the bill holder or to the community; and I think that I shall be able to establish this assertion to the satisfaction of the Convention, when I come to that part of this subject. The gentleman from Vanderburg read us a letter from some gentleman who, he says, is well acquainted with the New York system of free banking, and who condemns the system. In answer to this letter, I will just say that the late New York Constitutional Convention was perhaps as well acquainted with the New York system of banking as the gentleman whose communication was read by the gentleman from Vanderburg, and I think would be quite as good authority on that subject; and they establish the free or general banking system in that State, and regard it as the only safe and proper system of banking; and this, too, Mr. President, after they have tried all the other different systems. Sir, it does seem to me that the decision of the State of New York upon this subject, after the experience she has had, and her means of testing the correctness of this system, is entitled to some consideration, and ought to have some weight with gentlemen who are disposed to profit by the experience of others.

The gentleman from Shelby, (Mr. Hendricks,) also, attacks the free banking system. He says that the system cannot stand; and, to establish his position, he reads from the report of the Comptroller of the State of New York upon the subject of the failure of a number of free banks in that State.

Now, sir, as a number of gentlemen upon this floor have taken this report as a text book, and have appealed to it with great show of triumph, as affording incontestable proof of the utter failure of the free banking system, I, sir, am willing, also, to test the question by that report, and abide by its decision; and for the satisfaction of the Convention, I will read that part of the report which refers to the subject under consideration, which reads as follows.

"Insolvent Free Banks."

"Since the passage of the general banking law, thirty-one of the free banks have been closed by the Comptroller, whose aggregate circulation at the time of the failure was $1,417,545 00
Amount redeemed by the Comptroller, - - - - - 1,357,424 00

Leaving the outstanding circulation, including $4,069 of Atlas

Bank certificates, - - - $60,121 00

This is an extract from the report of the Comptroller of the State of New York, in 1848, and shows that there was only a deficit of sixty thousand one hundred and twenty-one dollars to meet the liabilities of all those thirty-one banks which had failed; and in another report made by the Comptroller in 1849, the following facts are disclosed, and which reads as follows:

"Since the passage of the law, thirty-one banks have failed, and were closed by a sale of the securities, pledged with the Comptroller. In most of these cases, the proceeds of the securities were insufficient to redeem the entire circulation; therefore, a pro rata dividend was paid to the bill holders, and certificates issued for the balance payable out of any additional means which the banks may have possessed."

But, in every instance, a small portion of the circulating notes are still outstanding. The presumption is, that they are mostly lost, and will never be presented. The question is: What shall be done with the funds remaining in the Comptroller's hands for their redemption? The amount thus held is thirty-two thousand eight hundred and nineteen dollars and seventy-nine cents, belonging to thirty banks; and as a majority of the failures occurred almost ten years ago, there is no probability that this balance will be called for by the bill holders." Which shows that the whole loss to the bill holders, when the whole proceeds are applied, will be less than thirty thousand dollars—a mere trifle when compared to the amount in circulation. Now, sir, suppose that the stockholders in these banks had been also individually liable for the redemption of their notes, can any man in his senses doubt for a moment that one dollar would have been lost, or that their entire circulation would not have been fully redeemed. But, sir, when we recollect that this was the first experiment in free banking; and when we recollect, too, the circumstances under which these banks were organized and went into operation, it destroys the whole force of the gentleman's argument—his entire fabric falls to the ground. By the indulgence of the Convention, I will read from this same report which specifies the causes and circumstances which surrounded those banks at the time of their organization better than I can do it. This report says:

"The country was then flooded with stocks from almost every State, and the consequence was that numerous banks sprung into existence under this law. Repudiation soon followed. Many States that did not repudiate failed to meet their obligations, confidence was impaired, credit was shaken, and stocks generally depreciated. The consequence was, that many banks failed, and the Legislature partially retrieved its error in 1840, by excluding all stocks except those issued by this State, (the State of New York,) and required those to be, or to be made equal to five per cent. stocks.

"Finding the small banks unsafe, the Legislature, in 1844, required individual bankers to deposit securities to the amount of at least fifty thousand dollars, and associations to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, before they were entitled to any notes for circulation. The stringency of the money market in 1847 admonished the Legislature that the security of those banks were insufficient, and in 1848 they required the stocks deposited to be stocks of this State, and equal to six per cent. stocks, and the bonds and mortgages to bear an interest of seven per cent. per annum, and that they should not be for an amount exceeding two-fifths the value of the land covered by the mortgage.

"This (says the report) is the free bank system as it now stands, and it takes its name from the fact that all are freely permitted to embark in it who will comply with the rules prescribed. It is no monopoly—no exclusive right granted by the Legislature to a favored few—but is open to all who can give the required security."

Now, Mr. President, this is properly the New York free banking system, and not as it existed in 1838 at its passage it has been amended and improved, and I am prepared to assert that not one dollar or one cent has been lost—nor do I believe there will be under the present system of free banking in the State of New York; so long as her people remain true to themselves. Now, sir, let us see the conclusion the people of that great commercial State have come to after testing the system fully, and after having tried almost every other system of banking which human ingenuity could invent. I read from the report of Mr. Fillmore, who was at the time Comptroller of the State of New York. He says:

"The safety fund system was virtually abandoned by the creation of the free banking system, which grew up under the act of 1838.

"The distinguishing feature of this new system is its requirement of productive and available securities to be pledged with a State officer as a guaranty for the redemption of the whole circulation.

"This principle has been tried and tested by nearly twelve years experience, and may now be regarded as firmly established in public estimation as the basis of all future legislation on the subject of banking.

"The plan originally introduced by the general banking law of 1838 was defective in many of its details, and new legislation has been required from year to year, to re-construct, strengthen, and perfect it.

"The Legislature aimed at the outset to require sufficient and unquestionable security for the entire circulation. It was conceived impossible that any American State would repudiate its obligations, and no one suspected that any of the States would fail in the prompt payment of interest. The stocks of all the States were admitted, therefore, as a basis of circulation.

"This error proved disastrous, and was almost fatal to the system during the earlier period of its operation."

Now, sir, from what I have read, it is evident that New York, after they have had this system for twelve years, have decided in its favor, and now regard it as the best and safest system of banking which they can adopt; and it has therefore become the settled policy of the State, and they regard the chances of loss to the bill-holder under this system as now amended, as the next thing to impossible. Banks may fail to meet their paper with specie at the counter, but the bill-holder knows that the securities are deposited in the vaults of the State, and that his bill will be redeemed beyond a doubt, and he rests satisfied and secure. But gentlemen say that even if the bank should ultimately redeem their notes, that still when the bank stops that the notes would depreciate, and that the laboring man would be compelled to suffer a discount or shave on his note. This, sir, is a mistake, as I can testify. Walter Joy's Bank of Buffalo failed in 1849—the only free bank which has failed since the system was perfected; yet her notes passed just as current after the bank failed as they did before; and they were not at any time at a discount in the city of New York, which is better than Indiana State Bank paper; for it is always at a discount of from two to three per cent. in New York city. So you see that the bills of one of those free banks were from two to three per cent. better after the bank had failed, than Indiana State Bank paper. So much then, for the free bank system of New York, so much talked about and harped upon by gentlemen upon this floor. But the gentleman from Shelby says that no poor man can take stock in these free banks, because he would not be able to buy a State bond, the smallest of which are for the sum of five hundred dollars, and that each share would have to be at least that amount. Now, sir, I do suppose that it would require no great exertion of human inanguity to obviate this difficulty. It occurs to me that the stocks, or the greater part of them would have to be purchased by the bank through their agent after it was organized, and that all a stock-holder would have to do if he had no State bonds, would be to hand over the money whether the amount was great or small, and let the stock be purchased for him, and deposited for him in the proper office. It is also contended by the gentleman that the only reason why the State Bank has stood and can stand is because the branches are all mutually liable for one another, and that therefore they can concentrate their united force at any given point—that is, I suppose he means that if a run is made upon one branch that the others can run with their specie to her aid; and upon the same principle, when so much specie is required to be placed in the vaults of the Bank, and a count is to be had, they can then perform the same service, and have the same specie recounted in each branch.

But, sir, I will ask the gentleman one question. Suppose the officers of the State Bank were all to join together and issue and put into circulation all the money they could, and get other money in the place of it, and then walk into the banks and take all the specie out of the vaults, and then leave. I ask the gentleman to tell me what would become of the bill-holder? Where would be his security? Sir, he would be left without a farthing.

Sir, it is this power and interest that makes them one in all their operations—that forms one of the objections to the system. If they can unite their power and influence wherever their interest requires, might they not exert a dangerous influence if their interests should direct them in an improper channel? and if their interests should conflict with the interests of community, would they not be a formidable power to combat with in any contest? I suppose that it is this power of concentration which now enables them to realize twenty per cent. on their stocks. Sir, I do not wish to make war upon the present State Bank. They never refused me any favor which I asked at their hands, and I am willing to admit that it has been well conducted, and is a credit to the State, but this is owing entirely to the honesty and prudence of the men who conduct it, and not to the safety of the system; and I do think that we can adopt a better and a safer system, one that will be better adapted to the wants and growing interests of the State. I regret Mr. President, that I am compelled to differ with many gentlemen upon this subject.

The gentleman from Monroe gave us a specimen of his eloquence on this subject, in which he contended that the State Bank was the very thing we wanted; and rather insinuated that us free bank men were under the influence of the bond-holders; but as I could not see the force of his arguments, and could not understand to what particular point they were directed, I shall therefore not attempt to answer them. In conclusion, Mr. President, I will add that I cannot see why gentlemen are so much opposed to changing the present banking system for the general banking system which we propose, for as I regard it, it will be changing a system which is wholly without security, and which depends solely upon the honesty, prudence, and skill of those who direct and manage the finances of the banks; for a system which offers security which will place the safety of the banks beyond the ordinary contingencies of life—a system which, with ordinary care, cannot fail—one on which the bill-holder can rely with confidence—one that will always secure to the laborer the reward of his toil; and to all the different occupations and departments of life a sound, healthy, and stable currency.

Mr. ROBINSON here addressed the Convention at length; his speech will be published hereafter.

Mr. MILROY. We live in an age of progress—progress not only in the arts and sciences, but progress in the knowledge of human rights. And, sir, the most of those old iron, feudal, or rather common law notions, of proscriptive rights, vested rights, divine rights, incorporated rights, and chartered rights, under various forms, which came down to our forefathers from their British ancestors, and remained in our political system after the American Revolution, have been gradually melted away before this spirit of progression, until it has reached this one—the strongest, the most dangerous, the most pernicious of all—the chartered right of converting rags into money—of making fortunes out of pictured evidences of indebtedness. And the great contest that has been carried on in this Hall, for the last four days, is, whether or not the spirit of progress shall sweep away this British remnant—this barrier to the advancement of human rights in our State. We are to determine whether our posterity shall be cursed with this chartered monopoly, or whether they shall have the same freedom and equal rights in the business of banking, under proper restrictions, as in every other occupation of life. With due deference to the gentlemen of the opposition, I must say that I believe that their predictions, statistics, and calculations, relative to the evils, failures, ruin, taxation, &c., that free banking, under the proposed restrictions, would bring upon the people of the State, are just about as accurate as would be calculations by them, in figures, of their chances of getting to Heaven. Gentlemen draw all their conclusions of what the evils of free banking would be, from banking carried on under the principle that it now is in this State, and seem incapable of considering it in any other light. I will admit that, if general banking was allowed, on the principle that now governs banking in this.

State—the principle of issuing three or four dollars in paper for one in specie—no individual responsibility—no security to bill-holders—issuing small notes, &c.—it would prove the greatest curse that could befall our State. Such a system of general banking has not been dreamed of by the friends of reform banking, and such an idea is at least twenty years behind the age. We only demand that the doctrine of monopoly and chartered rights, in relation to the business of banking, shall cease forever, and that there shall be such stringent restrictions put upon it, that it cannot be hereafter exercised to the injury of society, or of any of its members.

The experience of the world demonstrates that it is much more difficult to root out an old error, or to reform an old system in political policy, however corrupt and unjust it may be, than to introduce scores of new theories into the moral or social policy of a people. Accordingly, we find that this old rampart of exclusive rights holds out with the most determined energy, against progression. But there exists not a doubt in the minds of the friends of progress, that it, too, will be swept away, and that our Legislature, under the proposed restrictions, can and will form a system of banking, that will be perfectly safe to the people, and one that will be incapable of creating those expansions and contractions in the currency of the country, so ruinous to labor, and destructive of morals, and beneficial alone to shavers, speculators and gamblers.

I regard this question as one of more vital importance to the people of Indiana—to present and future generations, than any that has yet been discussed in this body. It is one, sir, in which is not only involved the prosperity and happiness of millions yet unborn, but one upon which depends the purity and beneficence of our State Government. It depends upon this Convention to determine whether banking shall hereafter be reduced to the level of any other common honest business, open to wholesome competition and the enterprise of all, or whether it shall remain held up by the strong arm of government, above competition, an exclusive chartered monopoly, and another name for corruption, fraud, partiality, and swindling. This is the true question presented for our determination, and let us remember that our decision is not for a day, or a year, but for ages; and let us try to divest ourselves of all selfish considerations in making up our decision.

I am opposed to any chartered banking system, and, sir, I am opposed to such a system, not from mere policy or expediency, but from a long-cherished principle—a principle of eternal hostility to all chartered monopolies, whether for individual, company, town, county, or State purposes. A principle that I imbibed in my boyhood, in that ever-memorable contest of the Democratic party, headed by the immortal

Jackson, against that great chartered monopoly, the United States Bank. And this principle has grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength. And, although the question of banking has not assumed a party character in this body, yet I must be allowed to say, that I doubt the Democracy of any one, calling himself a Democrat, who is in favor of retaining, in any form, our present chartered banking system—I say I doubt the genuineness of such a man's Democracy, as much as if I had known him to have opposed General Jackson, and have favored the re-charter of that old Hydra-headed monster, the United States Bank. He is not one of the progressive Democracy, at least. I am opposed to charters in any form or shape, or for any purpose whatever. The very idea of a charter carries with it that of exclusive rights and privileges, and is anti-democratic and anti-republican in every respect. To prove this, I need only to refer to the definition of a charter: "A charter may be defined to be a deed given by a government, to one or more persons, granting to him or them, individually or collectively, certain rights and privileges, therein specified, which are denied to all other persons." The true idea of a republican form of government is that it guarantees to all its citizens, equal political rights and privileges. But if this definition of a charter be correct, where, I ask, is the justice, the consistency, the republicanism, in such a government granting charters to portions of its citizens, more especially when these charters are granted for banking purposes—giving to a few individuals the chartered right to make fortunes in a manner that is prohibited to all others—the right to issue paper in the form of notes, to circulate as money, upon which they draw interest, and thus make fortunes out of what they owe, while all the other inhabitants of the State are required to pay interest on what they owe. If these are what are called equal political rights, the fewer we can have of them, the better. They are the same kind of political rights that are recognized in all the monarchical governments of Europe, where the doctrine is inculcated, that the mass of the people are born with saddles upon their backs, and a fortunate few are born booted and spurred to ride them.

One of the strongest arguments urged by gentlemen in favor of a chartered system of State banking, and one which seems to have the most weight with them, and apparently the most plausibility, is that the business of banking being one of great profit, it should not, therefore, be owned and controlled by individuals, and the profits go into their pockets, but should be owned and controlled by the State, and the profits go into the State Treasury, for the benefit of all her citizens. This, sir, is a specious argument, and one that is calculated to deceive the unsuspecting. It is such an argument as designing demagogues always make use of, to accomplish their ends. The avowed object of their proposed measures, is always for "the benefit of the people," when the real object perhaps is, to subvert the best interests of society, and render the proceeds of the labor of the people subservient to the interests of a few. Such were the specious arguments made use of by the advocates for the re-charter of the old United States Bank. Its profits were not only to pay all the expenses of government, but eventually to yield a large surplus for the purposes of internal improvement and the education of the people. But, sir, if the State has a legitimate right to monopolize the profits of banking, merely because it is a profitable business, and for that reason alone ought not to be allowed to enrich the pockets of individuals, then, sir, by a parity of reasoning, merchandizing, being a lucrative business, its profits should not be enjoyed alone by the merchant, but the State should own all the mercantile establishments within its borders, and reap all the profits of the business to be applied for "the benefit of the people." And upon the same principle the profits of farming should not be allowed to go into the pockets of the farmers alone, but the State should monopolize all the farms within her borders, and rent them out, and apply the proceeds for "the benefit of the people." And so of all other branches of business. Banking is a branch of business, and the State has just as good a right to monopolize any other branch of business, and reap its profits, as that of banking.

But, sir, the experience of the past clearly demonstrates to us that our Governments, both State and National, are most prosperous, and best accomplish the purposes for which they were created, when disconnected from every other business but the purpose for which they were instituted—that of making and administering good and wholesome laws. No government can engage in banking, without opening a door for corruption. Governments, like individuals, are fallible, and subject to temptation, and must be administered by individuals; and let any set of beings, lower than the angels, have the power and the right of converting worthless piles of rags into money, and they will abuse that right.

The best interest of every people requires that their government should be kept pure and above every contaminating influence that might sway it from the rigid line of its duty, or cloud it with prejudice, injustice, or partiality. This can only be done by disconnecting it from every other business but that of governing. If a government is engaged in the business of banking, it must be swayed by interests in common with the stock jobber, the trader, and the speculator, and is as incapable of governing, or of deciding impartially, as was Demetrius when his craft was in danger. A just government should regard every honorable business, trade, traffic, or profession of its citizens, with equal favor; but is it possible, or even probable that it will do so, when it is itself engaged in a branch of business and is daily brought in competition with a portion of its citizens.

The State should therefore be disconnected from every kind of business engaged in by its citizens, that its government may stand above the fog of interest and prejudice, amid the pure light of justice, and be able to regulate and control every business or interests of its citizens with impartiality and the best good of society.

The privilege of banking, like that of every other trade or traffic, should, under proper restrictions, be free and open to all who have the means and may feel disposed to engage in it. A man's money is his property as much as his grain, goods, land, or live stock, and he ought to be allowed to make use of it in any way for his own advantage, as freely and unrestrictedly as of any of his other property, if in so doing he does not wrong his fellow man or injure society in any way. But as all banking is at war against gold and silver, the natural currency of mankind and only certain measure of value, and is a struggle to drive this natural currency out of circulation and supply its place with a paper currency, an uncertain standard of value, which may be increased or diminished at the pleasure of its makers, and thus create expansions and contractions in the currency that renders prices fluctuating, and creates a reckless spirit of speculation that leads to bankruptcy, ruin, and vice. And as it is the absolute duty of a government to protect its citizens as far as possible against injury, fraud, and swindling, and to place strong guards around every trade, traffic, or business that may be exercised to their injury, it should therefore place such stringent restrictions upon free banking as will secure their billholders beyond the possibility of loss by failure or depreciation, and keep their issues within due bounds. These restrictions should be such as to deprive banking of those charms that now hold out such great inducements to engage in it. If the charms of issuing three dollars or more in paper for one in specie, of holding their own securities, of issuing small notes, of no individual responsibility, &c. were taken away, banking would cease to be such a charming business, and capitalists would not be any more likely to engage in it than in merchandising, brick making, or any other business. Free banking, the "Hydra-headed monster," that has been pictured by gentlemen here as shooting up its heads in the shape of "shaving shops," in a thousand different places in our State, being thus deprived of its fangs, might be turned loose on society with impunity, and would prove as harmless, and as useful perhaps, as any other occupation.

The experience of over twelve years in New York, and of over one hundred years in Scotland, shows that free banking is not impractic-cable, or an Utopian scheme; and proves that banking, under wholesome restrictions, when left open to competition, will regulate itself, like any other business.

All the evils that have heretofore flowed from the business of banking, may be traced to one source: that of governments interfering with the natural laws of trade, by selecting this business out from among the ordinary occupations of mankind, and by charters placing it above competition, with exclusive rights and immunities not allowed to any other business, and of becoming stock jobbers in it themselves.

Let the expenses of our State government then, be hereafter paid by taxation, without a resort to banking. Sixteen years, or perhaps less, at our present rate of taxation, will extinguish our State debt; and then one-fourth of our present rate of taxation will amply defray all the expenses of our State government. No one who enjoys the protection of our laws and the benefit of our free institutions, will grudge this scanty pittance for their support.

The financial concerns of the government of the United States were never more prosperous, or administered with greater facility, less expense, or more security, than since its disconnection from all banks. The same reasons that dictated that separation, and since that event has so clearly proved its wisdom, operate equally as strong in requiring the separation of our State government from all banking institutions. Then let the union between bank and State, a union equally as pernicious as that between church and State, be forever dissolved; and let banking be divested of its chartered privileges, and be reduced to a level with the other ordinary occupations of life, and, under proper restrictions, be free to all, and open to competition. These are reforms that are loudly demanded by the progress and intelligence of the age, and if we do not comply with this demand we will prove recreant to the trust that has been confided in us.

On motion of Mr. HOWE,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

SUSPENSION OF THE ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAYLOR, asked the Convention to suspend the order of business, in order to allow him to offer a resolution. [Cries of "Read, read," and "What is it?"] It is simply a resolution to the effect that the President of the State Bank be requested to furnish to each member of the Convention, one copy of the annual report of that institution, for the past year.

Mr. BORDEN. I would inquire whether that will involve any expense; because, if it does, I should be opposed to it.

Mr. TAYLOR. It will involve no additional expense. The directors of the bank usually print a considerable number of their annual reports, and I believe there are a sufficient number of the last report to supply one to each member of the Convention.

The question being taken on the suspension of the order of business, it was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution, it was adopted by consent.

Mr. THORNTON, desired to offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the debate on the article of currency, and banking, shall terminate on Thursday, the 9th inst., at 3 o'clock, P. M."

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford, moved to amend by striking out "three," and inserting "two," so as to give gentlemen all the afternoon to vote in.

Mr. McFARLAND said, he did not see any good reason why a resolution of this kind should be passed. It was within the power of any gentleman to call the previous question, so as to cut off the debate. It might be that the question would not have been sufficiently discussed by that time; and, in his opinion, it was a question of so much importance, that it ought to be discussed just as long as a majority of the members thought it necessary it should be discussed.

Mr. THORNTON. If that be the opinion of the Convention, I will withdraw the resolution for the present.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention will now proceed to the consideration of the orders of the day.

Mr. HOWE, being entitled to the floor, addressed the Convention as follows: If any gentleman desires to move the previous question, I will give up the floor. [A pause.] I have no desire to debate this question, and I was in hopes that some gentleman would move the previous question. I had a few remarks to make, which I was willing to reserve until the second section should come up; but, inasmuch as it appears to be the order of the day to debate the question now, I shall state all I have to say upon the subject.

And, Mr. President, let me remark, before I lay down the basis of the argument, that I have no fault to find with the State Bank, or with the currency it has furnished to the State. As citizens of the State, the only attitude of demand we can assume towards the bank, is that of requiring from the State a safe and sound currency. If it fails in any other particular, that is no part of our business, unless we have had special business with it. So far as a safe and sound currency is concerned, I freely admit, what is beyond dispute, that the State Bank, as compared with other banks, has furnished us with a safe, sound, and sufficient currency; but there are some other questions involved besides that, for a safe and sound currency, and, in the argument which I shall make, I will lay down two or three propositions.

The first question is, whether we are to have a bank at all?

The next is, if we are to have a bank, shall we have a State Bank, banks brought into existence by special acts of incorporation, or what is called free banking—more properly restrictive banking?

Now, as to the first question, whether or not we are to have banks at all. About that point, I think there can be but little difference of opinion. It may be the opinion of some gentlemen, abstractly, that there should be no banking; or, in other words, that the present system of banking, as it exists in this country, and in England, is founded upon a false basis; and that as speedily as practicable, we should go from that system to another. Now, I am not disposed to dispute the abstract correctness of that proposition. I have no doubt that the present system of banking exists on a false basis; but at the same time, it occurs to me that we have not the power to remedy the difficulty. If we were a little kingdom, and could control our own currency, and prevent it from going out of the State, or other currency from coming in, and set at defiance the laws of trade, we might then talk about regulating the currency. But this we cannot do. We are merely one Commonwealth among others, and our commerce amounts to but little, when compared with that of the great mass of the country. We are, to use a figure of speech, on a great stream; and we must go with the current. All we have to do is to trim our sails, to keep a good hand at the helm, and pass along on our voyage as safely as we may be able.

The reason why the present system of banking is fallacious and unsound, must be apparent to every one who will give the subject the slightest consideration. The fact is, that taking the whole United States together, the amount of paper, as compared with the amount of precious metals which it represents, is in the proportion of two and a half, or three, to one. Looking at this state of things, we should suppose, as, indeed, experience has proved, that it is exceedingly disastrous; that the remuest be a constant liability to change—a constant tendency to expansion or contraction of the currency. This change is constantly going on, and it is impossible that, upon such a basis, any other result should follow. Every system of banking existing in this country, and in England, is a system of exchange of credits, with about one-third of specie to back up that credit. Now, such a state of things, I will readily admit, is unfitted to promote the permanent prosperity of any country, and particularly an agricultural country. But I do not deem it necessary to discuss that question. It has been fully discussed already; and, if not, it is not, perhaps, the proper time to discuss it now.

We must, then, have a bank of some kind; because, if we decree that we will have no bank, what will be the result? Why, sir, if we do not find a sufficient currency for the transaction of the business of the State, the same amount will be furnished by banks in other States. If we do not find four or five millions of paper, Ohio and Kentucky, and other States, will furnish it. The merchants and traders of these States will come here and buy up our produce, leaving us the money which they circulate, and the bankers of these States will reap all the profit of the circulation. It follows, then, that inasmuch as we cannot, by any act of our own, prevent the existence of paper currency, it is our duty to regulate, in the best manner we can, that which we know must exist in spite of us. And another reason why we should do so, is this. There is a considerable profit arising from banking, particularly from transactions in bills of exchange. Some bank must have that profit; because, according to the present laws of trade, it is impossible to dispense with them. And is it not better that that profit should be paid to bankers of our own, where the capital stock would be liable to taxation for the benefit of the State, than go somewhere else? That, sir, in my opinion, is a knock-down argument upon this question. We must, therefore, have banks; for the plain reason that we cannot prevent bank paper from circulating among us.

If then we are to have banks, the next question is, what system is it best we should adopt? and I will now address myself more particularly to my anti-bank friends. I say that if they are consistent with themselves, if they really mean that a metallic currency, or the nearest approximation to a metallic currency is desirable, then I say they are bound to sustain the proposition for free banking; for, in the very nature of things, it is impossible to resort at once from a paper to a metallic currency. We find a paper currency existing here. It is incorporated into our system; if we were a commonwealth by ourselves, and if our Legislature could control the whole subject, it would be inexpedient for us to think of resorting at once from a paper to a metallic currency. We must do it gradually, and that is the reason why this system demands the assistance of those who place themselves in what is called the anti-bank position.

Mr. BORDEN, (in his seat.) In other words, those who call themselves the "specie men."

Mr. HOWE. Will the "specie men," then, if that term suits gentlemen better. I say that if that is their object, they are bound to sustain the system of free banks instead of setting themselves up against it.

Now the usual objection against a paper circulation, founded upon bank currency or bank paper, is founded upon two or three propositions; and these are in the mouths of all those who oppose the bank paper circulation. In the first place it is contended that it is a monopoly. That is the first and the most forcible objection with them. Another objection is that the amount of money in circulation is constantly fluctuating and liable to change. And there is a third objection, that in by far the greater number of cases where banks have been wound up, they have been wound up with a loss to the bill holder—that the bill holders have sustained a loss, while whatever assets there may have been, have been divided among more favored creditors. Now, all these objections, so far as they can be obviated, are obviated by the free bank system, and therefore I think those gentlemen who are opposed to all banking, seeing that it is impossible entirely to dispense with banks, are bound to act with us on this question. If a man holds any particular opinion with regard to any important question in society, whether that question be a political or a social one, and he knows that it cannot be carried out immediately, is he not bound to carry it out proximatively, so far as it can be done, and in the only way in which it can be carried out. This system then obviates all these three objections. And I would here say that so far as this question of security is concerned, I for one, am for making it not only ample, but beyond all doubt. I am for excluding for at least fifteen years, all securities except State and United States stocks, bearing six per cent. interest, taken at the lowest price which they have borne within the last twelve months, and in no instance above par; and with such security it is morally clear that there can be no loss to the bill holder. It is quite true that stocks fluctuate; that they depreciate and appreciate; but there is more probability that they will rise in value by this operation than that they will depreciate. At all events there is a certainty—an absolute assurance that the bill holder will be secure. There is no doubt about it. Every one who reflects at all upon the subject, admits this at once. If there be any objection to the system, the want of security to the bill holder cannot be an objection, for that must be ample, beyond doubt.

Now, as to the question of monopoly, that also will be entirely obviated. Under a law of this kind, every one will have a right to bank, if he has money enough. Yes sir, he may bank till dooms day if he pleases. All the privileges that have ever been given to a bank, are the right to sue and be sued in its corporate capacity, and to issue bills. The right of banking is a right which every man has at common law; and this system instead of extending the right, restricts it. It is not a system of "free banking" in the meaning of that term, but a restriction of all banking. It simply enables a corporation to bank upon certain terms and restrictions. It is not by any means necessary that in order to bank, the banker should be a corporation. It may be an association of A, B, & Co., or it may be Mr A, alone. It is clear then, that it should not be called a system of free banking, but a restriction of banking. So far therefore, as the objection of monopoly is concerned, I think it is wholly obviated.

There is one other objection which is also obviated by this system, and to which I will allude namely, that under this restrictive system, there is not the same danger of the expansion and contraction of this currency. Now, here is a real practical question involved in this case. The danger arising from free banks is the too sudden contraction of the currency; and if all the States in the Union, were to adopt this system at once, there might be some danger to be apprehended from this source. This, however, is not to be expected, although this will ultimately be the system in all the States, I think there is little question. It is a movement which will as assuredly follow as that time passes on. As I have already said, the danger is not of the expansion of the currency, but of its contraction.

Now, it was observed by some gentleman on this floor, that on an exhibit of the affairs of the State of New York, there was found a much less proportion of specie than in our bank, or in the safety fund banks. And, sir, admitting that to be the case, let me ask what does it prove? It proves that there was greater confidence on the part of the bill holder, and not the same demand for specie, and therefore, that the free banks could keep out a larger amount of issue than other banks in proportion to their specie on hand, but if this system be adopted, there must be less paper out than there is now. Of course all paper should represent something—either specie or credit. Our State Bank represents both. It represents thirty-three and one-third per cent. specie, and sixty-six and two-thirds per cent. credits. It is true that the dollar bill and the specie dollar may circulate closely together, and why? Not because the bill is intrinsically worth as much as the specie, but because the paper dollar will at any time demand the specie dollar. Thus all the objections which gentlemen urge against any system of banking are obviated by the system which we propose, and I contend that as consistent men, if those who are opposed to banking generally, really believe what they say, they are bound to abandon their position and to sustain us.

Mr. President, I shall occupy but little more time in what I have to say on this question, because I do not know that my arguments will convince anybody. If a man really wishes to become acquainted with this subject he should take it up and investigate it for himself. If he cannot satisfy himself from his own reflection and reading, I am very doubtful whether he can ever be satisfied by any argument that can be made orally. I have only to repeat that I shall vote for that system which appears to me to give the fullest security to the bill holder; and I shall vote for no system of security unless it be upon stocks of some kind. I am utterly opposed to the system of bonds and mortgages. This may answer in the State of New York, where there is a much larger currency than there is here and where money is seeking investments, and where mortgages at two-fifths of the real value of the estate will always find a purchaser. I say such a system of things may do there; but it will not do here. The only proper kind of security is that which can be converted into cash without resorting to a legal remedy. It is clear then that security on bonds and mortgages although it may have answered in New York, will never answer the purpose here. There may be a time, if we progress as we have progressed, when the whole amount of the currency will be larger than it is now and sufficient to warrant bankers in taking mortgages at two-fifths of the real value. But such a state of things does not now exist; and it may never exist at all until we become a commercial and manufacturing, as well as an agricultural people. Whenever you have commerce and manufactories flourishing in the country then you will have money in abundance; but we are not so situated at present, and therefore I am opposed to anything like security upon bonds and mortgages. If the first section of this report should be passed, then I shall move the following proposition:

"The branches of any State Bank established under this article shall be mutually liable for the redemption of each other's notes, and all other banks established under this article shall be required to deposit with some officer of State ample security for the redemption of their notes: Provided, That for the first twelve years, after the adoption of this Constitution, stocks of the United States or of the different States, shall be alone received as such security, and at their lowest market value, and not above par."

That is the system that I shall go upon; and I shall vote against any other, because with a system of that kind there will be ample security to the bill holder beyond doubt.

Now, sir, there is only one other question about which I will say a few words. It seems to be the opinion that we shall carry the system of restrictive banking; but the only question is, whether we are to leave the question of chartering the State Bank open. Now I am in favor of adhering to one system or the other—especially to the system of free banking. And I will say in addition, that the great danger is that the free banks will not be able to hold themselves up if they are opposed by a State Bank. That is the real difficulty; and I think it is better to give them a fair field, for it will be necessary to give them all the aid that we can, with the severe restrictions which we shall impose upon them. If we cannot give them that aid alone, then we must leave the question of the chartering of the State Bank open. In any event, however, whether we adopt the system of free banking—so called, or have a free and a State Bank system together the free banks will need all the nurture and fostering care that we can give them, and the only real danger, as I have already intimated, is that instead of furnishing an expanded currency they will not be able to furnish sufficient for the business requirements of the State.

There are abstractly considered but two legitimate objects to be gained by a paper currency; first, by means of paper bills representing precisely the same nominal amount of specie, and not one-third of its amount in specie and two-thirds credit, thus avoiding the fallacy of basing currency on specie and fluctuating credit. Secondly, by means of such a paper currency the expense and inconvenience of transporting and carrying specie, and the great loss by friction and wear are avoided. These are the only legitimate objects to be gained by banking, if indeed a system effecting the above objects can be called "banking." I venture to predict that this system will be ultimately adopted. It is perfection in theory, and will be ultimately attained in practice. The notion of having a specie or metallic currency alone in a commercial and civilized country like the United States is utterly out of the question. Even a paper currency like the present, founded on specie and credit, is more desirable than a metallic one. The truth is that a mere metallic currency would be impracticable.

The system of free banking, so called, leads us towards the adoption of the paper currency alone indicated, when paper dollars represent in all cases specie dollars; and for that reason, if there were no other, it ought to be adopted.

If the system is adopted, however, I am not prepared to believe that there will be any permanent, serious, or injurious scarcity of currency. If this be the case for a time, as it probably will, the deficiency will be made up from abroad, if our business and productions demand it, and if the free banks on the long run should not furnish currency enough, the evil would be less than if they furnished too much.

On the whole this system puts banking on the most rational ground it can be placed; obviates, so far as they can be obviated, all the objections commonly urged against it, and is the first step towards its entire suppression, and the substitution of a better and safer system; and when that takes place the whole of the present vicious system of credit, of which banking as now practised forms a large part, must fall with it, or be followed by a safer and better one.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but simply a very few remarks; and I assure the Convention, that I make them under somewhat embarrassing circumstances. The gentleman who has just taken his seat, said that he expected nobody would be convinced by his arguments. Now it must be exceedingly embarrassing for any man to undertake to do an act from which he expected no good to result, and that, I must admit, is in part, my position. I shall, however, endeavor to be brief in what I have to say.

I will notice, Mr. President, some of the positions of the gentlemen who have preceded me in the discussion of this question, who favor a State Bank. I hardly think it is worth my while to make any reply to the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) from the fact that the advantage he has over me is so great that it would be entirely useless. The gentleman is proverbially notorious as a man of honesty; and certainly anything that I can say is not likely to receive much consideration with the gentlemen of this Convention compared with what was said by the gentleman from Decatur. But, sir, I would notice one or two remarks which fell from that gentleman.

The gentleman in comparing the issues of banks, spoke with a great deal of confidence of the issues of the State Bank of Indiana, and he asks, "where is the farmer who would not prefer a note of the State Bank to a bond of the State?" The farmers would undoubtedly prefer it because it would answer their convenience better than the bond would; but they certainly would not prefer it on the score of security, because that bank has now a circulation of two and a half dollars for every one dollar of actual capital. Thus making the actual capital which is pledged or deposited for the redemption of the paper of this bank, not more than forty cents for every dollar issued. If that be ample security, then I do not understand what security is. Sir, if the gentleman will look back but a very short period in the history of the country, he will find another instance in which the same argument might have been used, and indeed was used. I refer to the United States Bank. When that bank was in operation he would undoubtedly then say to the farmer, in tendering him a note of that bank, "This note is good beyond all question. Here it is; it passes at par all over the United States, and is almost as good in England as Bank of England paper itself." So undoubtedly was said of the State Bank of Pennsylvania, and now we have seen that the issues of these banks were not actually worth ten cents on the dollar. Now, sir, let me say that so far from the farmers of our country desiring such a circulation as this, they feel that they have been altogether imposed upon by money of that kind, and they look with anxiety for the establishment of a system which shall be founded upon a more solid basis.

Then the gentleman objects to the system established in New York, because some nine or ten of these banks have failed.

Mr. WALPOLE. Yes forty-eight of them.

Mr. SHOUP. Well, I have not examined the matter so attentively as to be able to state the precise number; but, sir, if so many of them have failed it is tolerably good evidence to me that banking has not been very profitable to them at all events, however profitable others may be able to make it. Yes, sir, the business was doubtlessly too honest for them, and they wanted to get out of it and go into some other. If they had had powers under a corporation by which they could have realized thirty-five or forty per cent. would they have closed their business? Certainly not. And this, sir, again shows that the free banking system is the proper one. Sir, the gentleman from Decatur charges gentlemen upon this floor who are in favor of the free banking system, with having put on a pair of spectacles with one eye, and that they are looking to the interest of the Wall Street broker alone, and to that of the bond holder. Sir, I do not know that this is a fact, I am not personally acquainted with any gentleman who entertains any such views upon this floor, and I can assure the gentleman from Decatur that the only reason why I advocate the system of free banking is, because I believe it will contribute to the interests of my constituents. But if gentlemen choose to speak of the motives of others they should remember that they are liable to retort, and I might therefore say that the gentleman himself had got on the "one-eyed spectacles" and was perhaps looking deep into the vaults of the State Bank of Indiana for a large fee. [Laughter and applause from the free bankers.] I have now done with the gentleman from Decatur.

I will now notice a few positions of the gentleman from Vanderberg (Mr. Lockhart). That gentleman commenced his speech on yesterday morning in a calm, pleasant, and interesting manner. He set out with the proposition that the present Constitution was framed under the most favorable circumstances, and at a most favorable time; and I drew the inference from his argument that the framers of that instrument accomplished a work which could not be bettered, and that therefore, he is in favor of the section in the old Constitution on this subject, and consequently in favor of a State Bank. Sir, so far as I am concerned I must say that I do not believe any such doctrine. I believe that we are living in age of progression, and perhaps greater improvements have been made in the system of banking within the last twenty-five years than in anything else. Sir, what was the situation of our community when Gen. Jackson stopped the United States Bank? I was taking the paper of that bank every day and passing it off at the counter, being under the fullest impression that the United States were bound for the redemption of the notes. And such, sir, was not my impression only, but it was the impression I am satisfied of a very large majority of the people of the United States. The mistake however was found out, and the loss lead the people to inquire into the reason of it. The question has been examined by the people, and as a consequence the system of banking has undergone a great improvement. We live now in a new generation. One generation has passed away since the old Constitution was framed, and if we have not leaped something in that time we must admit that we are not very apt scholars. Sir, the doctrine of the gentleman from Vanderburgh, is simply the old doctrine of going to mill with one end of the bag filled with grain, and the other with stones.

A MEMBER. I would suggest "rocks."

MR. SHOUP. Very well; "rocks" then, if that word suits the gentleman's taste any better, although I believe in calling all things by their proper names. Sir, I believe that we are progressing—that we are making valuable improvements upon the old Constitution with regard to banks. The gentleman from Vanderburgh says that the free bank system had been tested at the time the old Constitution was framed, and as an illustration, he calls attention to the banks of Kentucky. But, sir, let me say that the system adopted in Kentucky bore no resemblance to the system of free banking as we propose it. There was nothing of free banking belonging to it. Such an assertion might do if the gentleman was pleading a cause before a petit justice of the peace or a petit jury of the country, but it will not answer here.

Again, sir, the gentleman from Vanderburgh says that if we adopt the free banking system, every county in the State will have a "shaving shop," or in other words, a "shin plaster" establishment within it. Now what is a shin plaster? If I understand correctly what is meant by it it is a piece of paper representing a credit for money when there is nothing to redeem it with; and when a bank is permitted to issue eight or ten dollars for one of her capital, or even three to one, I say that every dollar issued over and above the actual capital of the bank to redeem it, is a shin plaster. Now let us take two bills—one of the State Bank, and one of a free bank as we propose to establish it, and make a comparison between them. We find that the one has an issue of two dollars and a half for one of her capital. On the other hand we take the note of the free bank system, and we ask ourselves the question, "which is the most responsible?" Here in the free bank system we have dollar for dollar held by a third party under the free bank system as a security to the bill holder, while under the State Bank system for every dollar which is secured there is a dollar and a half unrepresented by any security whatever. Sir, if this be so, and it cannot be denied, it needs no extraordinary discrimination to prove that the State Bank comes much nearer the definition of a shaving shop or a shin plaster establishment, than banks established under that system which proposes that not a single dollar of paper shall be issued for which the most ample security is not deposited.

In reference to the banks that have closed in the State of New York, the gentleman further remarks that they have only paid seventy-five cents on the dollar of their issues. Well, sir, admit that to be true, and what do we see on the other side? Why, sir, if you take the average amount that has been paid to the note holders of your banks that have failed throughout the country, you will find that it does not amount to more than twenty cents on the dollar, [Applause.] The free banking system, therefore, is better; because in case of failure it pays a larger dividend. [Renewed applause.]

Sir, when this system was first introduced in the State of New York, it was entirely new; the bankers loaning money to persons to pay off their old debts, could not make these loans available in time, and hence their failure; and so will it ever be—for I hold that no bank can ever succeed that makes loans of that kind. But, sir, such will not be the case again. The gentleman from Vanderburgh also read to the Convention an account of the sale of stocks, and asks gentlemen what they would think of taking stocks as security that were selling at twenty-six cents to the dollar. Now I regret that the credit of the State of Indiana should ever have been so far reduced as that her stocks should have been sold at twenty-six cents on the dollar; but I am bound to believe that such a state of things never can, and never will occur again, from the fact that the Convention has adopted a section which I think will forever prevent it. They have put down a stake that I think will hold the matter fast. They have said that the Legislature shall never have power to borrow money on the credit of the State for any purpose except that of repelling invasion. With this constitutional provision our present stocks cannot fail to be regarded as the best kind of security—better even than gold. We have nothing therefore to fear from that kind of security.

The gentleman next arrays the State Bank system against the New York system, by telling us that in the State of New York there are eighteen dollars in paper issued for one of specie for their redemption. Now what is the fact? I tell the gentleman that that only proves that they have dollar for dollar as security for the redemption of all their paper, and 18 per cent. into the bargain; because for every dollar that is put into circulation there is a dollar deposited in the hands of a third party for its redemption; and even if they have only one dollar in specie for every eighteen of paper, it is so much additional security to the note holder.

I will now notice a few of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Switzerland (Mr.

Kelso.) The gentleman asks where we are to obtain our bonds? and he goes upon the presumption that we are to borrow them from the State herself in order that we may bank upon them; and he then goes on with a long tirade with the view of showing the large amount which the people would be annually taxed to pay the interest on these bonds. Now, sir, I do not believe that there is a single man upon this floor that advocates the system of free banking who thinks of getting a single dollar from the State. It cannot be done. Now let us look at the gentleman's argument for a moment, and see how far it is calculated to mislead. He makes it out that the sum in which the State will be involved in a given number of years will be over a hundred millions of dollars. This is extravagant enough it is true; but I would just remind the gentleman that even if the State should loan her bonds for any such purpose—which by the way cannot be done—she would charge interest upon those bonds, and one interest account would balance the other. But, sir, we do not require anything of that kind. The gentleman then speaks of the large amount of bank capital that will be necessary, and he classifies each of the towns; he puts some of them at $20,000, and some at $50,000, and others at $100,000, and others again at $500,000, and in summing up the whole matter he makes it out that by these free banks we shall have a circulation of $9,000,000, and little else than bonds to redeem it with. Now, sir, what are the real facts of the case? Does not every man believe that our present circulation is more than that amount, if we take into consideration the paper of Ohio and Virginia, and Kentucky, and other States which is circulating among us in addition to the issues of our own State Bank? And, sir, if we have that much of a circulation, and with it all find that it is not enough, that we need it all, and yet more in order to accommodate the business of the country, need we be alarmed at the amount which the gentleman from Switzerland summed up.

Then the gentleman notices some of the difficulties of the present State Bank charter, in relation to the location of branches; but, sir, no man would like to have a partner forced upon him unless he had a choice in the partnership. I regard that as a healthy provision of the charter; yet, if I understand the gentleman from Switzerland aright, he complained that the Legislature had not power to establish branches wherever they pleased. I cannot but think that were the gentleman in the Legislature, and were an effort being made to renew the bank charter, he would be in favor of that principle. It would not be right for the Legislature to have the power of locating branches wherever they pleased, without the consent of the bank. And to wind up with, and convince us beyond all doubt, the gentleman from Switzerland arrayed before us a large number of figures by way of showing the comparative advantages between a State and free banks. Perhaps he did this upon the principle that facts and figures do not lie. I can only say that the figures lie when the facts are left out; and I must say that in the gentleman's calculation, I think the facts were not there.

I will now hastily notice a remark which was made by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson). The gentleman thinks that the free banks cannot be sound; that they cannot maintain their circulation or redeem their money with gold and silver from the fact that most of our surplus produce is to be sold at the Ohio river. Now I cannot see any reason in this; for if a bank in the interior of the country loans a man $20,000 to buy wheat, the man who borrows the money having given his bill duly endorsed, receives the cash, which he pays over to the farmer; and the farmer is then enabled to pay his hired hands, and all his little bills, and thus the money would go into circulation, the banker in the course of, say, ninety days receiving Eastern funds or credits for the amount. If, therefore, any preference is to be given to banks on that score, I should say that banks in the interior could be more easily maintained than banks located on our borders.

The gentleman from Putnam further remarks that the farmers want a State Bank; the State, however, not to be a partner. Now, Mr. President, I am wholly opposed to the name of the State being used, if she has no interest in the bank. Certainly not. Why does a corporation of this character desire to use the name of the State? Why, sir, merely for the purpose of giving credit to their circulation abroad, so that it may be the more easily imposed upon the credulous and unsuspecting. Sir, if the State is not to be a partner I am opposed to her name being used, because it would be a lie upon its very face.

Mr. President, the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) made an interesting speech yesterday, to which I listened with much attention. I do not believe that any other gentleman listened with more interest than I did, and I will notice one or two of the remarks which he then made. One objection which he makes to the free bank system in comparison with the State bank system is, that the independent system is not free to all; that it is not as much so as the present State Bank; because, he says, the books of the present State Bank can be opened in any town, and the farmer can come up and invest his fifty or hundred dollars in its stock, which he alledges cannot be done under the free banking system, because the least bond issued is for a thousand dollars. Now, in this, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. Suppose that we choose to raise a company under the free bank system, what is necessary to be done? Why, sir, that each man should subscribe his $25, or $50, or $100, just as he is able; that the bonds should be purchased, and that each man should receive a profit proportionate to the amount of his capital invested. Certainly the man who has fifty dollars can invest it under this system just as well as the man who has a thousand dollars. There is no monopoly about it. Sir, this is very like what I would call special pleading. I am no lawyer, but the gentleman from Shelby is, and perhaps he takes short cuts, but they are neither so short nor so deep that the bottom of them cannot be seen. The gentleman, in declaiming against the free banks of New York, says that the appraisement was made when the stocks were low, and that as the business of the country increased and prospered, the value of the stocks increased also; that when on the failure of some of these banks the stocks were sold at forced sale they only realized a greatly reduced price. Now I was under the impression that the stocks were taken at their par value. The gentleman says there was a loss upon the stocks, yet these stocks brought 49 cents and 8 mills, so that they could not be appraised at 20 cents to the dollar.

Again, sir: the gentleman from Shelby asserts that competition increases prices and reduces amounts. Now, Mr. President, if the gentleman refers to competition in banking, does he mean that it is to increase the rates upon which we are to borrow money, and to reduce the amount of circulation? Is that the inference?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will explain to him what I said and what I meant.

Mr. SHOUP. Oh certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I said that competition in the ordinary business of the country increased quantities and reduced prices, while competition in banking would have the opposite effect.

Mr. SHOUP. I do not understand it so. Competition, if I understand it, increases the value of the product in your market for sale. If there are five or ten customers for your wheat, will you not be likely to obtain more for it than if there be only one? Every gentleman must admit that that would be so.

Now, Mr. President, the gentleman from Shelby also makes allusion to a gentleman now in our city who has had a great deal to do with our State bonds; and from his remarks, one might understand him to mean that this gentleman had advocates upon this floor. Sir, I do not believe anything of the kind. I believe that the delegates who are here advocating the free bank system, are doing so from the purest motives of interest to the people—believing that it is to their interest to furnish them with a sound circulating medium.

Mr. President, it is very evident that, heretofore, it has been the interest of stockholders in banks to fail. They generally were large borrowers from these banks; and when a failure came, they would pay in the depreciated paper at par, by buying up the circulation, and thus reaping large profits from the operation. We see, then, that, under this old mode, it is the interest of the bankers to fail. But, sir, how is it with the free banker? Is it his interest to fail? No, sir; because his security is given in full. It is his interest to do his business honestly, and in such a manner that he himself may not sustain any loss.

Now, Mr. President, what are the facts with regard to bonds? These are to be looked to as a principal security under this free banking system; and, sir, if you examine the state of the market since the year 1791, you will find that the average market value of the bonds of the several States of this Government will average eighty-five cents to the dollar. Sir, there is no great loss here, and there can be no such loss as gentlemen speak of.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the gentleman from Franklin that his time has expired.

On motion, the rule was suspended.

Mr. SHOUP (resuming). I was not aware, Mr. President, that I had spoken so long; and as the Convention has been kind enough to suspend the rule, I will promise gentlemen that I will not trespass much longer upon their attention. I have but a few more remarks to make; and I will now proceed to notice one position which was assumed by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster). That gentleman advocates a State Bank, and he does so in a very ardent manner; because, says he, large profits are made by banking; and, if profits are to be made, they should be made by the State, and not by individuals. Now, if the object of our State Government is to make profits, why, then, let her take at once into her hands the merchandise of the country, and realize a profit from that. [Loud applause from the free bankers.] But, sir, I hold that the State should not engage in any traffic, but confine herself to her legitimate duty—that of securing equal rights and privileges to each citizen of the State. [Applause.]

Now, I will notice for a moment the principles contained in the proposition which I introduced some days ago:

"The business of banking shall be free to all on such terms as the Legislature may impose."

Now, if it is right to bank—and I regard it merely as a commercial transaction—if it is right for five, or ten, or five hundred men to engage in such a business, it is right that every man may do it; and the Convention, a few days ago, has fairly settled this question, by providing that no privilege shall be granted to an individual, or to a class, that shall not be granted to the whole. I presume that this principle will be carried out; and if so, the only banking business that can be done, can be done upon the terms which I have laid down.

Now, the first restriction is, that no banker or banking company shall be allowed by law to receive any greater interest than individuals are allowed to receive. Now, certainly this is right. I believe that no gentleman will controvert this point.

The second restriction is, that all bills or notes issued by any bank shall be registered by some proper officer, and security taken for the redemption of the same. Now, if the Legislature hold to this provision, the note holder can have no fear. The farmer or mechanic, when he takes this money, will know that there is sufficient security in reserve; and that, though the officers of these banks may be rascals and disposed to cheat, they cannot do it, because a third party holds the security on behalf of the note holder.

The third restriction is, that the stockholders shall be individually liable for the notes issued. Some gentlemen are afraid that this takes too broad a ground. I say it is perfectly right. Sir, if you and I should enter into a partnership to manufacture woollen or cotton goods, we would of course be individually responsible for the debts of the business. And gentlemen engaged in banking should be subject to the same restrictions; for I hold that no privilege should be given to gentlemen engaged in banking, which individuals engaged in manufacturing, or any other business, cannot enjoy. Instead of the individual responsibility of the stockholders being made an objection, I think it is a great advantage. It would give credit to your notes, and make them of the very best character.

The fourth restriction is, that the bill holder shall have preference in payment over all other creditors, in case of failure. This is certainly right. The honest laborer, who toils day by day for the little that he earns, when he gets his money at the close of the week, ought to know that it is good, and not subject to a shaming operation by the brokers. Such, sir, I am sorry to say, has not been the case formerly. Thousands and millions of dollars have been lost to the laborer by these rotten institutions.

The fifth restriction is, that no law shall be passed authorizing the suspension of specie payments. I do not think it right that the Legislature should at any time have power to authorize a bank to suspend specie payments; but that, when a bank can no longer meet the demands against it, it should close up its affairs and settle up as far as its means will reach.

These are my views, and I hope they will meet with the approbation of the Convention.

Mr. STEELE. I do not rise to make a bank speech. One of the evils of banking, I am told by gentlemen on this floor, and I have learned it by experience, is over issue. There is a doubt rising in my mind on the present occasion, whether we are not over issuing in this Convention. Let us inquire for a moment. I have heard it as an old adage, "that too much of one thing is good for nothing;" and I think from the numerous amendments in the hands of gentlemen, that we had better cease our batteries and pass over the muddy stream, for there is something better for us on the other side. Why then hesitate, and stand so long on this side of the stream? Every exertion that is made by gentlemen seems to produce more difficulty—to produce more muddy water and deeper sands, and makes the stream the worse to cross. Then let us cross at once. I have never been driven to the necessity of calling the previous question. [Several voices—"Don't you do it now."] It never has been called by me—never in my life. But, gentlemen, be assured that I have on the other side of the stream, which I have represented by similitude, all that is dear to me. I have there all I own—my children and my sweet-heart. [Loud applause.] Let us for once feel and think of sweet home. [Cries of "consent."] I do not desire, gentlemen, to dwell upon this question, nor do I want to make a bank speech. But I want the Convention to do this—to cross the stream this evening. [Cries of "no sir."] Will gentlemen agree to this? Well, I might give them a speech of an hour in length, before I quit the floor. I could do it, for I have thoroughly investigated this question in 1832. But, however, you will get no bank speech from me on the present occasion. If gentlemen will not stop the matter—if they will not make a bridge and cross the stream, let us do what we can do—make shorter speeches—let us come down to fifteen minutes speeches. We will hear you much better, and will gain more information than from those long speeches of an hour in length. We will then all have a chance of speaking. I have had a desire to say something from the beginning—it is, however, with great difficulty that I ever get the floor. I will say, too, that all my speeches have been uniformly short; so it is on the present occasion. I ask you as an old man—as a father, to stop these long speeches in order that we may get through with the business of the Convention at some day or other.

Mr. BARBOUR said, If it were not, Mr. President, for the deep interest which the people of Indiana must necessarily feel in this question, I should not at this time, obtrude any remarks upon the Convention. I regard it as one of the questions that we are here to settle. I regard it as one of the greatest questions that can ever interest the people of Indiana, that is, a sound circulating medium. The people of Indiana must have a currency—they must have it from some quarter. It must be furnished either by a State Bank and branches, or by some other banking institution, or by both, or by the banking institutions of other States.

What would be the condition of your State, without a currency? What would be the price of the produce of your farmers? It would be cut down to sacrificing prices. I have some little knowledge of the course of trade in Indiana, and what has been my experience, I will endeavor to put before the Convention, that they may have the benefit of it.

Ours is essentially an agricultural State. Our farmers raise a large surplus for foreign markets. There must then be something with which to buy this surplus. That is a proposition which none will deny. And where, sir, are we to obtain the means of purchasing the surplus products of the State, unless it be furnished by means of banking capital? Take for instance the pork trade. This portion of the products of the farmer is offered in market mainly in the month of December. It requires a large capital to buy it. Our wealthier dealers do not keep a surplus on hand for the purpose of this trade. They look to the banks to furnish them a currency for this purpose. But by means of bank facilities, the number of purchasers are increased and the farmer reaps the benefit of an increased competition in the market.

It is not for the benefit of banks and bankers, that I advocate banking institutions. It is solely for the purpose of increasing the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests of our people. Banks do not add directly to the wealth of the community. They do not raise an ear of corn, or a grain of wheat, or make a plow. But they furnish means to the purchasers of the produce of the country by which competition is excited, and thus the farmer is enabled to realize better prices. This adds to the wealth of the farmer—excites his industry—stimulates his enterprise, and promotes the prosperity of the State. But bring about a stringent state of the money market, and the produce of the county must necessarily feel its effects. Sir, it is my opinion that if the present State Bank and branches could have furnished a sufficient currency to have bought the surplus products of the farmer during the present pork season, that pork along the Wabash Valley, would have commanded twenty-five cents more on the 100 lbs. There will be packed along the Wabash this season, over 180,000 hogs. The additional price on this single article, would have made the handsome sum of $75,000, which would have went into the pockets of the farmers. It will be in vain to tell the farmers they are not benefited by this operation. So stringent has been the money market along the Wabash, that while this Convention has been in session, individuals from my section of country have been to Cincinnati, and brought from that city large amounts of money in sums of ten, twenty, and thirty thousand dollars, which has been employed in the single article of pork. Doubtless many, of whom I have no knowledge, have done the same thing. As an evidence of this scarcity of money, bills of exchange which ordinarily sell here in the west from a cent to a cent and a-half premium, have sold at par, and in some cases, at a discount. They were for a time, below par in the great commercial city of Cincinnati. Sir, it is a fact within my knowledge, that when the currency of our banks has been exhausted, the price of this staple product has sensibly declined. It cannot be otherwise. Strike out the currency furnished by our banks, amounting to about $4,000,000, can any one doubt that it would result in serious injury to the State. Such a heavy draft on our circulation would seriously affect prices. This vacuum might be partially supplied from other States. But not in sufficient quantities to meet the wants of trade. And who, I would ask, suffers by this? The tiller of the soil; and consequent every other interest in its train.

It is our duty, as was remarked by the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) to furnish our people with a currency. A currency we must have. If we do not supply the currency by means of our banking institutions, the currency or bank paper of other States, will flow in upon us. You may erect a cordon of forts around the State and multiply swarms of officers sufficient to eat out the substance of the people, and you cannot keep out the notes of specie paying banks of other States. The only effectual way to keep out, to any considerable extent, the currency of banks out of our State, is to supply ourselves with a currency of our own. By supplying that currency adequate to the wants of our community, we will, in a great measure, effect this. Can any one doubt for a moment, that our people prefer a proper circulation of their own to the paper money of other States—banking institutions of their own, over which they can have some control—the condition of which they may inquire into—officers whose conduct they may from time to time inspect?

The question then is, how can we best supply that currency? By a State Bank and branches—by free banks, or by both? I would advocate a system of free banks, but I am no enemy of a State Bank. My action here will always be taken with a view to the best interests of those I represent. My first choice would be free banks. If we had sufficient capital for that purpose, I would say dispense with the State Bank entirely. But we have not sufficient banking capital to rely on that system exclusively, as I shall attempt to show before I conclude. I wish the gentlemen from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) in his zeal for a State Bank, had shown us on what it would be founded. Where are we to obtain the capital stock for such a bank, on which to base her circulation.

The present State Bank was based on foreign capital—money that the State borrowed. This money in process of time, must be paid. Then where is the State to obtain money for banking purposes? This Convention has adopted a section prohibiting the State from borrowing money, except in cases of emergency.

The gentleman from Decatur advocated that restriction; yet before we have closed the labors of this Convention, that restriction is rising up in judgment against us. I opposed that restriction. I thought it unwise at the time, and that we might safely leave it to the people to say whether it was to their interest to borrow money or not. I would again repeat, I should be pleased to hear from that gentleman where the State is to obtain money for a State Bank. Is the State to have no capital, no currency in it? If so, why call it a State Bank? Any other name would do as well.

So far as I desire the establishment of a State Bank, I wish to see it arranged on principles similar to the present. It is generally conceded that the mutual liability principle is a good feature in our State Bank charter. It induces care and prudence in the management of the bank. It brings together men of talent from different portions of the State—men of experience, acquainted with the wants of trade; enables them to take a comprehensive view of the currency of the State, and to lend their assistance to any branch which may need their protection. It gives character and credit to the currency of any branch throughout the entire State, and, to a considerable extent, abroad. As an individual, I would prefer owning stock in a bank which was in no way responsible for the liabilities of other banks; more especially if it were established at a convenient point, where there were men experienced in the business of trade and banking. But as a public man, desiring to give our currency a more general character, and a wider circulation, the mutual liability principle should be adhered to.

As a necessary consequence of this principle, the Legislature should have no power to establish branches at their pleasure. If such a power be reserved to the Legislature, it would absolutely prohibit the investment of any capital in such a bank. The Legislature could never know, with that certainty which is requisite, when a branch could be safely established—where the business of the country required it—where prudent capitalists could be found to manage it. But where self-interest prompts—where men are to be responsible for the failure or mismanagement of any bank, they would take good care that such bank be located at a point of trade, where there are good and responsible men, acquainted with the business of banking, to conduct it. The very apprehension that the Legislature might exercise such a power unadvisedly, would prevent prudent capitalists from investing. With such a reservation, you might have a bank charter, but no bank.

In what consists the safety of the funds of the State, in this institution? Most unquestionably, in the self-interest of the individual stockholders. The bank directory, representing the individual stock-holders, control the institution. This is as it should be. If the individual stock-holders make profits, the State must. By promoting their own interest, they necessarily make the capital of the State profitable. The gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Foster) says the State should own the entire capital, and make all the profits. This would never do. You must have a majority of the men who manage the affairs of the bank, interested in making the stock profitable. Where is your surplus revenue fund, loaned out by the agents of the State? Almost wholly lost. And such would be the condition of a bank, in which the State was alone interested. The capital would be soon squandered.

Mr. President, I now propose to make a brief comparison between the two systems of banking, showing the comparative safety, to the bill-holder, in each—the difference in the increase of circulation of the one over the other, on the same actual capital, and the consequent profit accruing from that increased circulation. Take a State Bank of a capital of $200,000—on the principle that she issues two dollars and a half of paper money, for every dollar of specie in her vaults, she puts in circulation $500,000 of paper money. But how does the currency get into circulation? By discounting bills of exchange and promissory notes. What, then, has the bank, to redeem this circulation of $500,000? She has the $200,000 of specie in her vaults, and the $500,000 of bills of exchange and promissory notes, making $700,000 to redeem a circulation of $500,000. Now, suppose a bank organized on the free banking principle, desires to put in circulation $500,000. How can she do it? In the first place, she must deposit with the Auditor of State, $500,000 in State stocks (which are worth a premium). Over and above the deposits of this stock, the bank must have an amount of specie in her vaults, sufficient to redeem her circulation, $200,000. Now, how do the notes of this bank get into circulation? In the same way as the notes of any other bank, by discounting bills of exchange and promissory notes. Now, what has this bank, to redeem her circulation? She has the same $200,000 in specie, the same $500,000 in promissory notes and bills of exchange, and in addition thereto, she has deposited with the Auditor of State a collateral security of $500,000 in stocks, which may be resorted to, in case the bank fails to meet her obligations by redeeming her bills in specie, at the counter of the bank. There is no reason that one bank will not be managed as honestly as the other. Is not the security, then, in the one case, immeasurably superior to that in the other? Suppose we destroy all the banks in this State, and Ohio, Kentucky and other States adopt free banks on the principles above indicated; would you not prefer the notes of the free banks, to those of any other? Would you not sleep sounder on a pile of free bank notes, than those of the old system of banking? The one has a security equal to its circulation, which cannot take wings and fly away.

This free bank, then, has an actual capital, in money and stocks, of $700,000, and a circulation of $500,000, $200,000 less than the actual capital of the bank, requisite to commence banking operations. Now, on the supposition that the people of Indiana own these stocks, to every $700,000 in money and stocks, (in the above proportion,) we might, on the free banking principle, increase the actual circulation $300,000. Now organize your State Bank, with a capital of $700,000. Two and one-half to one, on this specie basis, would produce a circulation of $1,750,000. But the capital of the bank, to wit, $700,000, is withdrawn from circulation, and put in the vaults of the bank, to redeem the paper currency. This amount, deducted from the paper circulation, would give an actual increase of the circulation of $1,050,000. But the increase of circulation, on the free banking principle, was only $300,000. The difference, then, in favor of the State Bank, in the increase of circulation, is $750,000. Now what is the comparative profit of the two banks, supposing each to keep out its full circulation? The free banks receive interest on the $500,000 of stock pledged, and on the $500,000 of circulation, making an interest on $1,000,000, while the State Bank receives an interest on her whole circulation of $1,750,000. Difference in favor of the State Bank, $750,000; on which the State Bank receives an interest, over and above what the free bank would receive.

Now, Mr. President, it has been asserted that banks organized on the principles of our State Bank are based on false principles, and that they cannot close with safety and security to the bill holder. If this be true, as gentlemen have asserted, who, I ask, would invest a dollar in your free banks? If the State Bank receiving an interest on $1,750,000, could not wind up solvently, how or in what condition would your free bank, receiving an interest on $1,000,000 only, close her affairs. Both have to make money by the same process—discounting notes and dealing in bills of exchange. The best evidence I have of the solvency of our State Bank is found in the fact, that the stockholders of this bank, some of whom I know to be prudent, careful, money making men, well acquainted with the condition of the bank, would not sell their stock at a premium of twenty per cent.

Now if we are to have an exclusive system of free banks, let us inquire into what would be the probable consequence of such an act. A very small amount of Indiana bonds or stocks are now owned by citizens of this State. Probably $250,000 would cover the amount of State stocks owned here. It will be necessary then to send specie abroad to purchase these stocks.

Some few owners of our stocks living abroad might come here to engage in the business of banking. But it can hardly be expected that the owners of our bonds will come here to engage in banking; they are engaged in a much heavier business at home than they could do in any of the cities of our State. They must be brought here mainly by our own citizens, and it will require specie to buy them. Where is this specie to come from? Indiana is a debtor State. In 1853 the interest on our foreign debt will exceed $300,000. This amount will be sent abroad in specie. This is a heavy drain on the surplus wealth of our State and one that taxes severely the energies of our people. The charter of our State Bank expires in 1857. The circulation at that time may be estimated at $5,000,000. This circulation would be then withdrawn. Can any one doubt the distress and suffering which such an arrangement of the currency would produce? Now let us see how suddenly and easily the free banks would supply this deficiency; fill up this vacuum. You want $5,000,000 in State stocks for your free banks; but you have not got them; you can only obtain them with $5,000,000 of specie. Is that specie in Indiana now, or will it be in Indiana then? No sane man believes it. But suppose by straining every nerve we raise $5,000,000, and purchase these bonds. We must then raise about $2,000,000 of specie in addition thereto, to put into the vaults of these banks to redeem their paper circulation of $5,000,000. Now what have we gained by this operation. We have got a paper circulation of $5,000,000, which has cost us a specie circulation of $7,000,000—$5,000,000 of which have been sent abroad, and $2,000,000 put into the vaults of the banks, thus producing an actual diminution of the currency of $2,000,000, apart from the $5,000,000 of paper currency lost in the demolition of the State Bank, making an actual loss to the currency in Indiana of $7,000,000. Of course there are not $5,000,000 in specie to send abroad to buy our stocks. But just to the extent that our specie goes abroad for that purpose, in like proportion will that currency be diminished. Such a course of policy would roll this community together as a scroll. It would ruin the debtor and put fortunes into the hands of the wealthy. There can be little doubt that an exclusive system of free banks would produce a stringent state of the money market in our State. We are not in the situation of New York. She is an old and wealthy State; capital is there seeking investment in stocks apart from the privilege of banking, obtaining simple interest only. But when is superadded to this, the privilege of banking by depositing these stocks as a collateral security, it increases very considerably the currency of banks. When we are out of debt and have a surplus wealth which is seeking investment at home and abroad, we can then rely on an exclusive system of free banks. Until then it would be better to leave it in the power of the Legislature to act as the interest of the State might require. I can see no objection to free banks; they are unquestionably based on sounder principles than any banks that have yet been organized. The business of the country absolutely requires additional banking facilities, and when that is the case, what is to prevent their going into operation. If good customers is all they want they won't go begging.

I will now mention one or two objections to free banks. It is said that the depositor or purchaser of a bill of exchange of the bank, in case of the failure of the bank, should come in equally with the bill-holder for a share of the proceeds of the State stock. This would be wrong, and at war with the principles on which free banks are founded—which is that of absolute security to the bill-holder. If the depositor, having deposited an amount equal to the entire circulation of the bank, could in case of the insolvency of the bank, come in for an equal share of the State stock, the bill-holder would lose fifty per cent. This imposes no hardship on the depositor. He is not compelled to deposit with the bank. If he does not consider the bank safe, he may deposit with some other bank, or with a merchant, or broker, and so with reference to bills of exchange. It is a matter of individual contract between the banker and depositor—and should stand on the same footing of any other contract. But that which circulates from hand to hand as money, taken by a confiding community, should have an exclusive claim on the stock pledged.

What objection can there be to leaving with the Legislature the authority to charter either, or both? The free banks are safe, and the State Bank has furnished a sound circulation by which the people have never lost a dollar. Where the State is to obtain capital for banking purposes, I do not know, unless we retrace our steps and expunge from the Constitution that restriction of the power of the people. It is said we may use the trust funds of the State. So far as those funds are outside of the bank they are in the hands of men who have mortgaged their farms to secure their payment, many of whom are but poorly able to pay any sudden calling in of these funds, would distress these borrowers, and cause a sacrifice of their farms. Could the present loan of the State made at five per cent., been continued, it would have been of very great advantage to our citizens, invested as heretofore in a State Bank in furnishing a currency to purchase the surplus of the State.

It is said that bills of exchange are the representatives of value, and that in that respect they bear a striking similitude to the circulation of free banks. Now these notes may represent value, as stocks are pledged for their ultimate redemption in case of the failure of the bank.

But certainly bills of exchange are not of this character in majority of cases. The customers of our banks, when they want accommodations for the produce trade, present to the banks promissory notes and bills of exchange, for discount. Sometimes a promissory note is presented in the first instance for discount, and is discounted by the bank with the understanding that it shall be taken up with a bill of exchange. Now which represents value, the bill of exchange, or the promissory note? The bill of exchange was but a continuance of the loan in part. The money was borrowed with the purpose of being invested in produce, yet the bank cannot control the application of the money. When the produce is sent forward and disposed of, the dealer can take up his bill. Some traders give a bill on long time in the first instance. He has nothing at the point where the bill is payable—but his intention is to purchase produce and send it forward to meet his bill. There is no value represented here. Banks, when they sell bills of exchange, generally act differently. They sell sight bills, and draw on actual deposits. Bills are sometimes drawn on consignments, and sometimes on the promise of consignments. A produce dealer here in the west might make an arrangement for his commission merchant in Boston to accept bills, promising to make shipments to meet them. These bills may be negotiated to the bank or to merchants who wish to make remittances. These bills are often paid before the produce comes to hand. They are in fact sometimes payable at sight. There is another species of bills of exchange. A house in New Orleans desiring to raise a sum of money, draws on a branch of his house in New York. The house in New York, when the bill matures, raises the money by negotiating a bill on the house in New Orleans. The two houses keep a bill flying backwards and forwards until they have effected the object of the loan. This is termed high-flying. The only effect of it is a loan of money. I shall not pursue the subject further, but think we ought to have power in the Legislature to charter both systems of banks if the commerce of the country should require it.

Mr. FOLEY. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech, but for the sake of getting a vote. I move to lay all the amendments on the table.

Mr. COOKERLY asked for a division of the question.

Mr. CARTER moved a call of the Convention. The motion was not agreed to.

The question being upon laying Mr. Borden's amendment on the table,

Mr. FOLEY. For the sake of allowing my friend from Allen to explain the nature of his amendment, I will withdraw my motion, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. BORDEN replied that he would. The proposition before the Convention made it obligatory upon the Legislature, he said, in case they passed a law chartering banks, to submit the matter to the people for their sanction. With that proviso, he would go for free banks; without it, he would go against them. A gentleman, observed Mr. B., says that "there is a provision already adopted which says that no matter shall be submitted to the people, unless as in this Constitution provided." I leave it to the gentleman from Monroe if there be not an express exception which is applicable to the case? I renew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The question being upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) upon the table, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 93, nays 29—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warwick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendrick, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Mower, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Mr. President—107.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berry, Bourne, Bracken, Chenoweth, Coats, Davis of Parke, Dick, Elliott, Harbolt, Kelso, McClelland, McFarland, Morrison of Marion, Ristine, Shoup, Smith of Scott, Taylor, and Wiley—18.

The amendment was accordingly laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I am satisfied that the first section, now under consideration, is as good a one as we will be able to get upon this subject. I have but a few words to say in reference to it. There is no necessity, in my opinion, to amend the first section at all. I am satisfied that the longer we delay with amendments, the farther we will be off from getting anything that is reasonable. For my part, being a friend of free banking, I am satisfied with the first section. I hope, at the proper time, the vote will be taken upon it. To the other sections, I shall offer some slight amendments, and will present a final section, before the article is disposed of. It being near night now, my purpose was more to get the floor, in order to say that when I get the floor to-morrow morning, I will move the previous question. I will now move to adjourn.

The motion was not sustained.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that, though it is not, perhaps, in the regular course, that a communication has been received by the Chair from the President of the State Bank, in reply to a resolution of inquiry adopted by this Convention, it supplies a portion of the information desired. Perhaps the Convention would wish to hear what is contained in it before they decide upon any question this evening.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I rise to make an inquiry for information. I want to know whether the vote is now to be taken upon the other pending amendment.

Mr. BORDON. The motion, I understand, was made to lay both amendments on the table; a division of the question was called for, and now the question is upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) on the table.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. That is right. The amendment was then read by the Secretary.

The communication was then read by the Secretary.

Mr. OWEN. I move to amend the section by striking it out, and inserting the following:

"The General Assembly not to have power to establish any bank, except on the following conditions: The State not to be a stock-holder; no bank bill, or note, shall issue for circulation until countersigned by the Auditor, nor until there shall have been deposited as security for the same, dollar for dollar, stocks of the U. S., or of such States of the Union, as may be designated by law, to be estimated at their market value, in the city of New York, but not above par; provided that such stocks be, or are made to be, equal to stock producing six per cent. per annum; there shall be no law, directly nor indirectly, sanctioning a suspension of specie payments; bill-holders to have preference over other creditors, in cases of insolvency; stock-holders to be individually liable to an amount not less than that of their respective shares of stock; no bank to receive, directly nor indirectly, a greater rate of interest than shall be allowed by law, to be received by individuals loaning money; no banking institution to have exclusive privileges not granted to similar institutions; nor shall any such institution be created by special charter; the General Assembly shall have the right to alter, from time to time, or to repeal all laws that may be passed, creating banks or banking institutions."

Mr. READ of Clark, moved to amend by striking out and inserting a series of sections against special charters for banking; providing "that associations may be formed under general laws, for such purposes, against a suspension of specie payments; providing for a registry of bills, put in circulation as money, and ample security for their redemption in specie; stock-holders to be individually liable, after the year 1852; and in case of insolvency, the bill-holders to have a preference over other creditors."

Mr. OWEN. I desire to address the Convention in explanation of the section which I have submitted; and, I would say to the Convention, that this proposition has been prepared with some care, and submitted to the consideration of many gentlemen on this floor. But, as it is now late, I would very much prefer to speak to-morrow morning. I do conceive, sir, that this is one of the most important questions that can occupy our attention, and it ought to receive our best consideration. I move that we now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Convention adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. BIDDLE

On the Currency Question, made in Convention January 4, 1851.

Mr. BIDDLE then took the floor, and said: Mr. President, I have designed to make a few remarks upon the general question of banking, which I believe has been properly brought before the body by the reported section and the amendment just offered. I desire to address the Convention out of deference to the well known opinions entertained by my constituents on this subject. But I do not stand here as the particular advocate of their sentiments if they should be unsound, because I advocate no principles but such as I am satisfied in my own mind are based upon a sound foundation. I may here premise that if there be any one question well settled in my district, it is the question of banking. Happily for me I concur fully with my constituents. I desire at the outset, to present a few elementary ideas in relation to currency and banking; and in deference to gentlemen on this floor who are much more experienced upon this subject than myself, I must say that I distrust my own opinion on this subject, because it is one of the most difficult questions known to governments and political economists.

I have a few words to say by way of objection to the present State Bank of Indiana. But the friends of that institution will not understand me as aiming at their bank, but at the system upon which that bank is based, and all other banks having a circulation wider than the security for its redemption. Therefore I hope no one will suppose that I advocate any particular opposition to the State Bank. I am, however, strongly opposed to any bank based upon the same plan. I feel under obligations to the gentleman from Clark, (Mr. Read,) whom I do not see in his seat, for the remarks which he made touching the town in which I reside. He mentioned correctly, that that point is entitled to a bank under a law passed eleven years ago, but which has not as yet been obtained. There may be some prejudice existing amongst my constituents resulting from that circumstance; but I do not desire, in treating this question, to be influenced in any measure by local prejudices, though certainly we have much to complain of. I desire to carry out the will of my constituents, but at the same time I wish to entirely divest myself of the influence of any prejudice. It will be my aim to treat the question upon general principles. The nearest banking facilities are situated at a distance of forty miles from us on the west, eighty on the east, sixty-five on the north, and seventy miles on the south; so that we have an area of one hundred and twenty miles square, in a very fertile region, possessing great commercial advantages, without any banking accommodations whatever.

Before I conclude the remarks which I purpose submitting, I desire to say a few words touching what is called "free banking;" and I want no gentleman on this floor to entertain any prejudices against that system. I will confess freely, that when I first heard of this system of banking, it seemed to me to be a wild and extravagant theory. I have found, however, upon a close examination of its principles, that, in my judgment, it is the true system of banking, and I believe that ultimately it will be the only system recognized in the United States. Let not gentlemen suppose that "free banking" means an increase of paper money without any limitation. It is no such thing. On the contrary, I venture to say that it is one of the most safely restricted systems that was ever devised by man. I do not make this assertion at random. What I say I believe to be the conclusion at which every man must arrive, who considers the subject carefully and in a liberal spirit, from the beginning to the end.

I shall now present my objections to the present State Bank, and to the system of banking on which it is based.

What is money? It is the measure of value. Money should bear the same relation to the value of commodities as the chain does to the size of the acre, the pound to the weight, or the figure to the number; and to change this measure of value would be as injurious to enterprise, and as destructive to justice, as it would be to change the length of the chain, the weight of a pound, or the denomination of a figure. Sir Isaac Newton has told us that if you cast a pebble into the Atlantic, you thereby disturb the relative position of every particle of water in the ocean. This is true; and it is philosophically true, that if you change the place of any particle of matter, you thereby change the relative position of every other particle in the universe. It is the same, sir, with regard to the relations of value. Values balance and proportion themselves in commerce, precisely as matter in the natural world. Values are always relative, never positive. Even gold settles its value by its relation to other commodities. In connection with this subject I must mention a new idea, lately put forth in France, namely: to estimate the value of each commodity by the relation it bears to all other commodities. For instance, if A obligates himself to-day to pay B one hundred dollars a year hence, when the debt becomes due they take the relative value of all commodities at the time the contract was made, and if the relative value to money has increased, then A shall pay more, in the same proportion; if decreased, then less, in the same proportion. This is entirely true as a theory, but like many other theories which are true, can never be reduced to practice. You could never obtain this relative value sufficiently accurate, but it may be approximated. Indeed most of men's practices fall far below their theories.

Money must have its intrinsic value. I will lay down the proposition that you cannot add to the property of a State or nation by any system of banking that was ever invented. Value is intrinsic. You cannot give value to anything which has not, within itself, its own worth. If it has not value as a commodity, you cannot impart value to it. You can no more add value to gold by coining it, than you can make it heavier by the same means. Do not understand me as going against a paper currency. I go for a paper currency which is worth the promise that it bears upon its face. But I maintain that any bank which has not a basis in her vaults, or some attainable security equal to her paper issue, is an evil to any State or nation. When a bank pays all its debts, and redeems its paper, has it done all that it was morally bound to do? No sir, it ought not to disturb the relations of value. I have stated that money is the measure of value; I contend that it ought not to be varied by paper. You may circulate as much paper as you will to represent a dollar, but you add nothing to its intrinsic value. To disturb the measure of value is the same as to count the figures which represented five yesterday, four to-day, and six to-morrow; or to call the rod 16 feet long to-day, 12 to-morrow, and 20 the next day; or to change the pound from 16 ounces yesterday to 12 to-day, and 20 to-morrow. That is the result that immediately follows from banks issuing more paper than the basis it represents. As soon as things have adjusted themselves to this new condition, they contract their paper, and destroy the just relations of value. Ruin, or at least great injury, must follow. Although the banks redeem their bills, yet if the issue is over and above their intrinsic value, they disturb the measure of value, throw commerce into confusion, and destroy the reward of labor and enterprise; and consequently, do a grievous injury to the community. I maintain that, according to every sound rule of morality and philosophy, you are under obligations not to disturb the relative measure of value, as between man and man.

That there is something wrong in the system of banking, pursued in the United States, every reflecting mind must admit. There has scarcely been a bank since the establishment of banks in the 9th century, that has settled up, and discharged its liabilities as an individual does. A few have, to be sure, but they are exceptions. Is there not something wrong in this? Justice and truth, sir, are fixed—immutable. The idea that justice is one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow, no one will maintain. And if there be an error at the basis of the system, there must be an error throughout. The monument may be beautiful in its proportions, but the foundation is unsound, and will not support it; it is a pillar on water.

Gold and silver have been found to constitute the best measure of value that mankind can adopt. You cannot throw into circulation an undue amount of gold, as you could paper; nor, on the other hand, can you drive it out of existence suddenly. It is uniform in its production and consumption; contains a great value in a small compass; it is used as money throughout the world, and has a uniform intrinsic value in all markets; it is, therefore, the best measure of value. Do not understand from these remarks that I am what is called a hard money man; no considerable commerce can be carried on with the metals alone. But, I say that a paper currency cannot be greater than that which it represents, without doing a gross injustice, as between man and man. This is a proposition which has no answer; it cannot be evaded, it must be met. You might as well try to overturn a well established mathematical rule, as endeavor to controvert this position. I say it is the unavoidable result of all paper currency; not because it is paper, but because it represents that which has no existence. Under the ordinary banking system, you may safely say that they issue three paper dollars for one of specie, or bullion, in the vaults of the bank; they have, say, $100,000 in specie, and the bank issues $300,000 in paper. Our own State Bank has about one and a quarter millions in specie, and about three millions and a half in circulation.

Many devices, sir, have been adopted from time to time, to enhance the value of money. Whenever the nations of antiquity got into financial difficulties, it was a practice to stamp the money with a value greater than its intrinsic worth. What gives value to the precious metals? Not the stamp, sir, but their intrinsic value as a commodity in proportion to other commodities. The coin is worth more than the bullion; it is worth the bullion and the expense of coining it into money—no more. We have one instance of this system of doubling money in the history of the Romans, after the second Punic war. They stamped the money at double its intrinsic value, and thus cheated their creditors out of one-half their debts. It was a common device in past ages, before financial affairs were well understood, whenever a nation got into pecuniary difficulties to increase the nominal value of their money in the manner I have indicated. By doubling the nominal value of their money, they in reality added nothing whatever to the common stock, but they absolutely defrauded their creditors to the amount they increased the nominal value of their coin. Now here is the very same thing with the banks. You issue three dollars for one, or say two dollars, what is that but doubling the stamp of your coin? the old Roman device. When you grant a charter to a bank to issue three dollars for one, what is it but saying that the bank's dollar shall count three dollars, while the citizen's dollar counts but one? Is not this unsound—is it not unjust? Certainly.

The difference ~~is~~, between the system which I shall endeavor to advocate and the present banking plan is this: Under the system which I propose, before a bill leaves the counter of the Bank, it has its reality behind that counter to meet its payment. The banks at present have not that reality. How could they have, when they are permitted to issue upon a basis of $100,000 a paper currency of $300,000? So many pictures, bearing on their face a promise to pay a certain amount, though in reality there may be no assets behind them to liquidate those promises. It may be asked why do not the banks immediately fail? It is because their debts are not all presented at the same time. They rest upon faith—a very unsubstantial thing to bank on. But they do fail, nearly every one of them—sooner or later—they always lay at the mercy of a people. The State Bank in 1837 could not possibly have paid its debts. What security have we that it ever will?

But that is not the only thing. They have given a false value to paper money, and that paper money changes all the monetary relations, and disturbs the contracts between citizen and citizen. A bill to be sure goes out of the bank with a nominal value upon its face; if the bank be honest it will redeem it, but where is the security if the bank chooses not to redeem it? What is the remedy? There is no remedy—no means to compel justice.

But the mere redemption of its bills by a bank of issue is not a fulfillment of its obligation, for it has done a great injury to the community by erecting a false standard of value. I am strongly opposed to everything that savors of monopoly. But there are reasons which show the whole system—even if not objectionable as a monopoly—to be inherently wrong and false. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) in his remarks the other day, set out by saying “that all the States were pledged to a paper system.” I do not know where that pledge is to be found recorded. If he means that—

Mr. RARIDEN. Will the gentleman from Cass allow me to explain?

Mr. BIDDLE. Oh, with pleasure.

Mr. RARIDEN. I said in effect that most of the States were embarked in that system; and that their habits of trade put them in it.

Mr. BIDDLE. Well, I hope there is a better time coming for other States as well as our own. I hope they will all adopt a healthy system. However, he says, “a bank is not a monopoly because of its franchises and privileges, but because money is always a monopoly.” That is true to some extent. A man worth a thousand dollars can do you more harm or good than the man worth but a hundred. But what is the gentleman's remedy? He says money is already a monopoly, and therefore we will give it an additional monopoly by the law! Because it is a monopoly, therefore he would make it a greater monopoly. His next proposition was that a free banking system would result in giving an additional impetus to railroad speculations—that railroad companies would become bankers under this system. I shall take occasion to allude to this assertion before I conclude; and when I come to speak of free banking, I think I will be able to show that no set of men can enter into it without doing full justice to the public. Sufficient, then, for the gentleman's objections.

We have had many memorable instances of the issue of paper money. Some of them were referred to by gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. The issue of the Continental money was alluded to. It was an issue entirely without any real foundation; it had no basis except the patriotism of a brave and generous people. I am not prepared to say that the issue was a wrong one; nor would I say that our fathers could ever have established the liberties which we now enjoy without it. And it is probable that, if the Union of the States had been more perfect at that time, the entire amount of the Continental issue would have been redeemed; but it never has been redeemed. How many instances have we not had in our own Government, and in the banks of England and Amsterdam, and indeed in all banks, to show the prudence of having your basis before you send out a bill, and not to let a bill go out to find a basis.

After the removal of the deposits, the funds of the General Government became the basis of banking operations in what were called the "pet banks." What was the consequence? They issued as much as they possibly could of paper money. And what had you then? The most delusive bubble that could be conceived to represent money. You had eight dollars of paper to represent one dollar of specie. When the Government withdrew its money, the bubble burst and ruin followed. This has been the effect in all Governments where banking, upon the present system, has prevailed. But there is no Government that I know of which has been so much deluded as the United States. It is like a man who is accustomed to the use of stimulants—he feels very happy as long as the force of the stimulus continues; but when the stimulus is cut off, he sickens and dies. So with a paper currency; as long as you are increasing it, everything seems prosperous; but there is a point beyond which you cannot go, and when that is attained, injury or ruin must follow. And so it is with your present banking system. You appear to be the most prosperous people in the world as long as you have a large paper issue in circulation; while, in reality, your monetary system is in a most unhealthy condition—bloated, like the inebriate, and delirium tremens must follow. The pound, or the yard, or the figure, is one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow. In my opinion, the monetary convulsions through which the United States have passed during the last thirty-five years would have overwhelmed any people not possessed of the indomitable energy of the Americans.

There was another device adopted by the Bank of England to replenish her coffers. It was to give one-half per cent., payable in its own notes, for bullion. What was the consequence? Parties brought in the bullion, and received the one-half per cent. advance in notes; they then presented the notes, which the Bank was compelled to redeem in specie, which they melted up; then they sent in the bullion again, and made another one-half per cent. In fact, the operation nearly ruined the Bank. It was a continued drain of one-half per cent. But I will not dwell here.

I wish to say a word or two now in regard to bills of exchange. I desire to describe what I understand by a system of exchange. Bills of exchange, since the middle of the twelfth century—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Cass that his half hour has expired. [Cries of "Go on! go on!"

On motion, the rule was suspended, in order to enable the gentleman from Cass to terminate his remarks.

Mr. BIDDLE resumed. I beg leave to thank the Convention for their indulgence; but I am only about half through. I say the system of bills of exchange was invented about the middle of the twelfth century. And, sir, I take it as an established proposition, that this system never worked injuriously to the public, and that, as a system, it never established a wrong measure of value, but maintained itself by representing the true measure of value always. Why, sir, you can exchange your money from New York on London, or Paris, or St. Petersburg, or Vienna, Berlin, or Canton, for a very small per centage. The exchange at London on St. Petersburg is frequently but one-half per cent., and oftentimes, at Paris, nothing at all. So this system does not, like the banking plan, disturb the relation of value, because a bill of exchange has a reality—its value is determined before it is used. It is drawn on something in existence. But do not suppose I contend that there is no such a thing as a bad bill of exchange. I do not so argue. To be sure, there have been forgeries, and parties have failed to honor their bills; frauds have been committed; but I maintain there has not been one ten-thousandth part the injury done to the public by bills of exchange, that has resulted from paper issues of banking establishments. There have been one thousand dollars lost by bank bills, to one dollar by bills of exchange. I mean to say that exchanges, as a system, has worked well. It has six hundred years experience to support it. The difference between the two systems is this: The bill of exchange has a solid basis—it represents a reality; while every bank bill issued beyond its basis represents nothing under Heaven but air, or faith. The bill of exchange starts upon a basis; the bank bill, beyond its specie basis of about one-third, has no foundation at all. That is the reason why the one system will work an injury to the public, and the other will not. I ask gentlemen to draw their conclusions from these facts—to examine the subject impartially, and see which system will work the most good and the least evil. I must certainly say, however, it is with diffidence that I put forth my views on a subject which has often misled men of greater penetration and experience than I possess.

I will here throw out what I conceive to be the true system of "free banking." My plan is, to make a bank bill possess a basis, precisely as a bill of exchange, so that there will be no possibility that it can be at any time otherwise than good to the holder. That the bill shall never leave the counter of the bank, until the State shall have in her hands sufficient assets to redeem the bill, in case the bank should fail. It will then have a fixed value before it goes out to the world, and will not be like Noah's dove, which found no place to rest its foot. I should prefer State stocks, as security, for the reason that it binds the State for the redemption of the bills, the State being pledged to pay the amount of stock issued. I would have the banker or company deposit an amount of State or United States stocks equal to their paper issue, with the Auditor; or create a Comptroller, if you will, who shall sign the bills and issue them to the banks. Ample security will then be insured to the bill-holders. The manufacturing and agricultural products of the State constitute the security; and so long as we have seed time and harvest—and we have the pledge of Heaven that they shall ever return—so long will we thus have a basis for an honest people to bank upon. Of course I do not say that the bills shall be redeemed in stocks, but in specie, by the bankers, and the moment the banker fails to redeem his bills, let the State convert the stocks, for the benefit of the bill-holders. No one will pretend to bank, without specie to meet their daily engagements; but if any one should, the bill-holder cannot be injured; the State holds the security in her own hands.

I do not wish to be restricted to the government stocks, though, next to State stocks, our government stocks are most valuable, because it is almost an impossibility for the general government to fail in the payment of stocks. We will never contemplate a dissolution of the Union. I believe, sir, this system must prevail, because it is a system of bills of exchange, in effect. Bank bills are not bills of exchange.

Bank bills, over the amount of the specie basis, are drawn on nothing that existed at the time they are issued. A bill of exchange has a basis before it is drawn. A people will make their stocks good, out of the fruits of the earth, and just so will it be with us, if we adopt this policy. But the time may come, when we shall not have a sufficient amount of government or State stocks, to give a currency to the people. I, therefore, am not in favor of restricting this system of banking, to merely State and government stocks, by the Constitution. Should other States adopt the same system, then their stocks will be as good as our own, for that purpose. Then every man in the State will be interested in the redemption of every dollar in the State. Gentlemen may suppose that a greater or less quantity of money, thus issued, will disturb the relations of value; but the quantity of money will not disturb the adjustment of value, when it is based on realities. It will never change the value of money, so as to injure any one; it is impossible. The gold mines of California, and those of Siberia, which are now being worked even to a more prolific extent than the California mines, will probably raise the value of commodities, but the value of the gold will still maintain a relative proportion to other commodities. The change, however, in the value of the precious metal will be so gradual, that no individual will be injured, under the ordinary time a contract runs. This, however, has not been the case hitherto. On a debt contracted in 1836 and paid in 1842, the debtor paid at least double the amount to the creditor; but a debt contracted in 1830, and paid in 1836, the debtor did not pay to the creditor more than one-half. This was the effect of a sudden derangement in measures of value. As soon as commodities adjusted themselves to one measure of value, another was established. It could not take place with regard to the value of stocks based upon realities. They are based on the agriculture, manufactures, and enterprise of a people. These things are as substantial as anything pertaining to man.

Speaking of the unfortunate results of the free banking system in the State of New York, the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave) says, that in every age and in every nation where free banking has been tried, it has proved a failure. Now, sir, I would like to know in what nation and in what ages of the world the system has been tried? I wish to know, that I may be instructed. The gentleman could no doubt inform us, but he does not reply.

As far as I am acquainted, it was never tried in many ages nor in many nations of the world. The idea is new. Bills issued on the credit of the State, and backed by the endorsement of the people, cannot fail of payment, unless heaven refuses her bounties, and the seasons withhold their abundance. Gentlemen have fallen into the error in regard to free banking in supposing that it allows every man to issue, without restriction, and without law or license. Quite the reverse is true. They are deceived by the name "free banking." It is called free because it is equal, but its proper designation is a general banking law. It allows no banking without permanent security to the bill-holders—as permanent as anything which belongs to man.

What was the reason of the failure of many of the free banks in New York? It was because they banked on State stocks other than their own, and on real estate pledged. For stocks, on a State other than the one that issues them for banking, can never be as good as a State's own stocks, no matter what may be the relative credit of the other States, because they are not pledged to the same people. And this is another advantage in the system, that it binds the faith of States to their own people, and secures the faith of a people to the obligations of State. It is based on justice and equality to all men.

I am opposed, sir, to taking real estate as a pledge for banking issues. There is nothing more fluctuating than the value of real estate. Its value is often a mere matter of taste or fancy. Titles are often secret and defective; besides it is not immediately convertible. A security should not only be good, but be ready. Sir, you might as well bank upon a summer shower, as upon real estate. If you look at the few banks in New York that have based their issues upon government, and their own State stocks, you will find that they have not failed in a single instance to meet their obligations—the failure has resulted from dependance upon other State stocks, and upon real estate. It should be remembered, also, that the system was tried in the most disastrous period for stocks. The fact that the free banking system has grown into favor in a great commercial State like New York, is one of the many evidences of its security and utility; and when the system is pruned of its defects and excrescences, we shall have a correct system of banking—one corresponding to bills of exchange, and therefore a safe and permanent system.

A MEMBER. How long has the free banking system been in existence in New York?

MR. BIDDLE. About twelve years. You have then this fact, more evidence in favor of the system.

The old plan of banking was continually disturbing the relations of value, and thereby doing injustice to all classes of society; a general system must effect all alike, and thus be rendered safe and certain in its results. By this system no bill can be issued unless it represent a reality; it does not go abroad to seek its basis.

This, then, sir, as I understand it, is the true system of banking. I have not gone into the details, neither do I intend to. That belongs to the Legislature to adjust.

It is said, however, that with the proposed restrictions upon free banking no man will engage in it. But, sir, it is with banking as with every thing else in nature. There are certain fixed laws of justice and propriety, which if violated, will tend to ruin and confusion. You need not tell me, sir, that no man will bank when he can make his six per cent. on his stock, and also a per centage upon bills of exchange, besides the interest discounted upon bills and loans. And, sir, if there is no way to bank profitably without injustice and exclusive privileges, then, sir, we will have no banks. No system can stand upon an unjust basis. Justice is the first principle in government. For my part, I am not looking after the interest of bankers; I am studying justice to a people. Of course the bill holder must be made secure; he should be secured in preference to any other creditor of the bank—this is entirely proper. The depositor and banker make their own bargain and run their own risks—the public is not concerned. This safety fund plan that was thought to be the philosopher's stone in banking, how did it operate? Why, sir, depositors swept the bank of every dollar in their vaults, leaving the bill holder defrauded of his earnings. It has ever been so; it will be so again. No bill for circulation should ever issue until the State has security for its redemption in her own hands; not in the hands of the banker, that is as absurd as to take a man's obligation and immediately return it to him. Without this security, no bank should be established. Every stockholder is interested in its integrity and perpetuity; the bill holder is pledged to its support, and the State is pledged to sustain it.

[The reporter would remark that owing to Mr. B.'s addressing the members of the Convention in front of him, he was utterly unable to catch more than a sentence or two occasionally, of his remarks in the latter part of his speech. He trusts that this will account for the incompleteness of the report, which is of course a matter of mortification to the reporter.—ASSISTANT REPORTER.]

MR. B. proceeded: The idea of making money by stamping paper with pictures and of thus increasing the wealth of the nation, is an absurdity. You may just as well undertake to grow a crop of grain by setting down the figures that represent the number of bushels.

The difference then, between the two plans, may be summed up in these words:

The bills, according to the old banking system, which are issued beyond the specie paid in, go out to seek their own basis; the security for their redemption is insufficient, and that in the hands of the bank; whereas, under the free banking system, the bills have their basis before they are issued, and sufficient security for their redemption, in the hands of the State. I cannot see how gentlemen can hesitate which system to adopt.

Mr. B. said in conclusion: I thank the members of the Convention, for the attention they have paid me. I am free to say that so far as this question of currency is concerned, it has cost me a great deal of reflection, and I have spent much time in its investigation. I do not pretend, however, to understand it thoroughly: that subject which has perplexed nations for ages, is not for me to explain in an hour. But, sir, I have proposed some things that are demonstrable truths, and I believe that we should go as far as we see we are right and no further, and not remain in a condition where we know we are wrong. I believe that we have found a desideratum in banking—in the system of free banks—and I further believe that the time is approaching when all the States of the Union, will unite upon it as the only true and safe plan. We shall then have security from one extreme of the Union to the other.

REMARKS OF MR. HENDRICKS,

(On Banking, delivered in Convention January 7, 1850.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is not necessary for me to detain the Convention by giving my opinions on the general subject of banking, though before discussing to any extent the systems of banking proposed, I will say that I endorse the sentiments of the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read) as abstract truths. The whole system of paper money is a tax upon labor, produce, and commerce. The man who by his labor causes the earth to produce, and the man who by his labor makes those products more useful to man may be termed a public benefactor. He adds to the wealth of the world. But can you say the same of the man who issues a mere promise to pay a bank bill?

Upon every dollar of paper money that is in circulation labor and commerce pay six per cent. per annum; amounting in the course of about every sixteen years, to a sum equal to the whole paper currency; an annual tax upon labor and commerce of one sixteenth of their proceeds, paid to a class who produce nothing, only for the use of a paper currency. This is it not so direct, but it is none the less an imposition, an artificial burthen upon the producing classes, than the system of Tythes in England.

I have no doubt that the time will yet come when the world will look back upon the system of paper currency as a monstrous imposition, and strange delusion as we now look back upon the efforts of the tyrants of the East, and the monarchs of England, to increase the wealth of their empires and kingdoms, by debasing the coin.

But when the question is propounded in Indiana whether we shall have banks or no banks, other and different considerations should govern us. We are surrounded by States which have banks of every description, good, bad, and indifferent, some of them based upon specie, some upon mortgages, and others upon stocks of States or the United States; and if we have no banks of our own we must look to the banks of other States to furnish us our currency. If we have banks of our own we can know something about them. Our State officers would have the right to inspect their affairs, and the people could know their condition.

Again, the business of banking is profitable; and if we are to have paper money in our midst is it not right that our own citizens should have the profit of the business. Suppose that we use six millions of dollars in the State, there is made upon that an annual profit of nearly $360,000. Then, sir, are we to rely upon other States to furnish this currency? Must we depend upon Ohio, New York, Kentucky, and Michigan? Shall we pay per annum to these four States, the sum of $360,000, for the use of their paper money? If paper money is nothing, and if for the use of this nothing, compelled by the custom of trade, we have to pay a per centage, had we not better pay it to our own citizens and retain this per cent. within our borders as a part of our currency. Gentlemen say "no Bank." Let them go further and propound the question of no paper money distinctly before us. If the question is "no bank" and no bank money, let them state it to the Convention. The proposition of the gentlemen from Wells, supported by the gentlemen from Allen, (Mr. Borden) only went half the way. They propose that there shall be no banking in this State, but one half of our present paper currency comes from other States. And will gentlemen put their mark right here, and say that in Indiana we shall have no paper currency either issued within the State or coming from abroad, and that such currency shall not be circulated here. Let them propose such a section as this—"the Legislature shall not establish any bank in the State, and by penal laws shall prevent the circulation in this State of the money of banks of other States," how would that leave us? Four-fifths of our currency is paper, and if that be suddenly withdrawn, we would be left with but one-fifth our present currency; the price of all the property in the State would be reduced to one-fifth of its present amount, and the wages of the laborer would be reduced in the same proportion. Sir, by reducing the currency, the farm that now has a market value of one thousand dollars, would be reduced to two hundred and fifty dollars, and the laborer who now gets one dollar per day, would get but twenty cents. And, sir, while labor and property would be so reduced in price, within our State, the price of every thing which we would require from without the State would remain unchanged, being measured by the foreign standard of value : and we would continue in this condition, until the holders of gold and silver from abroad induced by the cheapness of our property, should come and purchase it at its reduced price, and so bring money into the State.

If gentlemen desire to bring about this result, let them take that stand, and not simply say that we shall have no currency of our own, but go further and say that no bank bills shall circulate as money in the State.

But, sir, my own opinions in reference to banking, would not govern me if I knew that they differed from the opinions of those whom I represent. I propose to offer an amendment to the original section—an amendment which does not contain all the necessary restrictions upon banking, but only such as should be secured by constitutional provision, and which I think expresses the views of my constituents upon the subject of banking. It is as follows :

“The business of issuing bills or notes, as money, shall not be allowed, unless the same be provided for by law, containing the following provisions :

1. The branches of any bank that may be established, shall be mutually responsible for each others liabilities, upon bills or notes issued as money.

2. The General Assembly shall retain the right of establishing such additional branches, under the provisions of such law, at such times and places as the business of the country may require.

3. The General Assembly shall retain the power of limiting the issues of any bank established in the State.

4. The State shall not be a stockholder, partner, or depositor, in any bank or branch.

5. Each stockholder in any branch, shall be responsible for the liabilities thereof, incurred while he continued a stockholder therein, in the proportion that his stock bears to the whole stock of the branch.

6. A suspension of specie payment shall work a forfeiture of the charter of the bank, or branch, so suspending.

7. No bank or branch shall, either directly or indirectly, charge or receive any more interest upon moneys loaned, than the law for the time being, shall allow individuals to charge or receive.

8. No notes or bills shall be issued as money, except upon a specie basis, which shall be paid in by the stockholders before any issues are made.”

This proposes that there should be but one system of banks in the State. It first proposes that the branches of the bank shall be mutually responsible, not for all the debts of the bank; but only for the issues of each other. That provision is equitable and right. I have thought it right to give to the Legislature the power to establish such additional branches as the requirements of the country may demand. It is not right to make one branch responsible for the deposit business or the exchange business of another, because this part of the business cannot be regulated and controlled by the board of directors representing all the branches, and is not necessarily regulated by law. It is the business of issuing paper money that we want to regulate. The business of deposits is a mere confidence or contract between the depositor and the banker. One branch could have no control over the deposit or exchange business of another, but a board of directors representing the whole could have the charge and control over the circulation, and it is right that all the branches should be responsible for the issues of each branch so far as they could be controlled by the whole. But it would not be right to make them responsible beyond their power of control if we allow the Legislature to create additional branches without their consent. This plan proposes a specie basis, and the provisions by which the note-holder is made secure are: First, the responsibility of each branch for the notes issued by the others. By this provision, the whole bank is made responsible for the issues of each branch; and it is thus made the interest of the bank to sustain itself and its several branches.

This amendment makes the stockholders in each branch responsible for the liabilities of the branches, and all the branches mutually responsible.

I know of no question of greater importance that can come before this Convention than the one now occupying its attention. Its decision may not be important to that class of traders who deal in money. They make their profits out of the difference in the value of money at different places and the changes and fluctuations in its value at different times. And out of the greatest monetary derangements and revolutions they make their largest profits. They are wreckers to whom float the fragments of the broken fortunes of ruined men in such times as these. But it is widely different in the commercial and industrial pursuits of the country. Their prosperity to a great extent depends upon the stability and permanency of the currency, the standard by which the labor, contracts, and property of the country are measured. If the currency be extended beyond the requirements of trade and commerce, labor and property acquire thereby an artificial value, trade is stimulated to an unnatural degree, and a reckless spirit of speculation obtains, and an excessive over trading soon involves the traders and the country in embarrassments from which relief can be found only in commercial revolution, and universal bankruptcy.

But, sir, if the currency be not proportioned to the property and business of the country, which it is intended to represent, labor does not find employment or an adequate reward, and produce finds no market. The importance of this question is greatly increasing in this State. Our resources are being rapidly developed, and the facilities for getting our surplus produce to market are rapidly increasing. And if a good currency be furnished to Indiana, wealth and prosperity will as surely reward the labors of our great producing class as that the rain and sunshine fall upon the earth.

I desire here, Mr. President, to notice some objections that have been urged to a State Bank. I am not the advocate of a State Bank as defined by the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Foster,) nor would I support a bank constituted just as our present bank is. I am not in favor of any institution of the sort in which the State shall be a partner. I desire no connection in interest of State and banks.

It is said, Mr. President, that a State Bank may and will have its favorites. Admit it. Does any gentleman believe that if a system of free banking were adopted those having capital to invest in such banking would not also have their favorites? Under that system, one very wealthy man by his bank, might control the currency of a whole section, and decide who should and who should not have money for the purposes of trade. It is different, however, with a State Bank. A board of directors, a number of men, selected by the stockholders, control the issues, and decide whose note shall be discounted, and who shall have the money.

Mr. President, I will not disguise the fact, that our present State Bank has favored one interest in the country to a greater extent than others. She has loaned her money to the farmers of the country to enable them to buy and feed stock, and to the produce and stock dealers, to enable them to buy the grain, the hogs, and the cattle of the country, instead of loaning to merchants and speculators. By this policy she has kept her money out upon short loans, and upon certain time, but has incurred the violent opposition of those who would like to be her favorites—merchants who would desire to do business upon a borrowed capital, and speculators.

Sir, while I admit that the present bank has favored this interest, I say that the objection of favoritism of particular individuals will apply with greater force to the free banking system, than to a system of branches, mutually responsible and controlled by a board of directors.

Gentlemen have objected that the State Bank has been in the habit of charging more than the lawful interest on money, by doing its business through the medium of bills of exchange. Now I ask if this objection may not equally be made to the system of free banking? And whether it is not as easy to prevent the abuse of power on the part of a State Bank as on the part of independent banks?

Again, sir, it is objected that the State Bank is a monopoly. I agree with gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject, that all banks are, to a certain extent, monopolies; and the question for us to consider is: which is the greater monopoly? If we are to establish banking at all we ought to establish such a system as will answer the purposes of the country, and be the least obnoxious to the charge of being a monopoly. The Honorable chairman of the committee on banking told us the other day that the paper currency of this State is between six and seven millions of dollars. One proposition is that this six millions of dollars shall be furnished by a combination of branches mutually responsible, and the other that it shall be furnished by independent irresponsible banks based upon stocks. Now, sir, that system is the least of a monopoly, the benefits of which, can be enjoyed by the greatest number of the citizens. Gentlemen object to mortgages of land being made a basis for banking, and in this I agree with them, that it would not be a sufficient basis, and that it would be very unfortunate so to encumber the freeholds of the country. Stocks, or State indebtedness, is then the only basis proposed. These stocks are not held by citizens of the State of Indiana, but by New York, and foreign bankers, and stockjobbers. The bonds of the State of Indiana are one thousand dollars each, and as soon as they are made a basis for banking they become worth in the market the full amount for which they are drawn.

To procure such a basis for banking, a citizen of this State must have at least one thousand dollars, and the man who may have twenty-five or fifty dollars, unemployed is, by this system, deprived of the privilege of banking, not being able to buy a single bond, as a basis. Thus none but the wealthy capitalist can be a banker. But, sir, if our own citizens become bankers under this system how is the currency affected? To procure the bonds to bank upon, they must take from our circulation an amount equal to the value of the bonds, and upon these bonds they issue bank bills equal to their value. By this process the currency is not increased, but a very inferior one supplied. In addition to this the banker would require in his vaults an amount of gold and silver, for the purpose of redeeming his bills when presented, equal to one-third of his circulation. If citizens of this State buy bonds as a basis for banking, and issue dollar for dollar, our currency will be reduced one-third. Sir, this can never be our system of banking, our citizens can never avail themselves of its advantages. It is a monopoly, a monstrous monopoly, in favor of bankers, brokers, and sharpers of New York, London, and Amsterdam.

But in a State Bank, based upon specie, with branches mutually responsible, the stock may be divided into shares of twenty-five or fifty dollars, so that all classes of community may invest their money in stock, and enjoy the profits thereof. And upon the establishment of a branch in any county, the farmer, the mechanic, or the day laborer, having fifty, a hundred, or a thousand dollars unemployed, may take stock as he may desire.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) said that he desired to see all citizens placed upon an equality, with the same rights and privileges. Let us examine the gentleman's position. He is in favor of independent banks, based upon stocks, endorsing the plan advocated by the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle.).

Indiana will have in the year 1857, when our present bank charter expires, between five and six millions of bonds outstanding, which are to be made the basis of the proposed system of free banking. Under the present law they will bear five per cent., but gentlemen say that they shall be duplicated by the issue of paper to their full amount in value, and thus they cease to be five per cent. and become eleven per cent. bonds. The capitalist who wishes to make a permanent investment of his money, could not make a better investment than in these eleven per cent. bonds; and of course these bonds will not be in market, but will be used by the holders, for banking upon.

Mr. BIDDLE. If the gentleman from Shelby alludes to me, he is mistaken. I do not propose that bills shall draw interest.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But if a banker loans his bills he will take from the borrower a note which will draw six per cent. interest, which, with five per cent. he will receive from the State, will make eleven per cent. Then I ask the gentleman from Tippecanoe where is the monopoly? Under this free banking system, our citizens are cut out from all privileges of banking, while the foreign banker, or bond holder, or sharper, may come here and do all our banking business, enjoying the monopoly and receiving all of its profits.

Now, sir, if we have a currency of six millions in this State, what is the profit upon it? At six per cent. it will be $360,000. This sum, under a State Bank, would go to our own citizens, while, under the free bank system, it must necessarily go to those foreigners who happen to hold our bonds. Mr. President, do gentlemen desire such a result as this? Do they wish to build up such a monopoly in Indiana?—a monopoly not in favor of our own citizens, but of foreign capitalists? Sir, many of these bonds were bought up at from 18 to 30 cents on the dollar, by the present holders. A few years since they sent an agent to our Legislature, who made a bargain by which he got for them the Wabash and Erie Canal for the one-half, and bonds for the residue, soon to draw five per cent. He thought he made a good bargain for the bond-holders, a bargain which they have since accepted. That same distinguished agent is now in this city; and if this Convention should make these bonds a basis for banking, and thus raise the interest upon them from five to eleven per cent., it will be the best bargain which the bond-holders have made off the State yet. Whether this distinguished agent has any connection with this free banking system, I do not know, but—

Mr. COOKERLY (interposing). If the gentleman from Shelby will allow me, I would inform him that Mr. Butler has been in the city every winter, for the purpose of making his report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes; but Mr. Butler came very early this year; in good time, no doubt, to do all his business.

Mr. COOKERLY. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT. Order. The gentleman from Shelby has the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not propose, Mr. President, to follow this argument any further in regard to the question of which system is the greater monopoly. I thought I would answer the very patriotic remarks of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. He proposes that all our citizens shall stand upon the same platform of political equality. Very well. So far as our own citizens are concerned with the free banking system, they would stand upon an equality; but a good deal above them in point of privilege, would stand the banker of New York, or London, or Amsterdam.

But, sir, gentlemen say that this free banking system is the only safe one for the bill holder. Now, I deny that this system makes the bill holder safe, much less the depositor. No plan that has yet been proposed secures the depositor. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) adopts precisely the plan of the gentleman from Laporte. They propose to issue dollar for dollar in value of the stocks deposited. Then, sir, let me ask what security has the depositor? None, sir, except the solvency of the banker himself. Upon what, then, does the security of the bill holder rest? Upon two things. First, that the Auditor of State, to whom is confided the whole banking business of the State, should be a faithful public servant. Sir, I do not believe much in the doctrine of bribery, as preached so frequently. I never like to hear much said of it in deliberative bodies elsewhere, and much less in the State of Indiana. But the gentleman (Mr. Owen) said that, when the State Bank comes to the Legislature with her five millions of dollars, a greater power would be exercised than if a steel-clad army were surrounding our halls of legislation. Then, sir, according to the same argument, the bond holders of the East may come here with the power of six millions of dollars. With this power of gold, they may approach the Auditor of State, who is but one frail, feeble man, and demand of him that he shall cover up their frauds—that he shall issue more than dollar for dollar upon their stocks—that he shall not register all the bills that are issued; and if five millions of dollars in the hands of the State Bank would be enough to corrupt the Legislature of the State, I ask what would be the influence of six millions upon one man? You say, then, that we are to trust to the fidelity of one man for the safety of our currency. Now, sir, in the second place, you have not only to trust to the fidelity of one man—a sworn officer, it is true—instead of the whole Legislature, but you have also to trust that the bonds shall not depreciate in the market.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the gentleman from Shelby that his half hour has expired.

On motion, the rule was suspended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, Mr. President, I assert in the second place that, upon the stability of the bonds in the market would depend the security of the whole currency of the State of Indiana. Now, what sort of basis is this to rest upon? Shall we turn back, for the last fifteen years, and judge of the future by the past? The gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) said that these bonds were predicated upon the wealth and the labor of all the people of the State. Sir, let me ask, was not that equally the case eight or ten years ago as it is now? And yet our bonds, depending upon the labor and wealth of the State of Indiana, fell in the market to eighteen cents on the dollar; and for what reasons? We all know, sir, that reasons can be given now, it being past, though they could not be given before; and if we may judge of the future by the past, the same thing may happen again; for there is no property more fluctuating in the market than these stocks; and yet this fluctuating security is to be made the basis of that which ought to be the most stable of all things in the country—the currency. And yet, in opposition to past experience, gentlemen say that banks, based on such security, cannot fail—that the bill holder is necessarily secure. Now what is the theory of this system? Why, sir, it is nothing more nor less than making debt the basis of debt. Because the State in its corporate capacity owes a debt, therefore, this debt may be made the basis of other debts innumerable. We are to judge of the future by the past; and what is it? Out of a hundred and thirty-nine banks established upon this system in New York, how many have failed, and what have they paid? Fifty-one of them have failed more than thirty-five per cent. in the short period of ten years, and that, too, without any commercial crisis. It is no wonder, then, that the State Bank had to close her doors in 1837, '8, and '9. The banks of other States refused to meet the demands which our Bank had upon them; and in this ruinous crisis, which involved all the banks of the Union, ours also closed. But has she ever closed or failed to pay a dollar when there was no crisis? No, sir. Then,

I say, sir, that in times when there was no crisis, over thirty-five per cent. of the banks founded on the system which is advocated here have failed, as shown by the authority read this morning by the gentleman from Vanderburg (Mr. Lockhart); and yet gentlemen say that the experiment has been triumphant. Sir, if this is accounted a "triumph" I do not know what can be regarded as a "failure." The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) told us the system had "failed."

A VOICE. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; he used the word "failed." He said that the failure of the free banking system in the State of New York was owing to two circumstances: First, that real estate was made the basis; and secondly, that State bonds, other than those of the State of New York, had also been made the basis of banking.

Mr. OWEN. If the gentleman from Shelby will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will explain what I said. What I said was, that an objection which I had to the New York system was, that mortgages on real estate were taken as security. I spoke nothing of failure.

Mr. HENDRICKS. All right; I suppose that, if the gentleman had reflected for a moment, he would not have used the word. But the gentleman, among other causes, attributes the thirty-five failures to the fact that their currency was based upon bonds other than those of the State of New York. Now let us examine this matter for a moment. Suppose that they had had United States bonds, or bonds of the State of New York as a basis, when the run was made upon them, could they have made these bonds available for the redemption of their notes? No, sir; this fund is only available after the failure. When the banker has failed to redeem his notes, then this dead fund in the hands of the Comptroller may be made available. But let us examine this matter a little further. By the report of the Comptroller of the State of New York, (Mr. Fillmore,) in 1848, we find that, of the ten millions invested as a basis for banking, seven millions six hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars of it was in stocks of the State of New York—a pretty fair proportion of what the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) claims as a good basis. Of United States and other stocks, there was one million five hundred thousand dollars, and of real estate, about one million five hundred and fourteen thousand dollars; and yet the gentleman from Posey attributes the failure mainly to the fact of having this small proportion of their securities in real estate. Sir, the great basis of banking in New York upon this system has been upon the bonds of that State.

But I wish to call the attention of the Convention to one other circumstance. Free banking was established—that is, the law providing for it was passed—in the State of New York in the year 1838. Immediately it was followed by a fall in the market value of State stocks; and from the year 1839 to 1844, most of the free banks were established in New York. The stocks were appraised, and on their appraised value they were made the basis of banking. Then, sir, we have these banks established at a time when stocks are very low in the market. The issues are made upon this basis; the bonds rise in the market; and yet, when the banks fail, and the system has been tested by putting up these bonds at forced sale, they failed to realize more than seventy-six cents on the dollar, according to the authority read by the gentleman from Vanderburg (Mr. Lockhart).

Now I ask gentlemen to consider of this: Suppose that when every thing is prosperous and currency plenty, and stocks high in market, and at this high rate they are made the basis of banking; and that a crisis should come upon the country; money scarce, and stocks fall, what will be the result? Certain insolvency. If they fail in the fair weather, what will they do in the storm? If the appraisement be made when stocks are high, and the issues are made upon that appraisement and a crisis comes upon the country, and these stocks are put into market when they are not in demand and money is scarce, and all the funds of the country are required to carry on the ordinary business of the country, I ask gentlemen to answer me, under all these circumstances (which every one will admit may happen) what will be the return to the bill holder? If the appraisement is made when stocks are low, and but seventy-six cents on the dollar are realized upon them, what will be the result when the stocks are appraised at their highest value, and then be forced into market when a commercial crisis has reduced them to a value almost nominal? There can be but one result. In all probability the security would not be worth twenty cents on the dollar. What, then, is to sustain this banking system? What strength has it? Gentlemen go upon the hypothesis that if you secure the bill holder it is all the government ought to do. Sir, I contend that is not one-half of the duty of the government. Who suffers when a bank fails? Who loses when there is a derangement in the currency? Not the bill holder alone, but every one interested in labor, and produce, and commerce. The whole internal interests of the country are involved in such a crisis. And yet gentlemen say that it is enough to secure the bill holder. In the crisis of 1837, who suffered the most? The men who held the bills? No sir; their loss was not a tithe of the loss that the country sustained. The loss is in having the labor, the commerce, and the business of the whole country deranged, paralyzed, leaving labor without employment, and produce without a market. There, sir, is the loss, and not merely to the man who happens to hold a few of the notes of a failing bank.

Then, sir, I say that the security of the bill holder is not sufficient. Suppose that you establish a free banking system, and make as a basis ten millions of stocks, and that in the course of ten years thirty-five per cent of the banks fail as they did in New York, and that their currency is unexpectedly withdrawn from the country. What is the result? Why, sir, the price of labor must come down thirty-three per cent.; and the produce of labor must fall in like proportion, and all the property of the country must suffer a similar depreciation in value. And so it will ever be if we rely upon this system for our internal currency. But what is there in this free banking system to make it safe? It is not sufficient that there is a dead capital in the hands of the officer of State to redeem the notes available only after a failure. How is the bank to sustain itself in a crisis? For it is important that the bank should not break when money is particularly needed. Where then is its strength? The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) proposes an active banking capital of twenty-five or thirty-three per cent., and all the rest is to be dead capital. Now, sir, I say that all experience has proven, that no single bank even with a basis of thirty-three per cent. for their issues can stand. It is impossible. But a system of banks with branches in different sections of the country, each liable for the issues of the other, and sustaining each other, may stand during a crisis, with a specie basis of one-third of the amount of their issues; but one single bank cannot sustain itself with the same means. When a crisis comes, or an opposing bank, whose interest it may be to break down a single bank, brings in a large amount of notes to be redeemed, where is the money to redeem them? On the other hand, with our present system it is the interest of each of the branches to sustain the other; and in that is the safety of the State Bank of Indiana.

Gentlemen talk of competition in banking; but what will that produce? I am in favor of free trade; I say let trade and labor go as free as the winds of heaven; but when you come to banking a different principle must prevail. Competition in trade reduces prices and increases amounts.

What, then, must be the effect of competition in banking? Free trade in the business of making paper money? It is to encourage over-issues, which must soon be followed by a depreciation in the currency, revulsions, failures, and bankruptcies. The bankers become competitors for the business, to secure which they will loan upon long time, and uncertain security, to men, to pay old debts—to merchants, to do a permanent retail business, upon borrowed capital—to speculators in uncertain adventures. A system, which in the end, must be fatal to the banks. This policy the State Bank will not adopt; and for this reason she is bitterly opposed by the traders and speculators, in the towns and cities, and a demand is made for free banks, while no complaint is made against this system by the agricultural interest. Gentlemen demand a system of independent, opposing, competing banks, which would be constantly engaged in a warfare, striving to break one another. Sir, when a system of banks is once established, and their paper is in circulation, it is important to labor and commerce, that they shall not fail, but be sustained. Is it not, then, better to have banks mutually responsible, interested in sustaining one another, with a safe circulation, in such amount as the country requires, without a struggle and competition between the banks? Mr. President, I thought it remarkable that the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) who is usually so clear and logical, should condemn the State bank, upon the ground that the issues derange prices, and yet should advocate a system, the friends of which claim, as its great advantage and excellence, that it will increase the circulation, and make the banks competitors for business.

Mr. President, I will detain the Convention only to present one more objection which I have to this system of banking, based upon State debt, called the free bank system. We have abandoned the policy of the State engaging in works of internal improvement. This is certainly wise in us. But, sir, I think we are very likely to run to the other extreme of individual enterprise. Our State is being crossed in every direction by rail roads, plank roads, and canals. But our towns, cities, counties, and citizens are becoming deeply indebted to the companies that are constructing these works; and these companies, by their bonds, issued much below their face, convertible into stock, are fast falling under the control and management of eastern and foreign capitalists. The Wabash and Erie Canal, the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad, (our great public works,) and many of our smaller roads are now controlled by foreign capitalists.

Sir, it will not be long until men beyond the limits of the State will have it in their power to tax the whole produce of the State, on its way to market, as may suit their interest. Now, sir, if in addition to this power, we make the bonds which they hold upon us a basis for banking, and thereby give them a monopoly of the banking in the State, we give them a control of our currency, which they may expand and contract at their pleasure, and thereby control the price of all the property, and produce, and labor in the State. With such a controlling power over our commerce and currency, could our trade be free, our Legislation independent? Indiana would become dependent upon, and tributary to, the monied lords of the east. As much so, sir, as if they had the right to send their tax-gatherers amongst us every year, I would rather see our beloved State progress more slowly, and retain her independence, (and I use that word in its fullest sense,) than, for any gain, to become the subject of a foreign power. Sir, no slavery is more abject than that servitude which wealth demands of her subjects.

Mr. President, I have occupied more of the time of the Convention than I intended when I arose. I will now ask my amendment to be read.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Shelby, that there is already an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well, I will offer it when it is in order.

REMARKS OF MR. MORRISON of Marion On Banking, delivered in Convention, Jan. 6, 1851.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Sir, I have a few ideas in connection with this subject, which have not been entirely used up by the eminent gentlemen who have preceded me; and, while I would ask for them a respectful consideration by the Convention, I am not vain enough to imagine that I shall elicit anything so strikingly strange as to cast a great deal of new light upon the subject.

Sir, this question of banking is one which has engrossed the best talents, not only of this age, but of many ages which have preceded it. Not only this country, but all the civilized countries of the globe, have intended by their legislation, so to arrange matters, that money might be multiplied, and that as it increased and multiplied, riches and profits would ensue. I do not think it is our duty to build up any gorgeous system of banking, whereby a few individuals or managers of banks are to be benefited; but I hold it to be the duty of the State of Indiana, in Convention assembled, so to arrange and settle the fundamental law of the land, that the rights of the people to equal and exact justice will be strictly protected, so that it may be measured out to every citizen.

The greatest error, in my opinion, which has ever overshadowed the question of banking, is the one which has endeavored to make it a special and favored idea among the people. We have been almost led to venerate the very name of a bank, from the fact that money is of that kind of power which controls, regulates, and directs the every-day business of the community. Indeed, the names of lords, dukes, and barons, are not more venerated, in monarchical countries, than are the names of presidents and directors of banks among us.

The great idea I would aim to express, is this: that hitherto, in all the systems of banking which have ever been adopted, we have considered it a privileged species of business. As has been correctly remarked by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) we have never brought it down to its level—we have never considered it as a right belonging to every citizen of the community. Whenever we consider that we should not confer any special favors on any person or association, we will have done one thing which has not been done since the free banking system went partly into operation. The general banking law places every individual upon the same broad basis of republican equality. As has been said heretofore, it opens the door of competition and of equal privileges to every citizen of Indiana. And, on the other hand, it has been said that it is a monopoly that the poor man cannot participate in at all. So is the possession of wealth, in every instance, a monopoly. We open the door, however, to the poor man, so that he may, by dint of his labors, acquire wealth, and having acquired it, he may exercise the same rights as others. It is a duty which we owe to the people of the State, paramount to all others, at this peculiar crisis, to see that we lay down such special rules as will protect their rights from being infringed upon by the corrupting influences of wealth, and its dangerous tendencies. We should put into the Constitution such restrictions as will say to the succeeding Legislature, that they may go so far, but that they never shall trench farther upon the rights of the people. I feel much inclined to entertain the same sentiments as those uttered by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) that all our proceedings in regard to this matter should be of a negative character; that we should not undertake to make anything like a bank charter, but that we should lay down such negative restrictions, that if the people wish, at any future time, to have a bank of any kind, they may have it by coming up to the proper standard of safety to those who are interested in it, safely guarded, well secured, and affording sufficient means to facilitate the commercial and agricultural business of our people.

Sir, I could not say anything that would shed a single ray of light on the justice, fairness, safety, and propriety of a general banking law. Enough has been said on that subject, which remains uncontroverted, to establish the opinion of every member of this Convention. But, sir, we are continually brought to contrast the present State Bank of Indiana with a proper, correct, and righteous banking law. Now I have not one word to utter in disparagement of the State Bank of Indiana. I owe it no ill will; I have reason to acknowledge its kindness, so far as its officers are concerned; and while I would most willingly speak in high terms of the honor, integrity, and capacity of the gentlemen who manage that institution, that does not preclude me from finding fault with the operations of the system. I object to the system, first, because it is a monopoly. That objection has been urged with much force by others, and I will not dwell upon it. But that monopoly shows itself in more than one particular; first, in the privileges conferred upon the directors of the State Bank to set at defiance the will of the people whenever it is their interest so to do; and were I to complain of any acts on their part, it would be of that directory which had the audacity on three occasions in my remembrance to put down and defy the express will of the people of the State, solemnly expressed in the words of a statute. The Star Chamber authority of that bank said, that although the State of Indiana had declared by a formal law that certain things were due to the rights and convenience of the people; (I refer to the law establishing branches at Covington, Logansport, and Rushville;) the directors of the bank opposed their word and will to the law-making power of the State, and thus silenced the voice of the whole people. There are more of the effects of that monopoly than have been exhibited in that single cause of action. No other branch can at any time be created except by the consent of the directors of the existing branches. Our old Constitution provided that no bank should be created other than a State bank of Indiana, and that a branch of that bank should not exist in any other than one branch in every three counties. For that reason large and commercial towns within the State are deprived of having banks within their limits. If the citizens of Madison, New Albany, Lafayette, Terre Haute, Richmond, Indianapolis, or any other large and flourishing city of the State, should grow up to the size of Louisville or Cincinnati, under the present system of banking in Indiana, it would be impossible to establish another branch within their limits. I object to the existing features of the bank in that particular. It must be wiped out. Now there is a set of rules and regulations that can be adopted by the concurrent action of these directors that operates with much disadvantage to the people of Indiana. These might exist under any other system of banking; but they exist with more facility under that arrangement which permits each branch to act with the other. The operation is simply this: by the rule of action which this bank has seen fit to act upon, no individual can be induced to come into the State for the purpose of investing his capital. Loans are only made on the most limited scale. Accommodations are not granted except to special favorites, and these under the most stringent regulations. These regulations are so stringent that they perfectly preclude the capital from other States from finding an investment here. No man comes to the State expecting to transact business on discounted paper. And why so? Because the bank has determined it will make no loans on discounted paper in many of its branches. That rule stands out so boldly that if you pre-mented the paper of the best man you could find; endorsed by a dozen more of the best men, they tell you, "we discount no such paper" — I mean paper received in exchange for merchandise. If an individual is seeking a location to carry on any business, mercantile or other, he is sure to avoid the confines of Indiana, because within its limits his capital is circumscribed, and his business must fail. If he goes to Louisville or Cincinnati, where banking is carried on liberally, and where competition in banking exists, if he has $33,000 it will, in the course of the year, count him an active capital equal to $100,000; but if he comes to Indiana he must be content with the use of his $33,000, and it must lie dead on his hands, to be used in no other manner than in the purchase of stock; which, when sold on a credit, is totally dead and unprofitable, until the paper matures and the money collected on the sale. If he goes to Louisville or Cincinnati, and invests his money, say, in groceries, or other merchandise, he takes a note from his customer, puts his own name on the back of it, goes to the bank and gets it discounted, and by this means can turn his capital four times in a year. I could elucidate this matter much further, but it is unnecessary.

I have heard, in the course of this argument, a great many strange ideas. The gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden) says, that if we permit free banking (he should say restricted banking) we must permit railroad, plank road, and other joint-stock companies in the State to become bankers, and that we would inundate the State with an irresponsible currency. I can imagine that this was nothing but a fancy of the gentleman from Wayne. No such intention is deliberately entertained by any member of this Convention, but that all the restrictions which we can impose will go to prevent an operation of this kind. But as the gentleman has seen cause to allude to the idea that these railroad, plank road, and other wealthy associated companies will use their capital for this purpose, I will tell him how it can be done with advantage. Suppose, sir, that we have these railroad, plank road, and other wealthy associated companies, who are possessed of ample means, and holding profitable stocks, may not those gentlemen who own these roads, or stock of any kind, hypothecate their stock and purchase bonds of the State or of the United States, and make banking capital of them, and thereby secure to themselves the profits of two investments? This would certainly be furnishing capital and making profit upon that capital, without in the least injuring the interests of the public.

We have heard another gentleman, for whom I entertain great respect, speak in terms of horror, of the possibility of the introduction of foreign influence and foreign capital, and of the idea that our foreign bond holders might beat us in this second trade if they come to the State and become bankers. Sir, if we intend to pay the interest upon our bonds is it worse that we should pay it at home at New York, or at the Bank of England, or to the Rothschilds of whom the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) spoke the other day? I repeat, sir, that if the people intend to redeem their obligations they care not to whom they pay the interest, but that it would be much better, for them to pay it within the limits of their own State, than to bankers in the cities of New York or London.

We have also heard it said that if we adopt this system we will flood the country with small bills. Why so? Has not the Legislature the same power to add a further restriction that they shall not be issued, if the people do not desire their issue? And, if they were issued in what worse condition would we be than at present? If we turn to the report of the State Bank of Indiana of 1849, we will find that there were $600,000 of her issues in small bills. But, sir, gentlemen say that these small bills have appended to them the name of the State of Indiana; that they will therefore go abroad and be recognized beyond the vicinage of the State; on the other hand, let me reply, that if we should adopt a system of general banking, and bills should be issued under it, these bills will find just as wide a range as those which have impressed upon them the name of the State of Indiana. When it is known that by the Constitution, it is provided that no bill shall be issued within the limits of the State except those that shall be secured beyond the possibility of failure, I think that guarantee will be equal to the name of the State of Indiana upon the one dollar bill, or other small bills that are thus issued under the charter of the State Bank. Sir, the individual to whom such a bill might be presented would not have to enquire "is the State Bank of Indiana good," or "is the individual who issues this bill good?" No, sir; he would know that you have a provision in the fundamental law of your State making it good. That would give to such paper an additional security—such a security as would make it circulate as far as it would be necessary to circulate such monies. In addition to all this, I assert most positively, that the State of Indiana is not legally responsible for the payment of one dollar of the bills of the State Bank of Indiana, beyond the capital stock she holds in it. The name is potent; but let us not be deceived by names. It is at least calculated to mislead those who suppose that the use of the name of the State imposes any obligation for the redemption of the paper, if the State stock be squandered or lost. Of the same deceitful character is the attempt frequently made, to make the people believe that the friends of a general banking law, which is cantingly called "free banks" are in favor of the creation of anything like irresponsible banks, which may issue paper without being able or being required to redeem every dollar and every cent they may be allowed to issue. They are more positively opposed to any thing like irresponsible notes or issues, than are the old State Bank men. We require full security beforehand for every cent of notes to be issued for circulation. They must keep specie enough on hand to redeem their paper, or they, the bankers, are to be the losers and sufferers. The public run no risk. The banker must protect himself and in protecting himself must make the public safe. If he fails to keep specie to pay his notes at all times, his securities must be sold to pay them at his loss. You thereby make it the interest of the banker to deal honestly with the people, but you do not even trust his honesty, for you compel him to secure in the safest manner, all who take or handle his paper.

In regard to the action that might be had in reference to the State Bank of Indiana, were we to adopt another system, it may be necessary to say a word. If we should not provide in the Constitution for any other than a State Bank, might there not come a day when the people would say that they would absolve themselves from such a partnership, and that the State Bank might go down, and we would consequently be left without a bank? We must certainly take care not to make such a provision as will preclude the people from establishing banks, if they wish to do so; for I am not averse to saying that I believe that the habits and desires of the people are such as to induce the belief that we will have a bank of some kind or another. This seems to be conceded on all hands. This State Bank has yet seven years in which to do active business, and two years to wind up its affairs. Now, by the time that its charter will expire, we should have another system, or a substitute forming, to supply the place of the existing institution; and it becomes the duty of the Convention to see that such an arrangement is made as will not create a vacuum at the end of that time; but to leave it so that the people may fill that vacuum, if it should occur, by such an institution as their wants may require. In regard to the name of such a concern, those of us who support a general system of banking have only to say that we care not by what name it is called. But, sir, there is a disposition on the part of some gentlemen to carry abroad the presumption that every individual is free to bank as he pleases. We are far from entertaining such an idea. It is true that each man alike—he coming up to the requirements of the law—may bank if he pleases. It is the same as when we say that every man is free to become a farmer, or a merchant, or a tradesman, or any other profession in which he may choose to employ his talents. We do not pretend to say that, because every man cannot become a banker, that, therefore, he is deprived of the right of becoming so, if he be able. Why, sir, on the same principle, we might say that the individual who is unable to buy a farm, did not enjoy an equal privilege with his neighbor who was able to buy one. His money, or his industry, and perseverance, and attention to business will prompt him, if he desires to become a banker, or a farmer, or anything else, to endeavor to place himself in such a position, as to enable him to come within the requirements of the law in relation to any of these objects.

My friend from Putnam (Mr. Stevenson) took occasion to differ with the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle) on a mere point of terms used in his declamation. The gentleman from Putnam says that money is not the standard of value, because it will not purchase as much wheat to-day as it will purchase to-morrow, or at any other time.

Now, I will only reply that it is not the money that changes its value, but the wheat or the corn. Money is the nearest standard of any thing you can set up. The value of produce may change, and does change according to its abundance or scarcity, but the value of money does not, by any means, change in the same proportion. The gentleman from Putnam has also given us a long argument upon the imperfect action of this system of banking, with regard to changes, and alledges that our local banks will labor under a great difficulty in that respect.

I would ask him how it is that the branch banks of the State of Indiana are enabled to carry on their exchanges? We find by looking at the annual report of the State Bank that more than half the business of that institution is done through the medium of exchanges. Suppose, sir, that private banking were established in the State, with the salutary rules, which I hope to see around it, if it ever should be established; that it should require a large amount of capital, say, not less than an hundred, or two hundred thousand dollars, before the business of banking should be gone into. Would not that amount of capital enable the managers of it to provide for meeting their drafts in the Eastern States, as well as the branch banks of the State of Indiana, are provided by their means to meet similar requisitions. If you look into the branch banks of the State of Indiana, you will find but one of them with a capital exceeding $300,000 employed in their annual business. There are but three or four of them that go up to $200,000, and the majority of them are below $200,000.

Well, sir, I have no idea but that banks got together on the independent principle, would go beyond that in the amount of their capital; that individually or collectively, a larger sum would be put together; that they would have as much means to buy and sell exchanges, and be as apt to sustain drains upon them by other institutions as the present branches of the State Bank of Indiana. Ohio, with her ten millions of dollars, has no very favorable feeling toward us. They have been, and are now drawing specie where ever they have or do want to draw it. Our banks, under the system we propose, will be able in all emergencies, to meet these drafts, and to retaliate, if necessary, upon those who thus do them harm. Why may not these banks place themselves in the same attitude? There is nothing to prevent it. Any bond of union and systematic action, that will sustain the branch banks of the State of Indiana, must necessarily sustain individual banks of equal strength and capacity. Much has been said upon this subject and more might be said, but I will merely sum up my opinions and views, and give to the Convention that principle of action which will govern me in this matter.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the gentleman from Marion that his time has expired.

On motion, the half hour rule was suspended.

Mr. MORRISON (resuming). There will be presented to this Convention in the course of this debate, and before it shall have terminated, a series of sections which have undergone due deliberation by a large number of gentlemen who are in favor of a proper change in the system of banking. They conceive that these principles will not compel any Legislature to create a bank. They are simply of a negative character, permitting the people, through the medium of their representatives, to express their wishes in relation to banking. They will be presented here for your consideration. Gentlemen who are opposed to any system of banking may vote for them with the understanding that no bank can be created by this Convention without the sanction of the people.

When these sections are examined, they will be found to be on exact principles of equality to all men; that they guarantee to the note-holder the payment of the last cent that he may have in the way of obligation. Under such a set of sections as these, a banking clause may be presented to the people of the State, which will meet with their approbation. It will be strictly republican, and no one need meet his constituents and say "I have bartered off one of the rights you claim, or expect to claim." It should always be subject to repeal, amendment, or revision by your Legislature at any time you may choose. With these views I am ready to vote for this provision. I have ever been ready since the hour I first came into the Convention, to vote for a free and equal principle of banking, but I never have been willing, and never shall be willing to vote for anything that shall take freedom from one to give it to another, and to make by law a distinction of rights.

THURSDAY, JAN. 9, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. JAMEISON.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Convention then proceeded to the

ORDERS OF THE DAY,

And resumed the consideration of article No. 24—the report of the committee on banking.

The PRESIDENT announced the question as being upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen).

Mr. OWEN. That most shrewd and powerful of all anonymous writers, Junius, has, somewhere in his celebrated letters, the following sentence: "It is a very common mistake in argument and a very dangerous one in conduct, first to look for nothing in the argument proposed to us but the motive of the man who uses it, and then to measure the truth of his argument by the motive we have assigned to him."

That is as true now and here, as it was in England, in the days of Junius. And it is to guard, if that be possible, my argument of this morning against such danger, that I now say a few words touching myself.

I have already had occasion to say to the Convention, that I am not connected, either as debtor or as stock-holder, with any bank. I add, that none of my near relatives are so. Neither am I the owner of any stock, either of the United States, of this State, or of any other of the States of the Union. I say, further, that I am not a wealthy man, though I have, with many, the reputation of being so. If the Convention have any curiosity about so trifling a matter, I add, that my property, unincumbered and affording me a moderate independence, may amount to some twenty thousand dollars.

I do not belong, therefore, to that class of men who have the means, under a general banking law, of establishing a bank, or owning any considerable amount of bank stock. I have no interest in this matter but such as I feel in common with every citizen who has made Indiana his permanent home, and expects that his children, after him, will make it their place of residence.

It has been said, that no speech here, on the subject of banking, will change a vote. I do not believe that. There is a respectable minority on this floor who are opposed to all banking; and some of them, I know, have not yet decided, when they come to choose what they regard as the lesser of two evils, what system they will take.

I have much sympathy with the opinions of that minority, so far as relates to banking, as heretofore carried on, in most of the States of the Union. Every age has had its peculiar mode or fashion, according to which the strong and the crafty have abstracted from the millions a large portion of the proceeds of their labor. Formerly this was done by the armed hand. The noble of the middle ages, little better than a titled robber, seized, without scruple, the property of his weaker neighbor. Among us this is not permitted now. When the earnings of the poor man are taken, it is by fraud, not by force. This is an improvement on the old practice. I had rather have my money abstracted, in a quiet way, than to wake up some night and find my house on fire over my head.

As to the amount of the pecuniary loss, however, I am not at all sure, whether, under the reign of fraud, it has not equalled what it was under the reign of violence. The losses, in our country, since the first days of her independence, directly traceable to irresponsible banking alone, are to be reckoned—not by millions, not by tens of millions—but by hundreds of millions.

There must be some eminent advantage, some very great convenience, resulting from the use of bank paper; else banking, the source of losses so vast, would not continue and increase among us. There is great convenience in paper money. We all feel it, and know it. It is a rude and clumsy expedient, if I desire to make payment of twenty thousand dollars in the city of New York, to pack that amount of silver, or even of gold, into a box, and transport it, with much expense and risk, hence to that city. A bill of exchange will, indeed, in such a case, obviate the difficulty, even more effectually than a roll of bank notes. But, in some shape or other, a paper representative of value is clearly essential to the carrying on, with ordinary convenience, of extensive mercantile transactions.

Whether, ultimately, a circulating medium consisting of gold and silver and bills of exchange, will suffice for all necessary purposes, I do not undertake to say. Nor is that a practical question just now. A large majority of this Convention, guided by the wishes of a large majority of their constituents at home, are in favor of some system of banking. The question, then, is not whether we shall have banks or not; but only, what sort of banks we shall have.

The rival systems are the State Bank system and the General or Free Banking system, tested and now permanently established in New York.

Sir, to hear the gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) declaiming yesterday, one might have imagined that it was some foreign country, at war with us, he was denouncing, instead of a sister State. He conjured up visions of Wall street brokers and New York speculators, till one would have thought there was no such thing as honesty in the Empire State, and no such thing as swindling outside of it.

Nothing can be more unfair than this mode of judging; nothing better calculated to lead away from the truth than such a style of argument. Dishonesty is equally dishonesty, whether it exist east or west of the Alleghenies. Things are what they are, without reference to their location.

"Pigmies are pigmies still, though perched on Alps. And pyramids are pyramids in vales."

Sir, the gentleman knows, or ought to know, that to the State of New York we are indebted for many of the best and most spirited and enterprising of our citizens. I am aware that there is, in the minds of many, a prejudice against her. From New York came most of the money spent upon that Internal Improvement system which resulted so fatally to the State; and it has been the fashion, ever since, to talk, in this Convention, about the nabobs and shavers of Wall street. Yet who is actually in fault? they who loaned the money, or we who squandered it? I have not, indeed, forgotten, that, for some three millions of our bonds we received no value. Let the blame rest, where it belongs, on those who sold, or on those who authorized the sale of those bonds, on credit.

I know there exists prejudice, with many, against a gentleman from New York, now in this city, whose name is intimately connected with the financial history of our State; I mean Charles Butler. And, since his name occurs to me, I here take occasion to say, that I know of no one man to whom Indiana is more indebted for escape from the danger and disgrace of repudiation, than to Mr. Butler. I do not ascribe to him any special desire to rescue our State, then on the brink of insolvency. His agency for the bond holders was doubtless a profitable operation to himself, as it was right enough it should be. But I speak of results alone. And I know something about them. Mr. Butler called upon me, at the time when, as member of Congress, I had charge, in the Lower House, of the bill which granted about a million of acres of land, to aid the completion of the Wabash and Erie Canal: and he it was who first brought to my mind the distinct conviction that upon the success of that bill, as a first step, depended, in all human probability, whether the foul stain of repudiation should or should not attach through all time to the State of my adoption.

The result justified his prediction. He proposed to the Legislature, and a majority of that body adopted an arrangement.

Mr. DOBSON (interrupting and Mr. OWEN giving way) remarked, that, three years before that time, the same arrangement had been proposed to the Legislature. Mr. D. made some other remarks inaudible at the Reporter's desk.

Mr. OWEN (resuming). I am glad to hear that, three years ago, before the consummation of the plan, some one saw and proposed a similar measure, with intent to save the State from insolvency.

But this is a digression; and I return from it to say another word to the gentleman from Decatur, (Mr. Robinson,) from whom I should have been glad to hear an argument against the principle of free banking, not against the location of the system.

The gentleman doubtless recollects that, in November, 1848, he voted for two individuals; one, now no more, for President; and the other, since promoted from the Vice Presidency to be Chief Magistrate of the Union, Millard Fillmore. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he has ever examined the opinions of this man, (who, by the aid of the gentleman's vote, reached the Presidential Chair,) on the subject of what the gentleman calls the "swindling operations" of the New York free banks? No one had a better opportunity of forming a judgment as to their character and safety, than Mr. Fillmore. In 1848 he was Comptroller of the State of New York; the very officer with whom the free banks were required to lodge their securities, and from whom they obtained their notes. His official station gave him the supervision of the free banks. He had the best possible opportunity, then, of judging whether the system was a sound or an unsound one.

Here is Mr. Fillmore's report as Comptroller, made in 1848. I ask the gentleman's attention to the following extract:

"The distinguishing feature of the free banking system is its requirement of productive and available securities, to be pledged with a State officer, as a guarantee for a redemption of the whole circulation. This system has been tried and tested by nearly twelve years experience, and may now be regarded as firmly established in public estimation as the basis of all future legislation on the subject of banking."—Page 137.

How strong are the words! This system may be regarded as "firmly established in public estimation." It will be, says Millard Fillmore, the "basis of all future legislation on the subject." This is the very same "swindling concern"—the very same "bantling of New York shavers and speculators"—which the gentleman denounced so roundly. Is the gentleman he helped to make President its aider and abettor?

But here is a little more of our whig President's opinions, from the same report:

"The practice of granting exclusive privileges to particular individuals invited competition for these legislative favors. They were soon regarded as a part of the spoils belonging to the victorious party, and were dealt out as rewards for partisan services. This practice became so shameless and corrupt that it could be endured no longer; and, in 1838, the Legislature sought a remedy in the general banking law. This was the origin of the free bank system."

Still stronger, sir! The old system of granting exclusive charters, advocated by the gentleman from Decatur, had become, says Mr. Fillmore, so "shameless and corrupt" that it "could be endured no longer;" and the general banking law was adopted as a remedy for shameless corruption.

Either Mr. Fillmore is a very ignorant man, or a very dishonest one; or else great weight ought to attach to this declaration. I believe him to be an honest man. I believe him to be an able man. I did not vote for him; but I trust I can render justice to a political opponent.

Mr. ROBINSON (interposing). The gentleman is mistaken; I have no harsh feeling towards New York; nor did I say a word against Mr. Butler. I spoke of the banks of New York, and endeavored to show, by quoting from Mr. Fillmore's report, that one-half those banks had gone by the board. And when I spoke of the free banks of New York, I spoke of their practical effects upon the country. As I said before, I entertain no feeling against either the State of New York or her citizens.

Mr. OWEN. I made no assertion that the gentleman had attacked Mr. Butler. Of the general tenor and tone of his remarks regarding New York speculators, the Convention will judge. Enough for my purpose, however, that the gentleman predicted but disaster and bankruptcy from the free bank system—the system which Mr. Fillmore considers as a refuge, and the only refuge, from shameless corruption—the same system which Mr. Fillmore declares to have firmly established itself, after long trial, in public estimation.

Another brief lesson on the subject of banking from Mr. Fillmore's report:

"Suppose banks were required to pay in all their capital, and the most satisfactory proof should be required of the fact." (This is just what the gentleman from Decatur proposes that a State Bank shall do. Now hear Mr. Fillmore.) "Even that is no security to the billholder. The capital paid in is left in the custody of those who paid it. They can withdraw it at pleasure."

Mr. Fillmore then proceeds to remind us that, under such a system, where the security is left in the custody of those pretending to give it, a dishonest President and Cashier might prove, one week, that their capital was all paid in, and the requisite amount of specie actually in their vaults; the next, they might issue their bills for property easily convertible; and the week after, leave with that property for California.

If it be said that this is doctrine from a whig source, I reply that it is true and wholesome doctrine, come from what source it may.

Thus the matter stands. There ought to be complete security for the bill holder. This should be certified to the satisfaction of every one to whom the bill may be tendered. But who is to certify? The banker who issues the bill? What! in his own case?

Here (said Mr. O., holding up a bank note,) is a dollar bill of the State Bank of Indiana. It bears the attesting signature of my friend, Judge Morrison, as President of the Bank, a very good officer and prudent man, as was President Merrill before him. He virtually certifies, on this bit of paper, to the fact that there lies, in the vault of the Bank, a silver dollar, with which the bill may be redeemed. But is he the proper person to certify to such a fact as that? What would you think, sir, of a man going his own security? or issuing, to satisfy the public of his veracity, some such document as this: "I hereby certify that I have, on all occasions, spoken the truth."

If it be right and proper that the public should be satisfactorily assured that a bank is solvent and trustworthy; that there lies, somewhere in safe deposit, the wealth of which a bank note is the representative; it is clearly not the banker himself who should tender to his fellow-citizens that assurance, but some one else for him.

Here is the great leading difference between a State Bank and a free bank system. In the one case, the security (if it be security) remains in the custody of the banker; in the other, it passes into the custody of the Government. Which is the safer system for the bill holder? Beyond all question, the latter.

But there is another marked difference between the two systems. In the one, the State is a partner; in the other she is not. This point I have already discussed. I believe that a majority of this Convention agree with me in the opinion, that the State ought not to become a stockholder in any corporation whatever. She ought not to be a banker, any more than she should be a railroad maker, a canal digger, or a plank road builder, or engage in any similar occupation. These things, in my judgment, are not within the legitimate province of State legislation. They are far better left to the sagacity of individual enterprise.

Again, I think a State ought not to place her funds where they may be lost or stolen. Have they been lost or stolen in the State Bank? No; because the Bank managers have been prudent and honest. To their prudence and honesty we owe it, not to the system, that the funds are yet safe.

What is the third difference between the rival systems? Some will say it is in favor of the State Bank. I speak of the mutual responsibility of its branches; the distinguishing feature of our State Bank system, alluded to by the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks). This very feature may be incorporated into the free bank system. I do not say it ought to be; nor that it is a desirable feature, except as between the branches of one mother bank. But there is nothing in the free banking system to exclude it, if the Legislature see fit to adopt it in a General Banking Law.

There remains yet another difference between the two systems to be noticed—an important one too—namely, that the one is an exclusive monopoly, granted to certain individuals, and refused, under the same conditions, to others; while the other is a system under which equal privileges are granted, on the same conditions, to all alike.

I know the gentleman from Decatur has told us, that the free bank system is itself a monopoly; the worst of monopolies, that of wealth. Says he—

"Talk of free banking! None but wealthy men are privileged to set up free banks. None other can purchase the bonds demanded, under that system, as security."

That is beautiful argument! To make the bill-holder safe there must be security for the redemption of the bills. That security must be in money, or in that which is readily convertible into money. To furnish such security, (says the gentleman from Decatur,) a man must be rich. Of course. It only follows (what we all know) that none but a comparatively wealthy banker can issue bills that are safe.

And is this to be made matter of complaint? And are we to be told that this is a monopoly, because the poor man cannot engage in it? So, by parity of reasoning, you might say of every business requiring large capital, whether mercantile, manufacturing, or of any other character. Say that the gentleman from Decatur has ten thousand dollars to spare, and I the same sum. We put our funds together, a capital of twenty thousand dollars. Are we to complain of the monopoly of wealth because we are not allowed to issue a hundred thousand dollars of notes on a capital of but one fifth that amount, while a free banker, depositing as collateral security the full hundred thousand dollars, is allowed to issue bills to the amount thus secured? Has he any privilege over us? None whatever. He is richer than we, and can do a larger business; that is all.

In the very nature of things, there must, in banking, be wealth; or there must be irresponsible paper. Either a banker is to be allowed to issue notes beyond the amount of property, readily convertible into money, which he owns; or else he is not. In the first case, his notes bear a lie on their face. In the second case, his notes may be made safe; by his wealth, undoubtedly; for nothing else but actual wealth, to back up paper promises, can make them more than empty promises, a trap for the unwary, a means of defrauding men of the bread they earn. In the whole range of arguments against free banking, there is not one so ridiculous as this.

But experience, says the gentleman from Shelby, is altogether against a general system of banking; and he alludes, in proof of his position, to the New York system, as a failure.

The PRESIDENT here intimated that the time allotted to the gentleman under the rule, had expired.

It was moved and seconded that the rule be suspended.

Upon which motion,

Mr. BRACKEN demanded the yeas and nays, and the same being ordered, were had, and resulted—yeas 103, nays 25—as follows:

So the rule was suspended.

Mr. OWEN. I am greatly indebted to the Convention for its courtesy, and to the gentleman from Rush (Mr. Bracken) for affording me a little breathing time. I had not intended, nor do I now intend, to occupy much more time, in completing my remarks, than that which has been consumed in calling the yeas and nays.

I desire briefly to advert to the history of free banking in the State of New York.

The system was first established by an act passed in the month of April, 1838, and the general provisions of the law were as follows:

First. It required a deposit of United States stocks, or of such State stocks, equal to five per cent. stock, as might be "approved by the Comptroller."

Second. But half the amount, instead of bearing stocks, might be mortgages, bearing six per cent. on real estate, taken at half its appraised value; the mode of valuation to be prescribed by the Comptroller.

Third. No individual liability beyond the stock and mortgages deposited.

This system was very defective. In the first place, to make the security good, the stocks should have been, or should have been made, equal to six per cent.; and the power to accept or reject particular stocks ought never to have been given to the Comptroller. Next, the mortgage system is a bad one, especially when the mode of appraisal is left to a public officer. In this western country, at least, mortgages, however complete their ultimate security may be, are not readily converted into cash. And finally, there was no individual liability of stockholders.

It was under this system, imperfect and ill-guarded as it is, that the failures alluded to by the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) took place. The gentleman from Decatur (Mr. Robinson) is, however, entirely mistaken when he speaks of one-half the banks going by the board. Out of a hundred and four banks, (with a capital within a fraction of ten millions,) thirty-one (with a capital of less than a million and a half) failed. They ultimately paid seventy-six cents on the dollar; making the actual loss to the bill-holders about one-third of a million, or one-thirtieth of the entire capital invested. This is equal to a loss of three and one-third per cent. on that capital. And this occurred at a time of the most trying commercial difficulties, when nothing saved our own State Bank, but a law authorizing it to suspend specie payments. Had it been left like the New York free banks, to its fate, the loss, in all human probability, on its notes, would have been far greater than that on the notes of the free banks.

Thus, by this system which has been denounced here as an infamous scheme of swindling, even under its earliest and very faulty provisions, the entire loss to the public was but a twentieth of that suffered in Mississippi, and less than a twentieth of that suffered in Louisiana, under the special charter system. Arkansas, under the same system of bank monopoly, lost ten times as much, by her banks.

But let us look, now, to the improved free bank system of New York, under the amended Constitution of that State; and let us inquire what have been its results?

Its provisions are as follows:

First. It requires a deposit of United States stocks, or of New York State stocks; the stocks of other States being excluded. The stock is to be, or to be made, equal to stock bearing six per cent.

Second. But one-half may be mortgages, bearing seven per cent., on real estate, taken at two-fifths its appraised value.

Third. There is individual liability of the stockholder, over and above his stock, to an amount equal to his stock.

Under this amended system, since the adoption of the new Constitution, in 1846, what failures, out of a banking capital of about eleven millions, have occurred? In substance, not one. Walter Joy's bank, in Buffalo, suspended payment, at one time, for about a week. At the end of that week it resumed specie payment, and its notes, strange to say, had actually appreciated in value. This is easily explained. By the general banking law in New York, all country free banks are compelled to make arrangements, so that their notes shall be redeemed, at some bank in the city of New York, at a half per cent. discount. But when Joy's bank suspended payment, the corresponding house in New York immediately gave notice, that it would redeem the notes of that bank, at par; which it continued to do, until the panic subsided.

There is but one other example, under this new system, of temporary suspension; that of the bank of Corning, in Steuben county. Here, again, the suspension did not extend beyond ten days. It was caused by a fire, which consumed the banking-house, and by which, it was rumored, the bank had lost a large amount of property. There was a run on the bank. She gave up part of her notes, withdrawing from the Auditor a corresponding amount of stocks, sold these out at once, and, within ten days, she had resumed payment.

These are the only examples, under the amended system, even of temporary suspension—failures they are not. They furnish the strongest argument in favor of the sound and wholesome character of the system. They prove its power to secure the bill-holder, under all accidents; for not one dollar was lost to a single individual, holding the notes either of Joy's bank, or of the Corning bank. The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) informs me, that Joy's paper, circulating at Fort Wayne, passed, even during the very week of suspension, almost as currently as before; so strong was public confidence in the certainty of its speedy redemption.

Now, let the friends of special banking show us, in any State of the Union, results, under their system, to match these. If they point to our own State Bank, which is, perhaps, as favorable an example as can be named, I remind them, that she would have gone down long ago, had she not, by express enactment of law, been released from her obligation to redeem her notes in specie. And I remind them, further, that her suspension of payment extended, not to a week only, as did that of the suspended free banks of New York; not to a year only; but to some four years. No suspension of specie payments was ever granted by law to the New York free banks; nor should it ever be granted, to any bank whatsoever.

Now, sir, the system of free banking, as proposed in the system I submitted, is more stringent than the amended system of New York. It requires, as does that system, a deposit of stocks, made equal to six per cent.; but it excludes all mortgages. Its further provisions are these:

First. The State shall not be a stockholder.

Second. The deposit of stock, to secure the payment of notes issued, shall be dollar for dollar.

Third. There shall be no suspension of specie payments.

Fourth. Bill-holders shall be preferred creditors.

Fifth. Stockholders shall be individually liable, to an amount, beyond their stock, equal to the amount of that stock.

Sixth. No greater rate of interest shall be received by banks, than is permitted to be received by individuals.

Seventh. Laws creating banks shall be, at all times, liable to be repealed.

I believe, sir, that these restrictions, though stringent, as they should be, will not discourage or prevent a judicious system of banking. They but strike out from the system of special and irresponsible banking that has prevailed in most of our States, those fatal features which have so often rendered it a curse, instead of a benefit.

I read, the other day, sir, in some English newspaper, an account of the feats performed by certain Indian jugglers, who handled with impunity snakes of the most poisonous character; for example, the cobra of the East. At first, it was supposed that these dreaded reptiles were, by some mysterious influence, charmed into submission, and withheld from inflicting their fatal bite. But it appears, that the explanation of what seems a marvellous feat, is, in fact, a very simple one. Before the juggler plays with the cobra, he extracts, with scrupulous care, the bag whence its poison is ejected; and thus it becomes innocuous. So have I endeavored to extract from the fatal system of banking, which has so often shed its deadly influence over our commercial prosperity, its poison-fangs. Great will be the boon to the community, if we succeed in so doing.

Before concluding, I must notice one item—an important one—strongly marking the difference between the two systems. The actual profits of the State Bank, at this time, exceed twelve per cent., while the dividends declared by the free banks of New York, average less than eight per cent. The one system, in its practical operation, extracts from the people, directly or indirectly, upwards of fifty per cent. more than the other.

This is a remarkable fact, and should, in my judgment, have much weight with the Convention. These free banks, organized under a system which has been denounced as little better than legalized swindling, have not been able to realize more than eight per cent.; while, under the State Bank system, (the moderation of which is here so often vaunted,) twelve per cent. profit, at least—some have put the rate much higher than that, reckoning the surplus fund, converted, from time to time, into additional stock—but, at all events, twelve per cent. profit is drawn, in one way or other, from the community. How does this tally with the opinions expressed here by friends of the State Bank, as to the relative amount of tax, levied on the public, in the shape of interest on discount, by the two systems.

We have now to choose—between a monopoly, whence is realized twelve per cent. profit, and a system of equal privileges yielding eight per cent. only; between a plan of banking under which the security pretended to be given remains in the custody of the giver, and one in which the security given is lodged in the vaults of the State; between a union of bank and State, or no union of bank and State; between a favored bank with an exclusive charter for a term of years, and a general banking law, repugnant at all times.

Experience, while recording the vast losses following in the train of exclusive banking, has set his seal of approval, not indeed upon the old free bank system of 1838, but upon the system as it has prevailed in New York under the amended Constitution, and as it now exists in that State.

And in shaping our course according to these teachings of experience, we are carrying out a great and just principle: that which condemns special legislation. This principle is coming to be generally recognized among us. Few matters occupied a more a prominent place in the canvass of last summer than the manifold evils of special legislation. Shall we then fasten upon the State, special legislation in one of its most dangerous forms?

One last argument remains to be noticed. It was made by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Niles,) and has considerable weight. He says we ought not to declare United States stock the sole security in free banking; seeing that in fifteen or twenty years the debts, both of the General Government and the States may be paid off, and no stock may remain, to be deposited as security.

That may be. But it is not certain that before that time, the issue of bank notes may not become unnecessary also. We may find a system of currency comprising gold and silver and bills of exchange alone all sufficient for current and commercial purposes. And if we do not, it is easy to introduce an amendment to the Constitution, so as to meet the exigencies of the case. At all events, I think that for some ten or fifteen years to come, we ought to restrict the security demanded, to State and United States stocks. They are more readily convertible than any other securities; and it is a cardinal principle in sound and safe banking, that whatever the banker depends on to redeem his issues, should be not only ultimately secure in the future, but capable of being converted at a very few days notice into that gold and silver which his outstanding notes promise and represent.

[Mr. WALPOLE next spoke on the question at some length, his speech will be published hereafter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. I desire, Mr. President, to make some remarks upon this subject that my views and action may be fully understood, and that I may reply to some of the arguments and statements of some gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I choose to do so because some of those statements and arguments have not been noticed by those who in the main agree with me, and because I am compelled, in the multiplicity of questions that arise on the subject of banking, to give votes, which, considered separately, may not be fully understood.

I have been constrained, by a sense of duty, to differ from a portion of my colleagues in several votes which have been taken on this subject. I have no fault to find with them, being responsible only for my own action. I am of the opinion, that a large majority of the people of Marion county, outside of Indianapolis, are in favor of a State Bank and Branches, with such modifications and amendments as the experience of sixteen years has pointed out. This I have learned, as well from the information I received during the canvass previous to the election, as from an extensive intercourse with the people since the commencement of the Convention; and it might well be regarded as a dereliction of duty on my part if I were to remain silent, and not contribute my mite to relieve that institution from the misconceptions entertained in regard to it and the unfounded imputations thrown upon it by gentlemen who are desirous to break it down. In doing so it is not my purpose to attack free banking or any other system of banking, nor do I desire to advocate the present to the exclusion of all other systems of banking.

It is not necessary, sir, that I should disclaim all party feeling on this question, for it cannot have escaped the observation of the least attentive spectator of our proceedings that the two great political parties are wholly disorganized on the question now under consideration, and I may be permitted to express the hope that the question of banking and currency may never again become elements in a party controversy.

I have no interest in any bank save as a citizen of the State, whose interest in the State Bank is very large. I own no stock in any bank, nor do I expect to become a banker under any system that may be established, unless indeed a plan of banking be adopted, by which, according to the arguments of the gentleman from Laporte and others, the poor as well as the rich may engage in the business. I did once own a little stock, but I sold it long ago, under the conviction that I could do better with the money. I have no relative either in the State Bank or in the branch at this place, nor is there any personal consideration that could influence my action in reference to the continuance of the present system. It is no more than justice however that I should say, that, so far as I know, those who manage the State Bank as well as the branch at this place are gentlemen of no doubted capacity and integrity.

It is not requisite that I should say a word as to whether we should have banks or no banks. If it were an original question here, and if there were no banks in other States, the subject would of course be a debatable one, but as banking is carried on extensively by our sister States, and as if we have no paper currency of our own we shall be compelled to use that issued by other States, the profits of which will be realized by them, I take it for granted that, without any question, banking upon some plan will be continued in our State. Besides it has been already settled by several votes that a majority of this Convention are in favor of some sort of banks.

When the Constitution of Indiana was adopted—some thirty-four years ago—there was a clause engrafted in it having reference to banking, by which all systems were excluded except a State Bank, and the number of branches limited to one for every three counties. When we take into consideration the condition of things at that time, the restrictions seem to be very natural. The independent banks in surrounding States had given way under the effects of a commercial crisis, and a State control and a State interest were doubtless deemed indispensable to the safety of a banking system. Our population at that time was very small, perhaps not exceeding sixty or seventy thousand. The entire country, from forty miles south of here to the northern line of the State, now abounding in cities, and towns, and villages, and productive farms, was then an entire wilderness, inhabited only by the red man and the wild beast. To the framers of our Constitution a bank to every three counties, therefore, seemed quite sufficient. But things have changed; our population has increased to near a million, and the necessities for commercial facilities have increased in proportion. A prominent objection to the present banking system is that it is not adequate to the wants of the country. I admit the objection in all its force; but that objection could and would be obviated in the establishment of a new bank. An increase in the capital stock and in the number of branches could be made to any needful extent.

Another objection to the charter of the present bank, and one which has doubtless had much influence in exciting opposition to it, is that provision which requires the unanimous assent of the branches to the establishment of an additional branch. I admit the force of this objection, and I doubt not that the action of the branch at Lafayette, in one or more cases of this kind, has brought upon the bank a very large amount of the hostility manifested to it upon this floor. I shall not defend that branch or any other that may have acted on so narrow a principle. I do not think that such action is at all defensible; but if it be I leave it to the very intelligent gentlemen who represent Lafayette in this Convention, and who take a leading part on the subject of banking, to make that defence. That objection also could be remedied in a new charter.

The argument that the Bank is a monopoly, and that none but the rich can become bankers, would apply equally to all other systems. At the commencement of our banking system the door was thrown wide open, and any one who had the means, and chose to do so, could have purchased stock; and now any man who chooses can buy stock at the estimated value. I need not add that a poor man may participate in Banking on our present as well as any other system, unless there be one established in which stock shall be furnished gratuitously.

The gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read,) referred to a report of the Auditor of State, made in 1847, to show that the million of dollars lost some years ago was properly chargeable to the State Bank system. The same charge had been made before by the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) and others. Now, sir, let us look carefully and candidly into this matter and see how it stands. In February, 1839, the Legislature of Indiana, under a full belief that the operations of the State Bank had resulted in advantage to the State, directed the commissioners of the Sinking Fund, through the agency of the President of the State Bank or Fund Commissioners, to contract, on the part of the State, for the loan of one and a-half millions of dollars for the year 1839, and seven hundred thousand for each of the five succeeding years, the object of which was to increase the stock of the State Bank and establish additional Branches. Now, Mr. President, there is no evidence that the Bank had anything at all to do with this loan. For any thing that appears it was wholly a legislative matter. Ascertaining that the experiment of the State Bank system had proved a safe one, and that very fair profits had been realized by the State from her stock, the Legislature doubtless regarded it as good policy to extend the system and enlarge the profits. Mr. President, I have examined this act with some attention, and I find in it several peculiarities.

Section four directs how the loans and discounts shall be made, providing that they shall be distributed as near as may be among the counties, according to the State tax in each. The seventh section prescribes a mode of loaning and a rate of interest different from those authorized by the Bank Charter. And the fifth section provides that the profits of the stock created by virtue of this act, shall be appropriated to internal improvements. Now, sir, it is known that the profits of the State Bank, by the charter, are applied to common schools. I can put no other construction upon the action of the General Assembly than this: They were satisfied that the State had made a large profit for common school purposes, and were anxious to extend the benefits to the internal improvement system, so that the interest on internal improvement bonds might be partly paid from that source, and thus relieve the people, to that extent, from taxation. There is no evidence that the Bank asked this extension, or had any knowledge of it. On the contrary, the probability is strong, that the Legislature, in passing the act, was influenced by a laudable desire to advance the interest of the State, by increasing the benefits of what was deemed a safe and profitable institution. The attempt to carry out the purpose of the Legislature, in consequence of a monetary crisis, unfortunately proved disastrous, and but a small portion of the money was obtained, but I ask, in all candor, whether that has any thing to do with the merits of our banking system? Does any gentleman contend that the State Bank is responsible for this loss? Does the gentleman from Clark, who is a stockholder in this institution, desire to involve himself and the other stockholders in the responsibility of the loss? That gentleman defended the practice of selling bills of exchange, as a legitimate operation, and alleged that with all its privileges the Bank had divided only about eight per cent. per annum; and I inferred from his remarks that one of his objections to the continuance of it was that it did not yield per cent. enough.

Mr. READ of Clark. The gentleman from Marion misapprehended me. I did not say that the stock did not yield sufficient per cent.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I understood the gentleman to say, in replying to the objections that the Bank dealt in bills of exchange and thereby increased its profits, that the stock yielded but about eight per cent. per annum, when, as he alleged, money was worth ten per cent., and I drew the inference from his argument that he thought he could make more out of his money by other investments. I assure the gentleman that I do not design to misrepresent him. He did not say that the profits were too small. I only drew the inference from his argument that he thought so.

The gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles,) argues zealously that the State should have nothing to do with banking—that she might as well enter the market and buy produce, or enter into any other enterprise in competition with her citizens. That is a question concerning which there is much difference of opinion, and which I have not time now to discuss. I will barely remark, that the experience of this State on the subject of Banking—and an ounce of experience is said, by a very wise man, to be worth a pound of theory—is decidedly against the gentleman's argument. He declares that if it were true, as the friends of the Bank allege, that that institution had produced large profits to the State, he would still say that the principal was radically wrong, and should not be tolerated longer than during the existence of the present charter of the bank. But, continued the gentlemen, it is a sufficient answer to the argument in favor of the bank on that account to say that it had in fact earned nothing.

Mr. NILES. Will the gentleman from Marion allow me to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. NILES. What I said was that when the account of the Bank came to be balanced and the loss deducted from the profits it would be found that nothing had been earned.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I shall not misrepresent the gentleman. If he has paid any attention to my desultory remarks he will have understood me as contending that, from the law and the facts of the case, the loss to which he refers cannot be pleaded as an offset to the profits. But the gentleman from Laporte and others contend that if the State Bank had never had an existence this loss would not have been sustained. Mr. President, this forcibly reminds me of an occurrence which I heard of many years ago. A gentleman owned a very fine spring from which issued a branch at which it was customary to water the stock. There was a rapid descent from the house to the branch. The father put his little boy on the horse and directed him to ride him down the hill and water him. On the way down the animal stumbled and fell, doing considerable injury to the little boy. The father was much enraged, and pronounced an execration upon the spring, declaring that if it had not been for the spring his boy would not have been injured. Now I submit whether it was a good argument against the spring that a misfortune occurred in one instance while seeking a participation in its benefits. And is the argument any better against the State Bank that the State authorities, in endeavoring to extend its benefits at a critical period in the history of the country, met with a misfortune? I have already shown that the profits of the proposed increase of banking capital were to be applied to a purpose different from that to which the profits of the present banking system are devoted, and that so far as can be ascertained the misfortune arose out of a laudable desire in the Legislature to increase the commercial facilities of the country, and to use the credit of the State for the purpose of relieving the people in some degree from the burthens of taxation.

Is it fair, then, Mr. President, to allege that the State Bank has earned nothing for the State. You have already seen by the report of the cashier, made in reply to a resolution at an early period of the session of this Convention, that the profits are already nearly a million of dollars—that in all probability the profits at the end of the charter will be equal to the sum borrowed originally for banking purposes, viz: $1,390,000—and that if the charter were to continue until the period when the bonds for banking purposes fall due, (some seven or eight years after the expiration of the charter,) the whole profits would reach two millions. It has occurred to me as worthy of deliberate consideration, whether, in view of these facts, it would not be sound policy, even if the State Bank system should be totally abandoned afterwards, that it should be continued until near the time when the bonds are payable, so as to retain within the State until that time, the use of $1,390,000 at five per cent. per annum. But as a majority of this Convention seem determined that the State shall have no interest in banking after the expiration of the existing charter (in 1857,) I shall press that subject no further at this time.

Mr. President, I am free to admit that there is a good deal of complaint in the neighborhood of the Branch Bank at this place, as to the manner in which its business is conducted, and the same objection may exist elsewhere. It is the practice of the Branch at Indianapolis to give a preference in its loans to those who use the money in the purchase of the agricultural products, and the stock of the country. I understand a rule was adopted some years ago, and is probably still in force, which limits the discounts to two hundred dollars, unless it be for such purposes as that to which I have referred, or the promotion of some of the industrial pursuits of the country. For the payment of debts, or the purchase of goods, I believe they limit their discounts to two hundred dollars. They contend that, as their means are inadequate to meet the wants of the country based upon unquestionable paper, sound policy and the best interests of the community demand that such a discrimination should be made. Whether their course be right or wrong is a matter that I do not feel called upon to determine. I only state the facts. That such a rule should produce discontent is perfectly natural. Those thus aggrieved, as they think, demand that there be other banks authorized, and an increase of banking capital, and the demand is not an unreasonable one. In this connexion I must refer to a remark made by my friend from Clark (Mr. Read) on the subject of granting loans. He told us that one of the causes which break up banks is that they refuse to loan to farmers, and grant their accommodations to favorites who never pay them back. That may be true as to the Branch in which the gentleman holds stock, and in which he of course has some control; but from what I have stated it will have been seen that it is not applicable to the Bank in this place. The complaint here is entirely the other way.

The gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) at the opening of this debate, made a very able speech against the State Bank, and in the opinion of some against all Banks. In that speech, if I understood him correctly, he objected to the State Bank system that it expanded and contracted the currency at pleasure, and thus regulated the value of property and agricultural products, and argued that under the Free Banking System the currency would remain undisturbed and regular. I shall leave the argument of this question to others, contenting myself with a few facts. I had the curiosity, after hearing that gentleman's speech, to examine whether the issues of the State Bank were indeed so fluctuating. I obtain from the official reports the following facts upon that subject: In 1845 the circulation of the State Bank was $3,527,351. In 1846 it was $3,336,533, a reduction of $190,818. In 1847 it was $3,606,452, an increase over the previous year of $269,919. In 1848 it was $3,552,210, a reduction of $54,242 compared with the preceding year. In 1849 the circulation was $3,304,260, a reduction of $247,950. In 1850 the circulation was $3,421,445, a reduction of $117,185. Now, sir, I ask if this statement does not show a remarkable uniformity of circulation, and whether the objection of the gentleman from Cass is not overthrown by the facts?

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Petit) stated in his speech a few days since, that not one Bank out of five hundred had wound up solvent heretofore, and that hereafter there will not be one in five thousand that will pay their debts. Now I will not raise a question of veracity with the gentleman, nor will I undertake to compete with him in prophecy; but I will say that if I sincerely believed, as he affects to believe, that no Bank will ever wind up solvent, I would go with all my might against the establishment of any sort of a Bank. I would not aid in imposing, or permitting the Legislature to impose, upon the community, any such an institution. Now I believe that gentleman is regarded as a leading and able supporter of free banking, with a full apprehension, according to his own doctrine, that they will wind up insolvent and swindle the public. His argument, I should think, would not give much aid to any system of Banking.

i That gentleman declared further, in the most impetuous and vehement manner, that the idea of vested rights was a perfect fallacy, and that he hurled such doctrine to the winds as trash, as totally without foundation. He intended that his declaration should apply immediately to the State Bank and his purpose was to show that its charter could be destroyed at any time, but his argument would apply equally to all Plank Road and Rail Road Companies, and, as I suppose, to all private contracts between individuals, not excepting the marriage contract. I should think it totally unnecessary to attempt to refute such an argument. The mere statement of it is sufficient to demonstrate its monstrosity.

The gentleman, after declaring the State Bank insolvent, gave a most graphic and pathetic account of the loss of the trust funds of the State. He seemed to be full of patriotic misgivings about the loss of the College Fund, the Saline Fund, the Bank Tax Fund, and the Common School Fund. Now, Mr. President, it might be a sufficient answer to the declamation of the gentleman to say, even if the funds referred to were in fact in the custody of the Bank, that no member who has examined the reports of the Bank, or knows any thing of its condition, has any doubts of its solvency, and that it will close up with a handsome profit to the State. But, sir, even if the Bank be utterly insolvent, the gentleman's patriotic fears will still be in a great measure groundless. The College Fund cannot well be lost, for the Bank has not, and never had, a dollar of it in its custody. That fund, as is known to every gentleman who has paid any attention to the official documents of the State, or who knows any thing about the laws on that subject, is loaned out by the Auditor of State on mortgage, the interest of which, and the principal when returned, are paid into the State Treasury. That fund therefore cannot be lost by the Bank unless its officers break into the Treasury and steal it. The Saline Fund is next in order, and of that, according to the report of the officers of the Bank, that institution holds only about $5,000. A part of this Fund is also managed by the Treasury Department, loaned out on mortgage, and distributed annually, as it is returned by the mortgagors, to the several counties according to the number of polls, and, together with former distributions, is managed by the counties for the benefit of common schools. Of this Fund only $5,000 can be lost if the Bank becomes insolvent. We come next to the Bank Tax Fund. This Fund, as is known to the Convention, is derived from a tax of twelve and a half cents per annum on each share of stock held by individuals in the several Branches of the State Bank, as provided in the 15th section of the Bank Charter. A considerable amount of this Fund had accumulated in the Bank some years ago, which, according to an act of the Legislature, was paid over to the State Treasury, and afterwards, by another act passed in January 1845, was distributed to the several counties in just proportions, and applied, like the Saline Fund, to the benefit of common schools. The Bank is required annually to pay over to the State authorities the amount derived from this source, and this sum, together with what comes in as principal and interest from a portion still on mortgage for loans made by the Treasury Department, is annually distributed on the 1st of March to the counties, and applied as before stated. If therefore the Bank break, as the gentleman supposes, there can only be a loss of one year's accumulation, which is something short of $3,000. The common school fund is the next and last to which the gentleman referred. How this is derived may be seen by reading the 14th section of the Bank Charter. This Fund is also directed by law to be paid over as it accumulates to the State Treasury, and remains then a permanent fund, (drawing six per cent. interest,) for common school education, under the direction of the General Assembly. According to the last Auditor's Report, $652,185-53 have already been received by the Treasury. If the President of the State Bank complies with the law (as I doubt not he will) there can be no loss of this Fund by the insolvency of the Bank. What then becomes of the gentleman's terrible forebodings, and of his pathetic arguments based upon them? They are "gone like the baseless fabric of a vision."

The gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Rariden,) in his able argument in favor of the State Bank system, referred to the discrepancy in the valuation of property for taxation for State purposes and corporation purposes, in Indianapolis, Madison, and New Albany. Reference was made to the Governor's Message as proof of the existence of such discrepancy. As these statements have gone before the public, and may, if unexplained, leave the impression that there is something wrong in the assessment of property in the cities referred to, I will in a few words explain how this difference happens so far as relates to Indianapolis. It will be recollected that the latest valuation of real estate for State purposes was made in 1846, at a time when property was comparatively low. The valuation for municipal purposes is made every year, and the one referred to by the gentleman from Wayne was made in 1850, four years subsequent to the time when the valuation was made for State purposes. Now it is very well known that property, all over the State, has appreciated rapidly since that general valuation, and more especially in particular localities, such as Indianapolis. In addition to this, the City has extended over much territory which in 1846 was only suburbs, and property, valued then by the field or by the acre, has since been divided into small lots, and is now valued as such for corporation purposes. This will perhaps sufficiently explain the discrepancy to which the gentleman from Wayne referred, predicated upon the Governor's Message. It might be added, that as the charter forbids the levy of a higher rate of taxation than fifteen cents on the hundred dollars, the corporation assessor may suppose it proper to assume a high scale of valuation. I am satisfied that the valuation of real estate for State purposes in Indianapolis was fully up to the average, and I think above the average, of property throughout the State.

In relation to the valuation of corporation stock, I would remark, that the stock held by citizens of Indianapolis in the Madison and Indianapolis Rail Road Company is not taxed any where as corporation stock, but is given in at the office at Madison and taxed as personal property. And the stock held by our citizens in the Branch Bank is given in by the Bank and the tax is paid there and deducted out of the dividends. This will explain, what seems not to be understood, why the return of corporation stock is not larger than it is reported to be.

While upon the subject of taxation, permit me, Mr. President, to explain the facts in regard to the taxation of stock owned by individuals in the Branches of the State Bank. I deem it proper to do this because the facts seem not to be understood, or, if understood, perverted. By the 15th section of the Bank Charter, as has been stated before, 12½ cents on each share of individual stock is deducted from the dividends for school purposes. That is equal to 25 cents on the hundred dollars. In addition to that, the stock is taxed precisely as other property is in the respective counties in which the Branches are located, provided that the whole tax shall not exceed one per cent. Several movements have been made with a view to have Bank stock taxed as other property is taxed. Of course the stockholders would not object to such a provision, inasmuch as their stock is now taxed, in most cases, higher than other property. The amount realized per annum for school purposes from the tax of 12½ cents per share is a little short of $3,000, and the amount derived for State revenue is a little over $5,000—making together about $8,000 per annum. The stock held by individuals is something over $1,000,000. If this amount were taxed as high as the laws permit, (to-wit, one per cent.,) the amount received would be $10,000. The reason so much is not realized is that the amount charged upon other property, added to the school tax, will not produce it.

Mr. President, there are several other matters to which I intended to refer—some of them perhaps more important than those to which I have called the attention of the Convention—but I feel that I have occupied as much time as propriety would dictate, and I will therefore bring my desultory remarks to a close.

Mr. President, I have made no attack upon the free banking system nor upon those who advocate it. I have said before, and now repeat, that I do not advocate the present system of banking to the exclusion of all others. I am perfectly willing to leave the matter in the hands of the people to adopt whatever system or systems of banking they shall deem most conducive to their prosperity. I have examined with some care the New York Banking system, but I choose to leave the discussion of its merits and demerits to others. My object has been principally to place in a true light some facts connected with the State Bank, and to correct some misapprehensions and misrepresentations in regard to it.

I have only to say in conclusion, that I shall vote hereafter against any proposition which precludes the continuance of our present banking system with suitable modifications, until it be fully settled that it shall not exist in any shape; but that, at the same time, I do not desire to prohibit in the Constitution all other systems of banking, being entirely willing to leave the determination of that question to the sound discretion and honest judgment of the people.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Ripley,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. This discussion, Mr. President, has progressed for a very long time. I have been a very attentive hearer to all that has been said, and I have said nothing myself, in the hope that the discussion would soon be brought to a close.

If I recollect right it is now eight days to-day since this discussion was opened. That is a long time to continue a discussion on any one subject connected with the amendment of the Constitution. For my part however I can see no probability of this discussion being brought to a conclusion unless some gentleman comes up and takes the ground that time enough has already been expended upon this question. Until yesterday it was not my intention to make a single remark upon this subject. The people whom I represent are united to a man upon this question. On this subject no diversity of opinion was expressed by any man in the county. Then, sir, understanding the feelings of the people of my county, I was prepared at any time to vote upon this question.

Mr. President, I cannot shut my eyes and my ears to what I hear and see going on around me. I know that there is a strong disposition manifested in the countenances of gentlemen all around me—and not in their countenances alone, but gentlemen have come to me and expressed a strong solicitude that the Convention should be brought to a vote.

Mr. President, wishing to accommodate myself to the feelings and wishes of gentlemen much rather than on this occasion to inflict a speech upon the Convention upon a threadbare and worn out subject, I cheerfully yield the floor that gentlemen may make any disposition of this question which they may think proper.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that all the speaking that can be done in this Convention at this time will not change the mind of any gentleman on this floor; and, sir, for one, I had prepared to "set myself right" before my constituents upon this question. But I yield all desire of speaking to the importance of voting; and I do solicit from the hands of other gentlemen a like sacrifice of their feelings on this occasion. Because it is evident, Mr. President, that if we do not cease speaking, and turn our thoughts to action, the time when we will get away from here is yet to be judged of by futurity. Then, sir, for the purpose of bringing this Convention to a direct vote at once, that we may see what the will of the Convention is, I will move to lay the section and pending amendment upon the table. ["Consent" from several voices.]

Mr. BORDEN. I demand the yeas and nays on the resolution of the gentleman from Dubois.

A division of the question was called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be on laying the amendment to the section on the table.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move a call of the Convention.

The motion for a call of the Convention was agreed to, and the roll being called,

Mr. BORDEN moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I think it is highly important that every delegate who is in town should be present. I move that the absentees be sent for.

The question being taken on the motion to send for the absentees, it was decided in the affirmative.

After some time spent in waiting for the absentees,

Mr. BASCOM inquired whether it would be in order to move to re-consider the vote by which the absentees were ordered to be sent for.

The PRESIDENT answered in the affirmative.

Mr. BASCOM. Then I move that the vote ordering the absentees to be sent for be re-considered.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Wells voted in the majority?

Mr. BASCOM. I believe I did.

The PRESIDENT. But the gentleman must be certain about it, otherwise he is not entitled to move a re-consideration of the vote.

Mr. BASCOM. Well I am pretty certain I did.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-consider the vote ordering the absentees to be sent for, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. SHOUP. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. DOBSON. I hope that will not be done. The other side have got all their folks in, and we now want ours in.

The question being taken on the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call, it was not agreed to.

After some further waiting for the absentees,

Mr. SHERROD moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on laying on the table, the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Clark (Mr. Read) to the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen).

Mr. WOLFE. I would inquire, Mr. President, whether we can according to the nature of things, make a good solvent bank out of our indebtedness?

The PRESIDENT. That is not the question before the Convention. If the gentleman will direct any inquiry in regard to the order of business, the Chair will be happy to afford him any information in his power.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered on laying the amendment to the amendment on the table, they were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Murray, Naye, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tanehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President.—103.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the motion to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) on the table.

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—91.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon laying the section upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and there were—yeas 76, nays 62—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—76.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hogin, Howe, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—62.

So the section was laid upon the table.

Mr. COLFAX. I now move to amend the article under consideration by adding the following:

“The Legislature shall not have power to grant special charters for banking purposes, but may pass a general law making the business of banking free to all, based on the principles of ample stock security for circulation, registry of notes by some State officer, preference in payment to bill holders in case of failure, and individual responsibility to stockholders to an amount equal to their stock. Provided, however, that at the expiration of the charter of the present State Bank, the Legislature may, in addition to such general system, grant a charter for a bank and branches; but the State shall not be a partner directly or indirectly, in any such banking institution, and if the trust funds, or any portion of them, should be invested therein as a loan, their safety shall be guaranteed by the State. Stockholders in any such bank, shall be individually responsible to the same extent as those acting under the general law.”

I desire simply to explain the reasons which have induced me to offer this amendment. It must be evident to every gentleman in this Convention, that there must be some compromise on this question. The great objection to the present system, is that it excludes all other banks—that it positively prohibits the Legislature from authorizing any other system, no matter how much it may be demanded or desired by the people, or how far superior it may be in its excellencies or benefits. Besides this, it is evident—it is indeed conceded that in the progress of our State, it has grown so rapidly and business has increased so largely, and the facilities for the transaction of business have increased to such an extent, that no one bank can or should furnish all the banking facilities necessary for our continued prosperity. I think these have been the reasons why we have had so much discussion on the subject of free banks in the State, and why they are desired so generally as they are, at nearly every business point within its limits.

The votes that have been cast here on previous days, as well as on this day, clearly indicate that there must be some compromise. They indicate also, that if we incorporate in the Constitution one system to the exclusion of another, we will array against it the same determined and bitter opposition among the people, which we have seen manifested on both sides of this Hall. Each party will see that by that Constitution, they can have no hope that the Legislature will adopt or establish the other system. I know that some friends of free banks contend that we must have an exclusive general bank system. They say that if we do not have this, the State Bank, being a larger institution, will crush the smaller ones. Now, that assertion is fallacious, for two reasons. The charter of the present State Bank will expire in 1857; and if such course of conduct was attempted—a course always deemed dishonorable amongst banks—to cripple or prostrate each other, it would be a powerful and controlling argument against her re-charter. In the second place, by that time the free banks, which will have been established in the different towns of the State, would be numerous enough to form a defensive alliance and compact among themselves, and they may thus become equally as strong as the State Bank.

There is one point in which the section I have offered differs from other propositions, namely, that the safety of the trust funds shall be guarantied by the State. If adopted, it would show the Legislature that in chartering that bank, it must reserve to itself sufficient control over the institution, to guarantee that these funds shall be kept sacred, and secured irrevocably in case that by mismanagement the bank should fail.

It also embraces another principle which is that the stockholders of this State Bank shall have the same individual responsibilities resting upon them as are placed upon the stockholders of the free banks.

Mr. President, in addition to this, it lays down in brief and condensed language, those general principles of both systems, which have been the most commended and approved in this body. It says that the Legislature may adopt either system, as the people—our constituents and theirs—may direct; but that whichever they may adopt, it shall be made safe by the restrictions that are thrown around it, that in the free bank system, there shall be a registry of notes; that in case of insolvency, the bill holders shall have preference in payment; that there shall be ample security for the redemption of the bills, and that the stockholder shall be responsible to an amount equal to his stock. And that the State Bank system shall be guarded and controlled as I have explained.

It seems to me that this is a fair compromise, and it was advocated by me before the people who elected me to this place, as I do here now. To them—both in a circular address and in speeches at public meetings—I declared myself, openly and unequivocally a Free Bank man. But at the same, I declared to them that, in my opinion, the greatest objection to the State Bank was the monopoly of Banking that that system enjoyed to the exclusion of all others. And while I pledged myself, as I now here repeat, that I should oppose a continuance of that exclusive monopoly—I declared that I should also oppose the adoption of a monopoly in the Constitution, in favor of the system that I preferred to the exclusion of all others. The error of the old Constitution should not be followed in the new. But the new Constitution should expressly authorize the General Banking principle—and it is in order to secure that recognition—and because I feel that the matter must ultimately be settled by compromise of conflicting opinions—that I offer this proposition to the Convention.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I propose the following amendment to the section proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph:

"The banks chartered under the provisions of this article shall be mutually liable for the redemption of the circulation of each other, to the amount and in the manner to be prescribed by law; and no bank hereby contemplated or allowed to exist in this state, shall ever be allowed to issue for circulation, any note or bill of a less denomination than ten dollars, or circulate or pay out at its counter or at any other place, as payment on bank account, any note or bill of a less denomination than ten dollars."

My object in offering this amendment, is in view of the probability that we will have a system of free banking, or in other words "free plunder," all over the State of Indiana. In view of this, I propose that they should be made individually liable for the issues of each other. It has been admitted on all hands, by gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, that the safety and solvency of the State Bank depended more upon their being mutually bound for the issues of each other, than upon any other cause. This being the case, gentlemen can readily see the necessity of the mutual liability system. All of them will be interested in keeping the circulation good.

Another idea which I have inserted here, and which is for the good of the people generally, and especially for the laboring poor of the State, is that no bank shall be permitted to issue notes or bills of a less denomination than ten dollars. The old banks were, for a time, confined in their issues to bills of not less than five dollars; but they soon found means to evade that provision, and to issue one dollar bills. But I want to have it declared in the Constitution, that these banks shall not issue bills of a less amount than ten dollars; and by adopting a provision of this kind, we will get rid of a great deal of spurious paper. If the banks do not naturalize the small bills of other States, we shall get rid of them. We shall then have that kind of currency which is not liable to be adulterated, and which is not so easy to be counterfeited.

These are the objects which I have in view by offering the amendment. They are easily comprehended, and as I believe they are good, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move to lay the section and amendment on the table.

Mr. COLFAX asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH called for a division of the question.

The yeas and nays being first taken on the amendment, they resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Blythe, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Gibson, Gregg, Hamilton, Helm, Helmer, Hoggins, Howe, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morgan, Murray, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wolfe, and Zenor—51.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Clements, Coats, Cole, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbort, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Nave, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—76.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on laying the section offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. The Convention has refused to lay my amendment upon the table. Now I would like to inquire of the Chair, what will become of my amendment, if the Convention should lay the section offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. It would be in exactly the same position as the lever of Archimedes, when he said that if he had a fulcrum to rest it upon, he could raise the world. [Laughter.] But there being no fulcrum on which to rest the lever, the world could not be raised; and if the Convention should vote down the additional section, the amendment of course will go with it.

The yeas and nays being taken on the motion to lay the additional section on the table, they resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clements, Coats, Cole, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Helm, Hendricks, Hoggins, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kinley, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—90.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Barbour, Beach, Berry, Blythe, Bracken, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbort, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Sims, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, and Work—47.

So the section and amendment were laid upon the table.

Mr. WATTS. I offer the following, as an additional section to the article:

"There may be established or incorporated in this State, a State Bank and Branches, in any or each county in said State, when a specie capital is furnished for said branches, as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. RARIDEN, having obtained the floor, was proceeding to address the Convention, when

Mr. KELSO, amidst much uproar, said that the gentleman from Wayne was speaking, as it were, both against wind and weather. That it was impossible, either for him to speak or the Convention to hear, amid so much noise; that gentlemen would probably be much more willing to listen in the morning, and that with the consent of the gentleman from Wayne, and on the understanding that he should have the floor in the morning, he would move that the Convention adjourn.

A division being called for on the motion to adjourn, there were for the motion, ayes 52, against it, 49.

So the Convention adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. KELSO,

On the question of Currency and Banking; delivered in the Convention, January 4th.

Mr. KELSO. Mr. President: It is true, I may be entirely mistaken about this matter, but if I am not, then two-thirds of the argument of the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) is right, and an equal amount of the conclusions which he has deduced therefrom are wrong. But, sir, I am under great obligation to the gentleman for the very candid manner in which he has stated to the Convention his plan of a substitute for the State Banks.

He, sir, is the first and only man who, thus far, has occupied the floor in favor of free banking, and opposed to a State Bank, that has attempted to advise us in extenso, the kind of system they would supply the place of a State Bank with, if the same be stricken out of existence.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Clark) it is true, on Saturday last spoke of the causes which induces their preference for this sort of system; but, sir, in even that particular, the two gentlemen widely disagree.

It has been truly remarked, sir, by gentlemen who have preceded me, that we have in this Convention, three parties on the subject of banking, viz: a State Bank party, a free bank party, and a party opposed to all banks. Well, sir, it is pretty clear we cannot all be in the right; hence, some of us must be wrong, and the paramount object with each and all of us should be to diligently inquire, and learn if we can, wherein consists the error, and who is in the wrong.

Sir, as the advocate of a system of State Banking, I do not appear upon this floor as the champion of the present State Bank, nor shall I attempt to defend either the details of her charter nor the conduct of her managers under that charter. That there are defects in that charter I am free to admit, and that in some of the branches there has been bad management on the part of the bankers I am as free to admit.

But, sir, the fault is in the present bank charter, and not in the Constitution under which that Bank charter was framed.

If it ever should be the policy of the people of Indiana to re-charter the present State Bank, or, by charter, create a new State Bank, the errors in the charter of the present bank should, and doubtless would, be corrected by the power creating the new charter. And I am decidedly in favor of placing in the Constitution such safe guards and restrictions as may be deemed necessary to force the banks to a faithful and honest discharge of their legitimate functions and duties.

But, sir, before I proceed further in the argument of this cause, allow me here to define my true position, so there shall hereafter be no mistake in the matter. I am, sir, for myself, in opinion and judgment, against all banks and banking institutions.

But, sir, the people who I, in part, represent are friendly to a well regulated system of State Banking, or at least a great majority of them, are partial to such a system. It, therefore, becomes my duty as a faithful representative, to contend for the reservation of such a power in this Constitution. And let me say I am opposed to any and every thing like free banking, and in this particular a majority of my people and myself most cordially agree.

The section before us proposes the broadest possible scheme of free banking, nothing more and nothing less, without even permitting the creation of a State Bank with branches, under any circumstances. Several gentlemen have spoken, some of whom have called the thing by its right name, free banking, whilst other gentlemen, most probably pledged to the people at home, to oppose free banks, are attempting to escape responsibility by a mere change of name, and they very gravely call it general banking, a very high sounding military title, to be sure, but not sufficient, sir, to satisfy the people, nor save the public servant from a strict accountability at home.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Clark) tells us, very truthfully too, that one of the main objects in banking is to furnish a greater supply of circulating medium for commercial purposes. But the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) tells us on the other hand, that so far as free banking is concerned, they have no such object in view; this, sir, is a wide difference of opinion between friends of the same measure, and, too, upon a point of no ordinary magnitude.

But, sir, if the object of banking in Indiana is not for the purpose of increasing the quantity of circulating medium, why, I ask, have any banks? They are unquestionably unnecessary. I maintain, sir, that the increase of circulating medium is the only legitimate excuse for banking, and certainly, in that case, a State Bank system has the preference, because they do increase the quantity of what they are pleased to call money; they do increase the quantity of circulating medium in the shape of bank paper, promising to pay money, and it is used in the place of money; and in that, sir, consists one of the strongest arguments in favor of banks, and at the same time it is among its most objectionable features, viz.: the power to increase and decrease the quantity of circulating medium at pleasure.

But the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) tells us the bills of the free banks will contain all the elementary principles of bills of exchange, and will, in practice, have the same operation and effect upon the commercial community to a greater extent than in any other way. This, sir, may be all true, and if so, it furnishes an irresistible argument against the establishment of the system, for there certainly can be no necessity for the establishment of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty banks, to do what every trading company, every manufacturing company, every commercial house, and every individual in the community has a right to do, and a right that will always be continued. And further, the State Banks have all the necessary powers in regard to bills of exchange, and that is one of the powers which I have no doubt the bank has abused to a greater extent than any other. I fear, sir, the gentleman's fine system of free banking will be found to be very much like the beautiful monument he has described, built upon the water. The same gentleman states that he is opposed to the use of real estate securities.

I am greatly obliged by that gentleman's frank admissions as to the plan of free banking, and we are not now entirely left to mere speculation. Let us then, sir, for a moment examine this (to us) new system of banking. It is at least worthy of a little time and attention.

The plan, as I understand it, is this, or about this: a general law is to be passed by the Legislature, authorizing any and all who choose to go to banking, not, however, without restrictions, and one of their strongholds is the security they offer to the bill-holder; and what is that, sir? It is a deposit of State bonds of this State or of some other State, or bonds of the United States. The word State bonds, however, having long since become odious, they sugar-coat the pill by calling them State stocks, and governments stocks. Well, sir, this very uncertain and fluctuating kind of security is to be deposited with some officer of State, and upon that, issues dollar for dollar of paper money, countersigned by the officer of State who issues it, and put in circulation by the banker, as money. From what source, I now ask, are these stocks to be gathered, and how are we to procure them?

I ask the question in all sincerity, is it to be proposed to enter into a mammoth scheme of free banking upon the evidence of our own indebtedness? are we to be told that the State bonds we now owe, are to become the foundation of a general system of free banking? Sir, it is bound to result in that very proposition. Well, sir, I have heard tell of men living upon the interest of the money they owed, but this is the first intimation I have ever had that they could not only live, but that they could become bankers upon the notes, bonds, and due-bills which other men held against them.

But, sir, such a proposition is in itself so ridiculously absurd, that I will not pursue it further.

I will now turn my attention to the more plausible scheme of the State furnishing a sufficient supply of stock for the occasion.

Should the State ever think of such an extravagant proposition, let us see to what it must inevitably lead. I have taken some pains to examine the question, and for the purpose of illustration, I have put down a list of a portion of the principal commercial towns and villages in Indiana, with the amount they would very probably invest in the business of banking under a general provision for free banking, as proposed by the section before us. They are as follows:

Mt. Vernon, $500,000; Evansville, $1,000,000; Leavenworth, $500,000; New Albany, $500,000; Madison, $1,000,000; Lawrenceburg, $500,000; Brookville, 200,000; Richmond, $300,000; Fort Wayne, $500,000; Vincennes, $300,000; Terre Haute, $500,000; Covington, $300,000; Lafayette, $500,000; Michigan City, $300,000; Logansport, $300,000; Indianapolis, $1,000,000; Columbus, $100,000; Greensburg, $50,000; Shelbyville, $50,000; Rushville, $50,000; Knightstown, $50,000; Bedford, $50,000; and Bloomington, $50,000.

There, sir, is a list of twenty-three towns in this State, that would readily invest in banking, under such a provision, the aggregate sum of $7,700,000; to this I may safely add thirty others, viz.: Rockport, Troy, Cannelton, Rome, Jeffersonville, Charlestown, Lexington, Vevay, Rising Sun, Cambridge City, Versailles, Vernon, Salem, Greenfield, Paoli, Washington, New Harmony, Princeton, Corydon, Brownstown, Greencastle, Crawfordsville, Clinton, Eugene, Perryville, Williamsport, Laporte, South Bend, Pendleton, and Muncietown. Each of these points, sir, will invest $20,000, on an average, in banking operations, making an addition of $1,300,000. Now, sir, I have doubtless, missed some quite important points that should have been added to the list.

A VOICE. You have missed Connersville.

Mr. KELSO. True, sir, I have missed Connersville, which is quite an important point, and would, no doubt, want, and have, a bank; and I doubt not I have missed several others equally important, but this, sir, goes to prove the correctness of my arrangement, and that I have not been extravagant. I think no one will say but that my allowances for bank capital at each point is within proper bounds, and is in no case too large. It places the banking capital of the State at $9,000,000.

SEVERAL VOICES. That is not too large.

Mr. KELSO. Then, sir, how are the citizens to obtain the nine millions of stock to deposit as collateral security? Suppose the State should issue her stocks to that amount; they must bear an interest of at least six per cent., for that is the banker's hope of gain; and if he be honest, his only hope is the interest he receives on his stock, and six per cent. on his money to be issued on the stock, making an interest of twelve per cent. for the banker. Now, how is the banker to obtain the State stocks? They must not be given to him—he must purchase them. If the purchase is to be made with cash, why not bank on the money, and never mind the State stocks. But, as it has to be dollar for dollar, that would not produce twelve per cent. interest beside exchanges.

Now, sir, suppose the State issues her stocks to the amount of nine millions of dollars, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum; the interest will be just five hundred and forty thousand dollars per year. The next, and by no means an unimportant inquiry, is, who pays the interest on these stocks? The State pays it. And where, pray tell me, does the State get the money to pay that interest with? From the pockets of the people—every man in Indiana, according to what he is worth, must contribute his share to help pay that five hundred and forty thousand dollars of interest annually. And who, I ask, reaps the profits to be derived upon such stock? The banker. The man with money banks upon it at the expense of the man without money; and this, it is said, is no monopoly—this, they say, is free to all. To all of whom is it free? To all who are already rich—to all who have means to get possession of the State stock, upon which the poor laboring man pays the interest—upon that stock he draws from the poor man six per cent. He then loans money upon that same stock, dollar for dollar, upon which he draws another six per cent., making a profit of twelve per cent. upon his money; one-half, at least, of which is paid by the poor and laboring men of the country, for which they never do receive back one single farthing.

Sir, I have made a calculation of the necessary amount the people will have to pay under this arrangement. I have carried it down twenty-five years; paying the interest annually and four per cent. of the principal, the amounts are very heavy. The amount to be paid the first year, of principal and interest, is nine hundred thousand dollars; almost a million of dollars. The second year, eight hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars. The third year, eight hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars. The fourth year, seven hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars. And the fifth year, seven hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars; and so on gradually decreasing by deducting four per cent. of the principal annually. Name, sir, on that debt of nine million of dollars, the people of Indiana will pay in twenty-five years the sum of eight million six hundred and eighty-three thousand eight hundred and seventeen dollars, for interest alone; and they will have paid during the same period, of principal, the sum of five million seven hundred and twenty-six thousand two hundred and ten dollars.

The yearly average of interest for twenty-five years, is three hundred and forty-seven thousand three hundred and fifty-two dollars each year. The average amount of principal is two hundred and twenty-nine thousand and forty-eight dollars each year.

The whole amount of principal and interest paid the first twenty-five years, will be fourteen million four hundred and ten thousand and twenty-seven dollars. The average amount to be paid of principal and interest, for the first twenty-five years, is five hundred and seventy-six thousand four hundred and one dollars each year; and at the end of twenty-five years, the State will still be in debt three million two hundred and seventy-three thousand seven hundred and ninety dollars, upon which they are still paying interest. The debt would not be paid at the end of thirty-five years.

I ask, sir, are the people of Indiana prepared for such a course as this? We are already sufficiently in debt, and have we not had a hard scald of State indebtedness from eighteen hundred and thirty-six up to the present time? An oppression from which we are by no means yet relieved.

Again, sir: Suppose we adopt this system and a free bank is established. Upon fifty thousand dollars of these stocks deposited as security, fifty thousand dollars of the paper of that bank is put in circulation among the people; eventually some other bank or some rich broker makes a run upon the bank for specie, the bank has not the specie on hand, it is not contended the bank shall give dollar for dollar stock security and keep on hand dollar for dollar in specie.

Well, sir, the run is made and the specie fails. Who is to be the loser? Not the rich, for they are not only able to wait but able also to contend for their rights. But, sir, the poor laboring man, with five, ten, or even twenty dollars in his pocket, the earnings of a hard week's labor, upon which himself and a helpless family are dependent for their daily support; he, sir, is the man who is bound to be the loser. He, sir, cannot afford to travel from the extreme parts of the State to the seat of government, where those delectable securities are deposited. And, sir, suppose he should, what must be his fortune? Why, sir, when he presents his twenty dollar bill to the Auditor, or the State Treasurer if you please, that officer will present him in return with a thousand dollar State bond; neither of them can make the change. What is he then to do? Why, sir, quietly sit down and patiently wait until the bonds can be sent to New York, or to London, and sold and the money brought back to Indiana to redeem the bill.

This, sir, the poor laboring man, with a family to support, cannot do. What then, sir, must be his inevitable fate? Sir, he must appeal to the heartless money shaver, and receive at his hands whatsoever he may please to give him; and that will be little enough, in all conscience. The shaver can wait, and will eventually get his money, making about fifty per cent. off the hard earnings of the poor man. And this is all accomplished by means of this splendid system of free banking.

Gentlemen talk about converting these State bonds into money, as if it was something that could be done in a day. Sir, that cannot be done. And let it be remembered that the refusal of a bank to redeem her issues in specie, is looked upon as the breaking up of the bank. This invariably produces, to some extent, a panic; then, of all others, is the time when State stocks will depreciate in value, and they will always have to be forced into market at the very time when they are certain to bring the lowest prices. Sir, I cannot but regard the whole affair as an unsafe experiment, and one that we should keep clear of, as we now are entirely clear of any connection with it or anything like it.

It was truly remarked by the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) that the system thus secured by State stocks must, and would, be safe, for so long as seed-time and harvest lasted, people could and would make enough to pay the interest on the stocks, and keep them up at par value.

That, sir, is the very thing I object to. I am opposed to the laboring class being taxed to furnish capital for the speculator to bank upon. Although the people of the State may enjoy an unparalleled degree of prosperity, and reap abundant harvests, and sell the same at high prices, yet all of that does not justify the conclusion that exorbitant sums of money shall be exacted from the people in the shape of taxation, merely for the purpose of enabling the rich to grow richer at the expense of the poor.

The gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) has plainly stated, at different times during his speech, that no matter how much money was issued and put in circulation, or how little, by banks thus constructed, it would not and could not affect the relative value of property in the community. Now, sir, I flatly deny the correctness of that position.

I care not how you organize banks, or any other monied institution, with power to expand or contract the currency, and every time a change is made to any very considerable extent, it must and will derange the relative value of both property and labor.

Suppose free banks were instituted, and they furnished to the people of Indiana a circulation of two million of dollars, and with that circulation the property of Indiana would be three million of dollars. Should the banks expand that circulation to four millions, would not that make the property in Indiana worth just double? Unquestionably it would. The property would remain just the same in quantity, while the money would be doubled in quantity; and as there would be double the amount of money to be applied to the purchase of the same property that was worth three millions of dollars, with a circulation of two million, the property must inevitably rise in value from fifty to one hundred per cent. And here, sir, is the great objection to banking. The banks throw out large amounts of money; they thereby enhance the value of every species of property; that begets an insatiable thirst for speculation; flattering prospects of high prices induce men to go in debt.

When prices are high, property in demand and money plenty, the rage for speculation reaches its zenith. At this point the banks contract their issues; times, as to money matters, become tight; the prices of property sink; bankruptcy and ruin follow in the train; the banks purchase property at half price; they immediately commence expanding the issues; prices go up; prospects brighten; money is plenty, and commerce is again in a flourishing condition. The banks are now ready to dispose of their property at double what it cost them; they sell on credit; take good security; and again, at the proper time, reduce the quantity of money, and with it reduce the value of property, and again become purchasers. This has been done, and it can and may be done again.

But we are told the free banks never do this. Now let us make a comparison between the State Bank of Indiana and those glorious free banks of New York, about which we have heard so much that is favorable.

In 1847 the entire issues of our State Bank was three million six hundred and six thousand four hundred and fifty-two dollars. In 1848 it was three million seven hundred and eight thousand and thirty-one dollars—being an increase of one hundred and one thousand five hundred and seventy dollars—less than half a million in twelve months.

In 1849 the issues amounted to three million three hundred and four thousand, two hundred and sixty dollars—being a decrease from 1848 of four hundred and three thousand seven hundred and seventy-one dollars—still less than half a million in another twelve months.

How is it in New York? Here we have quarterly reports. We can see the increase and decrease of circulation produced under their system for every three months, commencing with March, 1848.

Circulation, - - - - $23,047,826

June, 1848, circulation, - 20,718,826

A decrease of $2,329,000 in three months.

From June to September, 1848, the increase was $1,882,226 in three months.

In the next three months the increase was $604,778; in the next three months a decrease of $696,847; in the next three months a further decrease of $597,366; in the next three months there was an increase of $1,773,912; in the next three months there was a further increase of $497,452, and so on, showing that the increase or decrease of the circulation of the State Bank of Indiana was never as large in amount during any period of twelve months as was the increase or decrease of the circulation of the banks of New York, during any period of three months, from March, 1848, to December, 1849.

Which, I ask you now, has been the most unsteady and fluctuating in her currency, New York with her free banks, or Indiana with her State Bank and branches? No State has had a more fluctuating and unsteady circulation, as to quantity, than New York, for the last three years, with her boasted system of free banking.

We have repeatedly been told that there is no danger of banks organized upon this collateral stock security plan ever failing; and we are continually pointed to New York, with her free bank system, for proof and examples.

Let us, then, as requested, turn our attention to the history of the New York banks. Here it is, sir, in full; and from it we learn that the free bank fund consists of bonds, and mortgages, and stocks, deposited with the Comptroller, and moneys receivable on the same, and held by him for the redemption of the circulating notes, issued by banks and individual bankers under the general banking law. The whole number of bank associations is fifty-three; the whole number of individual bankers fifty-one, making one hundred and four free banks.

The stocks deposited as the security for the redemption of the bills of these banks are, seven million six and twenty-seven thousand ninety-two dollars, to which add, of New York State bonds, bearing interest from four and one-half to seven per cent., one hundred and fourteen thousand dollars; of United States stocks, bearing interest at five per cent., six hundred and forty-six thousand nine hundred and forty-six dollars; of Illinois six per cent. bonds, four hundred and twenty-four thousand dollars; of Arkansas six per cent. bonds, six thousand six hundred and fifty dollars; thirty-four thousand dollars of Alabama five per cent. bonds; and two hundred and twenty-two thousand six hundred and eight dollars of six and seven per cent. bonds of the State of Michigan; making nine millions seventy-five thousand two hundred and ninety-six dollars; in stock securities, such as they are, they have over and above this; of mortgages and the bonds of individuals, one million five hundred and fourteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-nine dollars. This is, to say the least of it, a small branch of the securities. But altogether it amounts to ten million six hundred and forty thousand one hundred and eighty-two dollars.

The amount of their circulation is stated at $9,993,762, almost $10,000,000; it only lacks $6,238 of that amount. They have of actual money, to redeem the $9,993,762, the amount of $49,906, or about twenty cents to the dollar, a fraction over.

In December, 1847, the securities were increased $568,973; and in December, 1843, they were decreased $1,020,044, leaving the securities a shade above $10,000,000, and the circulation a shade below $10,000,000, with a fraction over twenty cents to the dollar to redeem with in cash.

In case of refusal to redeem their issues in cash, the Comptroller has power, and it is in fact his duty, to close the bank and wind up her affairs. Thirty-one of these banks have been thus closed by that officer, with an aggregate circulation of $1,417,545; and the Comptroller redeemed $1,357,424, being $60,121 less than the amount they had out in circulation.

The Atlas Bank of Clymer, failed in Dec., 1847, and never did pay over ninety-seven cents to the dollar. On the failure of the St. Lawrence Bank, Illinois stocks sold for seventeen and a half cents on the dollar; Arkansas (one of the Western States) bonds brought twenty-seven and seven-eighths cents on the dollar; other bonds and mortgages sold for fifty-six and seven-eighths on the dollar. In other words, $81,277 of stock securities sold for $27,232, an average of thirty-three and one-half cents on the dollar. When the New York Banking Company failed, Illinois bonds sold for sixteen and three-fourths cents on the dollar; Michigan bonds brought seventeen cents on the dollar. Another bank failed at Buffalo, and her Illinois stocks sold for sixteen and seven-eighths cents on the dollar; and in another instance, the stocks of the State of New York herself sold for ninety-six cents on the dollar. This proves the correctness of what I had before stated, viz.: that these securities were always forced into the market under the most unfavorable circumstances; and here we see the beautiful practical workings of the free bank system. One great objection to the State Bank is, that it is said to be a monopoly. So is every bank in the world. Mere money in a man's pocket is a monopoly. You never can create any system that will not, in a greater or less degree, be a monopoly. That, sir, is, in the monetary affairs of all countries, an incurable evil.

But, sir, we are told, and with much apparent earnestness, that the conduct of our present bankers is insufferable, and that there must be competition allowed, to force the State Bank to discharge her duty to the people. Sir, if that be true, that, to cure one evil, we must create sixty, eighty, or an hundred more of the the very same kind of evils, then, sir, I am egregiously mistaken. I think the less we have of them the better.

We see, sir, by reference to the reports of the Comptroller of the State of New York, that they have experienced failure upon failure, to the number of thirty-one banks, the closing up of which had to be brought about by the interposition of that officer. From the same source we derive satisfactory evidence that a large amount of securities, not less than $1,470,000, sold in the stock market at an average of thirty-three and one-half cents on the dollar, being a sacrifice of two-thirds the amount of the securities.

Is such a history by any means flattering? Certainly not. I ask if anything which has yet been presented as testimony in favor of free banking is entitled to the weighty considerations claimed by the friends of that system? certainly think not.

All this clamor about equal rights is more humbug than reality. In the banking business there is no such thing as equality; it is useless, sir, to attempt to conceal the truth; there is, I repeat, no such thing as equality. None can be bankers but such as have means to bank upon; and no friend of free banking has yet hinted at a plan by which the means to bank upon are to be furnished to the poor man, who is now without it. None will be offered—none can be. Then, sir, where is your boasted equality gone, sir? To the four winds. Sir, the only freedom which there really is in it, is the extra freedom with which the rich may fleece the poor—the extra power which is given to the man with money already at command. He, sir, it is, who will reap all the benefits of such a system, and not the man with ordinary means—not the day laborer—not the common class in general. Disguise it as you will, it is decidedly clear that no advantage is to be derived by the mass of community from the introduction of free banking among us.

Many and serious objections are urged against our present State Bank, and some of them are weighty. But, sir, all these objections can, and should be, and I have no doubt will be remedied hereafter, should another ever be chartered.

I am one that believes that the men who are to come after us to legislate for the people of Indiana—to build a code of laws upon the foundation which we are now attempting to lay—will be as wise and sagacious—pure, patriotic and disinterested as we fancy ourselves to be; and that they will correct apparent evils in each and every department of State affairs, when and wherever it may be found to exist. I do not believe that this is the last body composed of honest, noble, high-minded, patriotic men that will ever assemble in Indiana. I, sir, have full confidence in the good sense of the people; I believe they possess sound and discriminating judgment, and will always look well to their own interest in every department.

I have already said I was individually opposed to all banks; and I give it as my opinion, that a majority of the people in my district are in favor of trying to get along without any bank, rather than have the country flooded with a spurious issue of free bank shipplasters.

And, sir, let me here remark, that the idea of doing without any bank is not so preposterous as many suppose. In the first place, there is vastly more money in the country, than is in active circulation. Secondly, large sums of money are loaned in other States, by our citizens, because their laws regulating interest, are more liberal than ours. Suppose we should allow the rate of interest to be placed at ten per cent. by contract, such a provision would recall within our limits, the capital now invested abroad, and call into active circulation that which is now, in many cases, lying idle.

Then, sir, I would introduce into general use, individual bills of exchange. They will be found to be amply sufficient, and much more safe than the bills or notes of any bank. They are not based upon the wind; they always have (when dealt in as they should be) a corresponding value, in something behind them, to satisfy the demand.

I find, sir, in the Democratic Review, an article on that subject, which explains the position I contend for much better than I can. I will, therefore, adopt it as a part of my argument, or I will borrow from it a few ideas. Almost the entire business of any commercial country may be said to be conducted through the operation of individual bills of exchange, each one of which represents a specific commodity, the delivery of which fulfils the obligation of the bill, and completes the transaction, without the use of money at all.

As thus: in the year 1846, the United States exported $109,583,246 worth of goods and produce to other countries. For this, no money was paid, but individual bills followed each shipment, requiring, on the face, payment of money. Instead of money being paid, however, the demands of the bill were satisfied by the delivery of goods, which, to the amount of $117,934,065, invoice valuation, were imported into this country during the same period, which canceled the bills of exchange. It is true that gold and silver was both imported and exported during that time, but the amount each way was within a trine of equal. But the main international business was transacted without money at all.

There was the amount of $227,517,309 worth of commodities interchanged by means of individual bills, each of which was created by the possession of a specific quantity of an article, and canceled by the delivery of some other article in exchange for it. This position is true to a much greater extent, in the internal trade of the country, because the magnitude of the exchanges of the products of industry, turning on individual bills of exchange, far exceeds that of the external trade.

Not only are all exports, as in 1846, amounting to $109,583,244, the basis of individual bills, but all the produce consumed on the Atlantic border, sent down from the interior, are also the basis of individual bills of exchange. For instance, in 1847, the raw produce delivered from the Erie Canal, amounted to $73,092,414, and from the Mississippi there was delivered at New Orleans, produce to the amount of $90,033,256, making, at these two points alone, $103,125,670, all of which was followed by internal bills of exchange, drawn from the shippers and payable in the cities where the produce was shipped to, and canceled by the purchase of goods, foreign and domestic, in those cities, to carry back into the country.

Money enters very little, if at all, into these heavy commercial transactions. The cotton planter upon the banks of the Mississippi, sends his cotton to his factor at New Orleans. The factor exchanges the cotton for supplies for the plantation. The goods sent up usually about balance the cotton sent down. The cotton is sold for a bill. Goods may be paid for by the same check or bill of exchange which is created by the sale of the cotton to the shipper, who, in sending it forward, draws against it a bill of exchange, which will probably be sold in New York, and the proceeds of the bill will be drawn against from New Orleans at sixty days. This bill may be sold, for the commercial credit is transferred from the cotton shipper to the factor. On its maturity in New York, it becomes a commercial credit, to be transferred to a letter of goods by his country debtor, who has purchased it in the way of trade, in the valley of the Mississippi, where it had been sent from New Orleans, in the course of purchasing supplies for the cotton plantation. This credit is again transferred to the importer of goods, by whom it is made over to the seller of foreign goods. He sends it home in discharge of his debts, where it is met by the cotton shipped from New Orleans, and there canceled. In all this matter, not a dollar of money or of bank paper is necessary. The individual bills perform the whole.

All western produce either does or may follow a similar process. And it is by no means extravagant to say that ten thousand millions of dollars worth of merchandise is bought and sold in a single year, exclusively through the medium of private bills of exchange, whilst the whole bank circulation of the Union does not exceed one hundred millions of dollars—showing the great disproportion between the quantity of paper money and private bills of exchange in actual use in the commercial world.

This proportion may be very correctly ascertained by reference to a return made by Mr. Loatham an English banker, who discovered by the stamps issued by the stamp office, that there was circulated in one year 528,493,842 pounds sterling of private bills of exchange, equal to two thousand five hundred millions of dollars. That there was standing out and in active use and circulation at one time 132,123,460 pounds sterling of private bills of exchange, while at the same time the whole amount of bank circulation was only 27,270,000 pounds sterling, or a proportion of only about twenty cents on the dollar.

The business currency of the country may be said to consist of three classes, viz.: private bills of exchange, gold and silver, and bank paper, and what is to a great extent a misfortune is that in all discussions upon currency we are externally directing our whole energies to what ought to be considered the least important class of our currency, viz.: the bank paper. So far as the legitimate transactions of business are concerned it cuts but one indifferent figure.

Nevertheless this branch of the currency is chargeable with nine-tenths of all the derangements that happen to the currency, for instance, all the fluctuations of commerce, most of the speculations that have preceded revulsions, and the disorders that have interrupted the regular course of industry, are attributable to the irregularities of the issues of paper money. The sudden and extensive increase and decrease in quantity, in fact almost all the financial evils that arise and grow out of this branch of the currency, and for the reason, that it represents mere credit, while every individual bill of exchange in circulation represents some specific commodity ordinarily of equal value with the amount of the bill, every movement of which commodity cancels a bill, and may—very often does at the same time give rise to a new one. This mode of commercial proceeding requires no chartered regulation, and carries with itself the safeguard against disaster. Gold and silver represents nothing, they are the thing itself sought after in exchange for all other commodities and therefore not susceptible of discredit.

On the other hand bank paper originates in nothing, they promise to pay gold and silver, but they are based upon no commodity, the delivery of which will consummate and cancel the obligation expressed on the face of the paper. The promisers have not the thing they promise, and their operations are based upon the hope that fulfilment of the obligation will not be required, and if required that some turn of fortune will enable them to meet it, this hope proves fallacious always at the moment of necessity. It is very clear to my mind that so far as it is necessary to use paper in the commercial transactions of the country, private bills of exchange have greatly the preference, they are equally convenient and vastly more safe. I might, Mr. President, carry this argument much further in defence of my position, viz. that all the commerce of the country can be carried on in an active and healthy condition without any bank whatever.

I here repeat, let us propose a fair interest for money, not over ten per cent., it will bring out large amounts into circulation which is now hoarded up, and with the proper use of private bills of exchange there will be an abundance of money in the country to answer all her commercial wants.

But, sir, if gentlemen are so anxious about free banks, I have this proposition to make to them, and I make it in good faith. If they will agree to submit the question of banking to the people of the State as an isolated and distinctly separate proposition to be voted on by the people, I will consent that if the people adopt the bank, then the Legislature may make for them any sort of bank they choose. But if they cannot trust the people to settle the question for themselves whether they will have free banks, or State banks, or no banks at all, then, sir, I confess I have no confidence in them and so long as I can raise my voice against the scheme, I shall continue to oppose it.

I now, sir, return my sincere thanks to the Convention for their kind indulgence, and shall hereafter mainly content myself with listening to the arguments of others, and with voting against free banks.

FRIDAY, JAN. 10, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. COOPER.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT announced that he had received a communication from the Auditor of State.

The communication was read.

Mr. FOSTER requested the privilege of recording his vote on one or two questions that had been taken the previous day. He stated that it was a very unusual thing for him to absent himself from the Convention; but that he was sick, and confined to his room. Under these circumstances he asked the privilege of recording his vote. [Cries of "consent," and "no, no."]

Objections being made, the gentleman from Monroe was not allowed to record his vote.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The subject of capital punishment having been made the special order of the day,

Mr. COOKERLY moved that the consideration of the special order be further postponed until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

COPY OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. CHAPMAN presented a report from the committee on accounts, in relation to compensation for making an extra copy of the journal of proceedings.

Mr. C. said he would like to offer a word of explanation. The law under which the Convention was held, required the President and Secretary of the Convention to make out a copy of the proceedings of the Convention, to be handed over to the Secretary of State. The Convention had thought it right that this should be done while the Convention was in session, but the committee on accounts had not thought it proper to audit an account for an officer who was not provided for by the Convention. It was thought that it was the duty of the Secretaries to do the work, but they had had so much to do, that they were wholly unable to make this additional copy in season; and the question was whether an assistant should be employed or whether the secretaries could and should do the work after the final adjournment of the Convention. This was a matter for the Convention to decide; and the committee had thought it proper to lay it before the Convention before they passed it.

Mr. SPANN. I believe that the Convention on a former occasion made an order that one of the Secretaries should assist the Secretary of State. I would ask whether this is the matter on which that order was made?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Jennings in reply to his inquiry that the Secretary of the Convention tendered the services of one of his Secretaries to the Secretary of State, and that they were not excepted.

Mr. BASCOM. If I understand this matter, it is for a duplicate copy of the journal to be filed with the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BASCOM. Certainly all that can reasonably be asked of the Secretary of the Convention is to make one copy. ["Consent."]

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that in the early part of the session the Convention passed a resolution requiring that there should be a copy of the journal kept for this purpose by the secretaries. The Secretary inquired of the Chair what he should do in the premises—whether it was understood that the copy should be prepared as the Convention progressed. The Chair was of opinion that it should be done while the Convention was in session, and directed the Secretary, if his force was not sufficient to do the work, to employ additional force.

Mr. BORDEN would inquire whether the business of the Convention having now decreased, the Secretary could not detail one of his clerks to do this duty. He was satisfied with the account so far.

Mr. GIBSON said it took two secretaries now to make the journal, and he was convinced that they could not get along with less clerks than they had.

Mr. DOBSON. The individual should be paid by somebody if he has rendered the services; but I think from this time forward there will be no necessity to employ any additional services for this business. So far as this account goes I suppose we are bound to pay it, and that there will be no question about it. I will state in addition that by the act, calling the Convention, this was required to be done; and if under that law an individual has been employed to do the work, I think we are bound to pay him.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the account be allowed, and that it be audited and paid.

The motion was agreed to by consent.

CREDENTIALS OF A MEMBER.

Mr. KELSO, from the committee on elections, reported that the committee had examined the credentials of the gentleman from Daviess county, (Mr. Clements,) and that he had been duly elected a member of the Convention.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

THE BANK QUESTION.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, the pending question being on the additional section offered by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts).

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I rise to a point of order. I understand the question is on an amendment, and I want to know what is the time allowed in the discussion.

The PRESIDENT. In this case it is thirty minutes.

Mr. SMITH. I understood it was only fifteen minutes on amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's understanding is at fault. For the satisfaction of the gentleman from Ripley I will read the rule on the subject.

[The PRESIDENT read the rule, as already published.]

Mr. RARIDEN. Mr. PRESIDENT: Having obtained the floor, it is my purpose to discuss, not so much the question of currency and banking, as the influences which act upon the direction of a State Bank, organized as ours is, and keep it in its proper sphere—the agencies which produce, conduct, and have much to do in directing it. I desire to say, in the general, that credit, or that confidence which man reposes in his fellow, and which is but another name for credit, is the result of civilization and moral culture, and any attempt at its destruction, is virtually an attempt to impede and destroy civilization itself, and to throw man back upon his individual resources for protection, and to fit him, by producing in him a feeling of insecurity, for rapine upon his fellows. Such insecurity moreover renders the perception of right and wrong less acute and throws us into a continued position of self-defense.

This thing of credit and confidence in pecuniary matters, is developed in its most simple form through banks; and gentlemen need not suppose that any clause in this Constitution, or any legislative restriction concerning banks can lessen or diminish the amount of gold and silver or bank paper. Trade will bring to the country money, it being the means of trade, and it will go where it can be most profitably employed, in spite of unwise restricting legislation; and convertible paper always will have just the value, in exchange, of gold and silver, and it cannot be prevented; and if we do not provide for ourselves a sound and convertible paper currency, our neighboring States will provide it for us, and that, too, to our cost. For gentlemen cannot but know that the present age is committed to the system of paper currency. Look at Kentucky, Ohio, and every State east of us, and with whom we trade. They are in for it, and we cannot, if we would, avoid it. But why should we, if we could? Do not our enterprise and industry want the same stimulants to bring them forth, that others do? Does not our labor deserve the same amount of reward? Most certainly. But the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) tells us that paper money, upon our present system, although convertible, is fatal to industry and the general prosperity of a country, because, he says, "that paper money, although convertible, is of less intrinsic value than the precious metals, and therefore, that increasing the currency by a medium of less intrinsic value than the precious metals disturbs the relation between the subjects of trade and money; and therefore does harm by provoking fluctuations in prices,"—because, he says, "the prices always depend upon the quantity of currency seeking investment." Now, sir, not one of these things are true, because, if the thing by which money is represented is to be estimated by the intrinsic value of the substance out of which it is made, then we could obviate the difficulty which he suggests, by substituting iron and steel, which is of more intrinsic value than gold or silver, and quite as easily procured as paper, and if he means that convertible paper money is of less value in exchange than gold or silver, he is mistaken; for it is of just the same value in exchange. Nor does the price of commodities depend, in any great measure, upon the quantity of money, except so far as competition will go. "The price depends upon the demand and supply." The price at home depends upon the market at the selling point, and competition brings the home price and the foreign price nearer to approximate, and diminishes the profits of the speculator. This is all the effect, sir; for you can readily perceive that if the multiplication of paper money increased proportionably to the price of commodities, the banks could very speedily enrich the producers:

but then when it rose to so great a price, where would they find purchasers and consumers? The truth is, sir, it is all error and sophistry, and the gentleman does not understand the subject he talks about. Two other gentlemen, (Mr. Pettit and Mr. Owen,) and other free bank gentlemen, object to our State Bank charter, on the ground that it is a monopoly granted to the Bank to coin, in the shape of paper, two or more dollars out of one—a privilege which, they say, is not common to all the citizens of the State; and they declare they will grant no power or privilege to any bank of any character that is not common to all the citizens of the State. Well, sir, this is very patriotic, and perhaps will take well with the people; but is it true that the right of the bank to issue two dollars in paper for every one in the precious metals in their vaults, is the grant of a monopoly to the banks, and that citizens have not that right in common with the bank? I would like the gentleman to show me some law restraining them or any other man from giving their notes for more than they have in their pockets, or vaults, or for more than they are able to pay. There is no such legal restraint—they can issue their notes in double, or ten times the amount they are able to pay or have on hand; but the difficulty is, no one will take them. Issued upon their bonds, they will not go; they may not be convertible; but if that indispensable element I first spoke of—confidence—is with them, their notes will pass and answer just the purposes of money. Here is the secret; and I say further that it is not the bank charter, or any monopoly secured by it, that gives credit to the issues of a bank; it is the confidence of the people in the men—in their means, and dispositions of honesty. That is it, sir. But enough of this. As my time is limited to thirty minutes, I must proceed to my purpose of contrasting the influences favorable to honesty, which surrounds the directory of a State bank, with those which must necessarily surround the directory of a free bank, or a private loaner, just as the gentlemen favor through a currency upon our State indebtedness.

Well, sir, the interest of the stock-holders in a State Bank, necessarily suggests to them to select for its managers, men of standing, property, and business habits; and men who are like the rest of the world, who have the good opinion of society, as well as money. Well, sir, it may so happen that a part of a directory may be men of just the reverse character; but in the general, you do not find usurers or Shylocks, blending their pecuniary interests with others. They can manage it better themselves. They hate the cowardly portion of mankind, who shrink from extortion and are troubled either with conscientious scruples, or fears of a loss of public favor. But it may so happen that some of such men may get upon a State board. Then, sir, such men are restrained by the other members of the board, and do not take its direction though they may influence it. But we have acting upon such a directory, public opinion,—their interest in reputation, and their sentiments of justice and humanity—if these fail, and avarice prevail over the influences which I have named, we still have another security—a State Board of salaried directors, whose wages do not depend upon the profit of the bank. They have a supervision over the branches, and can control their action, or wind them up, if refractory. Well, sir, this State board has a reputation to maintain, and they are directly responsible to the representatives of the people, and really have no temptation to do wrong themselves, or to permit others to do so.

Now the continued presence of this latter responsibility of the branch boards, and their liability to the rebuke and control of the State board, has so far maintained and, I believe, will continue to maintain, general integrity in their administration.

Again: all the gentlemen maintain that it is an outrage upon common rights, to allow bankers to double or treble their actual bankable means, although it may be convertible, whilst others cannot. Well, sir, I have explained why others cannot, I will now explain the equivalent which the banker gives the public for that confidence which enables him to do it—it is the stimulants which the increase of the circulating medium which they create gives to labor and production; and I freely confess that if the increased production and the increased prices and competition do not equal the interest which is paid for the increased amount of the circulating medium, the country gains nothing. But if, on the other hand, it exceeds it, they are both gainers.

Now, sir, I do not pretend to say what may have been the action of banks in particular cases. They may have acted securely, but I have endeavored to indicate the influences which have been around them, and which will most generally direct their action. But this, also, should be recollected, that whilst the banks are watched with jealousy, least they oppress or extort, they, on their part, have to watch and guard the interest of their patrons; and such directors and bank officers are not generally favorites with those whom they feel it necessary to watch. And if they watch with that vigilance which thwarts and defeats the stratagems of those who would circumvent and thrive at the expense of the bank, by circumvention, they are called Shylocks, rag-borrowers, and oppressors of the people and the people's friends; and the abused and denounced must necessarily remain silent, and to explain their conduct or give their reasons for it would do harm in society.

It may further be said for our State Bank, that they have maintained a sound and convertible currency. They have managed the trust funds of the State without cost to the fund or State; and they have made to the State more than one million of dollars of clear profits, and now maintain the perfect confidence of the world, so that their issues are as good as gold or silver at all points within the range of our trade. What more, I ask gentlemen, was expected. Why, some of the gentlemen, the gentleman from Marion especially, (Mr. Morrison,) says that it has been partial in its accommodations, and discounts upon the most stringent terms, unless to such as are favorites. This may be so. Punctuality is very much regarded by honest banks as well as honest men; and those who once deceive have some trouble in becoming favorites, and perhaps something more may afterwards be required of them than of those who never deceive. But would you expect every one to be accommodated by an institution whose whole capital was not one-third equal to the trade of the country? That would be unreasonable, and yet gentlemen treat their not doing it as a grievous charge; and had they done it, and a collapse followed, which would have been inevitable, the gentlemen would have held the bank and its friends responsible for all the injury brought upon the country by its expansion.

The truth is, it has at all times, when money was wanted, gone to the full length of its power. I have no unnatural regard for the State Bank. I know their means are too limited and their capital insufficient for the wants of trade; and that is what most of the charges of partiality in the selection of its customers have grown out of. This might be remedied by enlarging the individual stock in the branches, and if the State stock in them was diminished from one-half to about one-sixth, and the election of the president and cashier rested in the branches, I am very certain there would be less of politics in its administration than now is. Was my judgment consulted, I would increase the individual stock in the branches, at the business points, at least three-fold, or establish two branches at the same point, if the business required it; and for the State stock in the new branches to be established, I would take it from the old ones, and thus diminish the stock of the State to the point I have indicated. That feature of the charter which places all the private stock as a guarantee of the State stock, whilst the State has in reality the power of directing the action of the branches through the State board, is not very liberal, and has most certainly been a main cause of confining the branches to limited usefulness. If a new branch was to be established, it would be adding eighty thousand dollars to the liabilities of the private stock-holders of the other branches, besides the other risks incident to starting a new concern. Who, then, could blame men of capital for eschewing such risks to their capital, when there was no earthly hope of gain under any contingencies? I could not. Now I have enumerated some of the griefs that gentlemen have urged against the State Bank. Others of them complain that the banks take more than six per cent. for the use of their money, and that they do it by refusing to discount notes payable at their counter, and appropriate their means in the purchase of bills of exchange, payable at distant points, charging and taking off, at the same time, exchange upon those bills so purchased. This may be true for aught I know, and I confess that if the loan is made in that form, merely to get the exchange, and without the expectation of having such bill paid at the distant point, it is wrong and ought to be looked into. But if, on the other hand, it is done bona fide to meet the wants of the different seasons and kinds of trade, then it is just and right, and is the cheapest and best method of transferring money from one point to another. For instance, our exchange is carried on with the Eastern States through pork and flour, and with Europe in those articles and cotton—I mean mainly. The process is this: a trader desires to buy pork; he has no money, but is in good credit; he goes to the bank and proposes to draw a bill on Philadelphia, New York, or Boston, the point where he expects to sell his pork; the bank buys his bill at four or five months, always giving him time to close his operation, and pays him in money; he invests that in hogs, packs them and ships them to the point of sale, and when he sells there is his bill. This saves the trader the risk and expense of bringing his money home, and at the same time possesses the bank of a fund to draw on for the mercantile trade. The merchant in the neighborhood of the bank is now ready to start East to recruit his stock of goods; he has his money on hand, but does not choose the risk or trouble of its transportation, so he calls upon the bank and exchanges his money for the avails of this pork bill, and pays him the exchange, and all are accommodated. And so the process goes on through all seasons and subjects of trade; the bank furnishes the means and others take the risks and active agencies of trade.

The fluctuations of bank issues result partly from the growing and maturing seasons, and partly from the demand and supply of the subjects of trade, and not from design; and I should like gentlemen to inform me how it could be otherwise, was there not a paper dollar on earth.

Now, sir, I have passed through most of the objections that are urged by the free bank party against our present system of State Banks, and I have indicated what changes I should like to see engrafted upon the State Bank system. And here let me ask gentlemen who have manifested so much hostility to the State Banks on account of their partiality among customers, and their usurious action, if they expect by disintegrating the Bank capital and restoring to its owners their several portions, let me ask them if they suppose that that will diminish their power or dispositions to make the most of it? It will then become a transaction between two men—the lender and the borrower—and they are brought together by the most potent influences that can be brought to bear upon human conduct. The one is allured by avarice, and the other driven by necessity. The money lender with his scales ready to weigh the pound of flesh, and his hapless victim before him, pinioned for the operation, no generous spirit standing by to advise mercy, and no Daniel to sit in judgment between them to decide how much one may demand, and how much the other can yield. All is left to avarice. Not even the poor excuse of a directory to modify the extortion, or limit concessions. Is this that perfect state of society that gentlemen desire to bring about by disintegrating the capital of the State Bank, withdrawing it from the use of society, and restoring it to the absolute control of its owners, thus teaching the rich man to rely upon himself alone, and to make him feel that, although surrounded by wealth, he is insecure in its enjoyment, and to make him act upon the feeling that society has no sympathy for him, and that he will pay it back in its own coin? Sir, this is a state of barbarism, where no confidence exists, or sympathy is felt; and, I ask, is it for this solitary and unhalloved, unrestrained liberty of action that the world is longing?

Now, Mr. President, let me inquire for what reason the State Banks are to be put down, and for what benefit, and what interests are to be subserved by displacing them and re-placing them with what is called free banks, founded upon State bonds. I understand gentlemen to say they want no special incorporation; that they want the State to allow them, or for the State to issue for them a scrip equal to the amount of State bonds that they will produce, and that that should be the circulating medium put into their hands to be loaned out; and that they will promise to keep its credit good. They want no incorporation; but they desire to act just as men can act controlling large amounts of money; and they tell us that this keeps clear of that odious thing about a State Bank which is called a monopoly—the right to issue two or more to one; and that this kind of banking is accessible to every one, and has no exclusive privileges about it. Now, is this true? Is it reality, or is it mere humbug to get clear of the creeds they have professed all their lives, or, at least, ever since they turned patriots, and placed themselves alongside of the people to watch and guard their rights? Is it true that every one can go into this kind of banking; or, if they could, would it be safe to them or the country? From whence are to come the State bonds in sums of fifty and a hundred thousand dollars? Are they to be bought? If so, that much real money leaves the State, and the bonds take its place. But how, I ask, is the poor man, and the man in medium circumstances, to get them? Are they to be given or issued by the State gratis? Not so; they are to be got somehow; and I will tell how by and bye. And do not gentlemen know, whilst they declare that it is open to all, that the poor, and indeed all but the most wealthy, are as perfectly interdicted from everything concerning it, except its evils and frauds, as if they were excluded by a decree of Heaven? Where would the poor man get fifty thousand dollars in State bonds to begin upon? Nowhere; and it is doing injustice to popular intelligence to suppose they can be thus duped and hoodwinked by any such shallow and vicious pretences. But let me turn your eyes for a few minutes to the quarter from which and the gentlemen from whom comes this novel and startling proposition. Look along the lines of transportation from Madison to Indianapolis, and from the Ohio river to the north end of the State, along the Wabash and Erie Canal, and about its north extremity, on the borders of the Lake, whose trade is immediately with New York (though I must exclude many who represent the agricultural interest from this). It is mainly in those locations you find the advocates of this new and untried experiment. There are some, indeed, in other sections, who are smitten with the novelty of a scheme which promises so beautiful a harvest to those who have the credit to get State bonds, and to become bankers. But look along the line of those works, and there you will find the friends, advocates, and projectors of this scheme of aggrandizement. Let us look out for the real object in view; let us look behind and beneath the specious pretexts of the friends of this museum of curiosity, and see if any other interests than the interests of the State and the people may be suspected of prompting this great love of the people and equal rights that we hear so much of, and who feel so much hostility to monopolies, as though they could not be quiet in their graves if one remain upon earth. What is this Canal, and who are its owners and controllers, I ask? Why, sir, they are the same men, and they foreigners who reside in their own country, who hold the most of our bonds for the money which constructed it. They have the Canal and its use, and we pay to them five per cent. upon the bonds into the bargain, which is as it should be; and they now propose, for our good, that we shall just double the amount in small notes for them to loan out to the people at interest, so that they can get the five per cent. from the State, and also as large a per centage from the people as they can make by loaning to them or trading with them, and that they will keep the credit of the small notes good in the people's hands, or forfeit their bonds.

This is a fair statement of what is proposed as a substitute for the State Bank and Branches, with its convertible paper circulation. This is the system of banking which the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) tells us is founded upon so safe and pure a foundation that nothing short of a visitation from Heaven can defeat or discredit it, meaning thereby that it is intended to be rooted in the soil, and that its resources are to be nurtured by the toil of the farmer, and its profits gathered with his harvests. Well, sir, no doubt but this is the intention, but I desire to inquire for a few minutes whether this would be a profitable relation to establish between the farmer and banker, and whether the farmer, in that relation, would be able to maintain his independence, and a just reward for his toil. I think not. All the weapons, offensive and defensive, by this arrangement, would be in the hands of the banker. In the first place, he has the carrying of all products to market, and the fixing the price for it; for there is no competition with a railroad or canal to bring down or regulate prices. Whoever owns them, charges what he chooses. This is one weapon those bankers upon State bonds would have over the farmer in this arrangement.

In the second place, they are, moreover, to have the exclusive control of the currency, and if the theory of the gentleman from Cass is correct, that the prices at home depend upon the quantity of circulating medium at home, then these banks which control that circulating medium and fix the prices of commodities must necessarily select the persons to whom they will give the means of purchasing, and who will be the buyers of all commodities and the carriers of it to market. I say this on the ground that the bond-holders who are to be our bankers own the Wabash and Erie Canal, and by having the power over the price of transportation, can necessarily, by discriminating between produce purchased with their money and that purchased with other money, prevent investments in any other money than their own, and that too, at the prices they may fix. And through the same power, and with the view to self-preservation and security these republican money-kings must indicate and most probably own the warehouses to which this produce must be shipped, and control its consignees. Then, sir, although the banker's share of the crop of the farmer may not, to the superficial observer, be more than seven per cent for the use of his money yet when we remember that he also fixes the prices of products by limiting the amount of money to be invested, as the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) a free bank advocate, informed us, and by the power to prevent the influx of foreign capital through a discriminating price of transportation, and when we add to this the selection of purchasing agents and warehousing, and commissions, &c., I cannot but fear that the producer will have but a beggarly account of his share of the crop. And what influence, think you, those agents of our foreign bond-holders, who must themselves be aliens in everything but location, with the power thus to regulate our circulating medium, to buy our crops, to ship it to market, and sell it, must necessarily have over the politics of the country? If it be true that "money is power," as philosophy informs us they will designate your legislators, if they do not choose to do that business themselves; and the whole country and its institutions will be theirs; and thus and our people, now so happy and prosperous, who have, by the sweat of industry converted a wilderness into a paradise, are to become serfs and tillers of the ground for the profit of others, and are to yield their allegiance to the mere bondsmen and hirelings of our foreign bond-holders; and the fruits of their toil are to be swallowed up merely to double the interest to our creditors and to afford employ to their liege men and emissaries. The object of the prompters of this scheme may have been a lower aim than this, I admit; and with less princely game in view. Their whole object in this much ado about money and the public interest may only be to enhance the price of their bonds, and to make a demand for them with our own people. If that is all, I can forgive them; and it will settle down among the bulls and bears of the times. But if the scheme is to be consummated, and the iron driven to the marrow, then, in the last resort, I appeal to men of sympathy, especially my friends of abolition tendencies, who have heretofore kept their tears for the black race. I call upon them to look over this new field of human degradation—this not new theatre, but new play, with new plots and fancy scenery. Witness the husbandman, lately a king, every inch of him, with all the attributes of true sovereignty about him; see how changed, how fallen. But yesterday, he was as I have described him; but now a bondsman—the bondsman of the State, humbled in all his aims and aspirations, if he submits thus to be shorn of all his strength, and places the keeping of his interests in the hands that I have indicated. Divert, gentlemen, I entreat you, those tears from those accustomed objects of sympathy, and give us a drop for these new subjects of commiseration who are about to be bound hand and foot. We have heard too long about the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth not to dread a union between the western canal, our bond-holders, and the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad, which will take with it all the railroads in any way connected with it in interest, separated as they are now supposed to be, I am not sure that their power has not been felt in our legislation, through their patronage and princely revenues, and if we, in the Constitution, construct a platform upon which all these interests can unite and harmonize in banks to be founded on their bonds, or the bonds of the State which they own, and in this way give them the absolute power over the whole circulating medium of the country, and pay them legal interest into the bargain for employing the currency we create for them—they now having the whole carrying trade—if, I say, we do this, and the people submit to it, and yield up the power that we provide, to place it in the hands of our bond-holders, if we are not then serfs and slaves, it will not be our or the people's fault. The liberty we shall enjoy will be from the clemency of our masters, and will be really undeserved. But some of the free bankmen tell me I am mistaken; that it is not their purpose to base these free banks upon State bonds, but simply to use them as collateral security for their issues, and not as the basis of issue. This may be true, and the bonds may be only introduced to conceal the purpose of issuing five or six dollars of paper to every one of paper to redeem them. If so, it is designed to establish an old-fashioned bank of issues, without any of the wholesome checks and restraints suggested by modern experience, except the restraint of individual liability.

I have, as yet, seen no project drawn out in detail of one of these free banks; and can only discuss it from the outgivings in the speeches of gentlemen on this floor; and I must say, if they have given its lineaments truly, they cannot gain my favor. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) and the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) have, in their speeches, contented themselves with denunciations of every scheme of banking that the wit of man ever has yet devised, except the New York free banks, and these they neither commend nor condemn, because they say they do not understand their guards and machinery entirely. At the same time, they pour out all the stereotyped denunciations of the last eighteen years against banks, their privileges and monopolies, frauds and villanies, as if no one ever before hated them as they do. The latter gentleman, especially, taxes his ingenuity for coarse terms of vituperation, and closed by telling us what he will not do; and what kind of banks he will not support or countenance. Yet these gentlemen fail to tell us what kind of banks they will support. This is a very safe course for a politician who is content with a negative position; but I doubt if either of the gentlemen will be content to play so negative a part in politics hereafter.

Now, sir, I have passed through the subject in a very general way. I have said very little about commercial banks—nor shall I go into a delineation of their use or action. I esteem them as the inventions of prosperous commerce, as its helper and handmaid; and they had their credit in that confidence which exists among mercantile men; and that confidence and credit must be destroyed by virulent attacks upon banks through which, I repeat, that confidence and credit is organized in a very simple form. It will exist independent of the organization, and if you destroy this particular organization, it restores itself in another form, and performs its functions at the requisition of its parental head. And gentlemen talk about bills of exchange and their utility, and that all the little spawn of the free banks will be bills of exchange drawn upon the actual products of industry—a fund they tell us, that nothing but a visitation of heaven can dissipate. Paying this eulogy upon this form of credit, for it is nothing else, do gentlemen remember what gave bills of exchange their great credit? It is not the form of the instrument, or the pretty pictures upon it, or its name; nor is it any particular fund upon which it is drawn.

No, sir, none of these to any great extent. It is the commercial pride of the men engaged in it, their inveterate and habitual punctuality, and fulfilment of all their pecuniary engagements—that pride in the mercantile man which makes dishonorable and highly penal in a commercial point of view the least deviation from punctuality in pecuniary engagements. This commercial pride, sir, is the parent of credit in the shape of bills of exchange. Think you that those free banks will have it—those hired agents of our bond-holders—the buyers and the carriers of our produce to market? They may have it, and they may not.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I think the subject has been very fully discussed, and I want to see the Convention take some action upon it. I asked the gentleman (Mr. Rariden) when he commenced his remarks this morning to do me the favor to let me offer an amendment to the amendment, which was not accorded to me. I now offer the following amendment to the amendment:

The amendment was then read by the Secretary. It provides that the State shall not be a stockholder in any bank after the expiration of the charter of the present bank; nor shall the State lend its credit for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of any bank or moneyed incorporation whatever; and that the State Bank shall be closed at the expiration of its present charter.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I wish merely to remark that the proposition contained in the amendment to the amendment, can be supported by gentlemen who are in favor of free banking. There is no objection to support it on the part of gentlemen who desire to establish State Banks, other than such as the State shall be a stockholder in. Nor, sir, is there any objection to support it on the part of any gentlemen who are not in favor of continuing in existence, the present State Bank. The latter clause of this amendment was suggested to my mind by information which I recently received, that there is a proposition now before the Legislature to re-charter the State Bank for twenty years longer. I propose therefore, that latter provision in the proposition to meet this case. It is therefore, so far as it goes, a compromise measure. It does not interfere with the wishes or desires of gentlemen who may hereafter apply to the Legislature to give them such a bank as the majority of the people and their representatives should be in favor of. I am satisfied, notwithstanding all we have heard, and all that has been boasted, that the attempts of any one to sustain the State Bank and its branches, and to present it to the Convention or the people of the State, in any attitude other than that of a monstrous monopoly, have failed. I know—I am satisfied that this State is not willing to continue in existence, that monopoly. But I will not attempt to answer the arguments made by gentlemen in their endeavors to sustain the reputation, character, and soundness of that institution. I did not desire to make a speech, but merely to obtain an expression of opinion on the amendment I have offered.

Mr. HITT. I do not desire to make a speech, but I do desire to define my position. The comparative merits and demerits of each system of banking, have been ably discussed; and although I have listened with pleasure and delight to the able arguments of the gentleman on both sides, I must say that I think the subject more appropriately belongs to a legislative assembly than to a constitutional Convention. I do most sincerely think, sir, that we should place in the Constitution sufficient guards and restrictions, with the proper basis, and leave it for the people through their Legislature, to adopt what system of banking they may desire, subject to the constitutional restrictions we may think proper to impose. I think the friends of each system are willing to adopt the most stringent, restrictive, constitutional guards which appropriately and legitimately belong to the Constitution. We should not go farther. Why not stop here? Why not leave legislation where it properly belongs? Should we adopt any one system, as is proposed, and exclude all others, I predict it will do more to endanger the adoption of the Constitution, than anything we have done, or hereafter may do. Let us look back at the causes which operated mostly in calling this Convention. It has been a subject of remark all over the country, that if there was one subject more than another that influenced the people to call that Convention, it was this very question. It was said that the people's hands had been tied up for the last thirty-four years, restricted to one system of banking—that the people wished to be untrammelled in this matter, and hence the call of the Convention. Now, what is proposed here? Why, to impose the very same thing upon the public.

Some gentlemen wish their favorite systems adopted to the exclusion of all others. This, I think the people will not submit to, and for one I will vote to leave out of the Constitution, every subject of a legislative character. Pending the canvass last summer, I took this position; it met with a general acquiescence. I well recollect the admonitions and cautions I received at the hands of my constituents. I was cautioned not to put too much into the Constitution. The people were well satisfied with the old Constitution, under which they had lived and prospered. They thought it good yet in the main, and they wished but few amendments to be made in it. It was a very general circumstance for all of them to caution us against putting too much in the Constitution—that was all their fears. But Mr. President, if the Convention see proper to take a different course, and adopt any one particular system of banking in the Constitution—if I be forced to the alternative of voting for one system or the other, I shall certainly vote for a State Bank and branches. I dislike monopolies; but monopoly is a feature objectionable alike in all banking institutions. But I do like the mutual liability clause. It is a safe guard that I admire, and one not applicable to independent Banks.

I do hope the Convention will take the proper course and be contented with engrafting on the Constitution sufficient guards and restrictions, with a proper basis, and leave the people to choose their own system in their own way. I will here close with an old maxim, and it is a very good one, "that the best government is that which governs least," and I think very applicable when applied to this Constitution.

Mr. McFARLAND. It was my intention at the commencement of the discussion of this question, to have attempted to make an elaborate speech upon the subject.

I had prepared notes for that purpose, sir, but each member who has preceded me upon the subject has anticipated me in a portion of what I desired to say, and in most instances, perhaps, presented the subject better than I could have done it.

I shall only attempt then, upon the present occasion, to present some few arguments that have not been fully brought before the Convention, and, perhaps, endeavor to reply to some of the arguments of others.

I must say that the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) gave to the Convention in the early part of his remarks, a view of this question which very nearly accords with my own.

From the first portion of his speech I could see no escape from the conclusion that the issuing of paper money, whether predicated upon gold and silver in less quantities than the paper issued, or upon paper surities, dollar for dollar, must, by disturbing the relations of value, be essentially pernicious in its effects upon the varied interests of the people. From his premises he draws one conclusion, and I another.

He thinks we must have a paper circulation in comparatively small bills, issued by banks; while I believe that gold and silver, with bills of exchange, will answer the wants of our commercial people, and avoid the "disturbance in the relations of value" which he so justly depreciates.

The illustration used by the gentleman (Mr. B.) when he compared the stimulus of bank paper upon the trade and commerce, to that of ardent spirits on the individual struck me as being peculiarly forcible.

Different nations have been trying for centuries to use bank paper temperately; few, if any, have succeeded; and similar results with individuals in reference to intoxicating drinks, attest the correctness and force of the analogy between the two.

The visionary schemes of a people intoxicated by the stimulus of an excessive quantity of paper money, bear a striking resemblance to the fancied wealth of a drunken man, and the sober hour no more certainly brings the conviction of squalled beggary and want to the latter, than it brings wide spread distress and bankruptcy upon the former.

Under the influence of the stimulus of paper money, the American people have alternately been drunk and sober since the foundation of the government.

We were intoxicated, perhaps, to the highest possible extent in 1836, and our recovery for a time might have been thought doubtful, and the memorable campaign of 1840 which followed that national debauch, could only be excused upon the ground that we were laboring under the untold horrors of that species of delirium which follows the worst grades of drunkenness.

While reason and correct notions of political economy dictate, in my judgment, "total abstinence" from the stimulus of paper money, habit demands the continued use of banks of circulation, and it can hardly be considered doubtful what would be the result were the Convention to prohibit in the new Constitution the creation of any further banks in this State.

Believing, Mr. President, that we are destined to have banks in this State under the new Constitution, not from a real, but a fancied necessity for their existence, as a practical question, it remains only for us to inquire what kind we will adopt.

The friends of the State Bank insist that that institution should be continued, that it has made money for the State, that it has furnished a good circulation of uniform value.

In the brief space of time allowed to me under the rules, I shall endeavor to examine the claims of that institution as set forth by its friends.

Let us first consider the claim based upon the supposition that it has made money for the State. By reference to the Auditor's report (page 12) it will be seen that nearly two millions and a half of dollars in bonds have been "issued for the State Bank of Indiana," which the State must redeem at some future period. The statement of the officers of the bank shows that the State has but little over one million of stock in the institution. It will not be claimed that the bank has made enough to cover even this deficiency. But it is said that the loss of one million of bonds, for which nothing was realized, was an accident for which the bank is not accountable, although the bonds were sold by the President of the bank, and the whole affair managed by the officers of that institution.

The claim is that the bank has made a little over a million of a profits for the State, and the documents show the loss of over a million in bonds, issued and sold by the President of the bank, and one would naturally suppose the account about balanced; but not so, say gentlemen; this loss was an accident, and one that will not occur again.

It is true that these gentlemen will not admit that any losses can properly be supposed to have resulted from accident in free banks. It was no accident that the free banks of New York failed to redeem their paper, because the State of Indiana refused to pay the interest due upon her bonds that had been deposited with the Comptroller as security for their circulation.

From this reasoning it would appear that the President of the State Bank had every reason to believe that a New York Canal and Banking Company, the stock of which was fifty per cent, below par, was abundantly safe, while the State of Indiana, in 1838, when her bonds were at par, was not entitled to credit. I must confess, Mr. President, that I was mortified and pained to hear the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) exult over the failure of a few free banks in New York, when that record which he read proved equally clearly that the failure of which he complained was caused by the utter faithlessness of the State of his birth, and my adoption.

The utter fallacy of the reasoning of gentlemen on this subject must be apparent to every unbiassed mind—and the loss in capital stock alone will be admitted to be more than equal to all the profits realized to the treasury of the State from the profits of the bank.

If the losses resulting from the bank indirectly are taken into the account they amount to an enormous sum. It is admitted on all hands that this institution refused to pay specie for its paper for four years and a half since its creation.

It will not be denied that exchange on New York during that time was over an average of eight per cent.

The citizens of the State consumed during that period no doubt at least eight millions of dollars' worth of foreign and domestic goods per annum, upon which at least eight per cent. exchange was paid by the merchant first, and being added to the cost of the goods together with a profit of 25 per cent. would increase their price to the consumer at least ten per cent.

To the citizens of the State then, sir, this brought a loss of eight hundred thousand dollars a year, and over three millions and a half during the suspension of specie payments. But this, Mr. President, I suppose will be regarded as an accident too.

I assume, sir, that it was an accident that the bank did not fail entirely in 1842—that it is the merest accident in the world that it has not lost all the State ever put in it, or that it has ever paid anything to the State at all. Such accidents have seldom occurred in the management of State Banks any where else.

It is but justice, sir, to those who managed the State Bank to say that the results, disastrous as they have been to Indiana, are much less so than they have been in most of the other States where States Banks have been tried.

Having already shown, Mr. President, that the citizens of the State have lost about four times as much as the Bank has made for the State, let us inquire, sir, whether there is not now an annual loss which will more than equal the profits derived from the existence of this institution.

The cost of transportation of specie to New York from this State, including insurance and interest while on the way, would be an average little if any over one half of one per cent. To avoid the trouble of delivering the specie there the merchant would give a half per cent. exchange, and if the paper of the bank were as good as specie here that would be the price of exchange on New York. But to secure a large circulation the branches of the bank put their notes into circulation at distant points from the place of issue, so that to convert them into coin will cost on ordinary sums about one per cent. Practically then the notes of the bank are one per cent. below par. Upon the articles consumed by the inhabitants of the State, purchased in the Atlantic cities, one per cent. more is paid because of the depreciation of the paper of the bank, and that too when the paper enjoys the confidence of the people as much as it ever did.

This item will amount annually to at least one hundred thousand dollars. A larger sum than the bank can possibly make for the State in a year in the most prosperous times.

The people of the State lose thus, sir, every year more by this bank than this Constitutional Convention will cost.

In disputing the claim of the bank to a continued existence based on the profits received by the State, I have been compelled to show the utter fallacy of the claim of the friends of that institution that the bank has furnished a safe sound currency.

Nothing but an utter confusion of ideas would make a man excusable for making the declaration that the State Bank of Indiana had furnished a sound currency to the State. Never less than one per cent. below specie in value, and one fourth of the time from eight to twelve per cent. below par.

If this is what gentlemen mean by a sound currency we shall hereafter be able to comprehend the idea they intend to convey. It is certainly not what is understood to be a sound circulation by the mass of the citizens of the State.

If we are to have paper money let us at least require it to be equal to specie during a time of general confidence. It is certainly enough that the citizens of the State shall suffer the consequences resulting from an expanding and contracting currency ever marring and disturbing the relations of value without paying an annual indirect tax equal to that required for the support of the State government in consequence of its uniform depreciation.

Mr. President, aside from other questions of profit and sound currency, there are other reasons which should be conclusive against the longer continuance of that institution. Such institutions exercise a dangerous influence over the destinies of a State. The million of bonds sold in 1839, for which little or nothing was obtained, were disposed of under an act of the Legislature authorizing the sale of four millions more. The bank was in truth managing the finances of the State. It was the "power behind the throne stronger than the throne itself."

From the nature of an institution of that sort it assumes the control of the finances of the State. That act was passed under the delusive hope perhaps honestly entertained by the bankers themselves, that the State Bank could so manage the finances of State as to carry the mammoth internal improvement system through.

I hazard little in saying, sir, that that institution has controlled the Legislature of this State wherever the interest of the bank were at stake. No one can read this little book Mr. President, (holding up a volume containing the bank and sinking fund laws,) without seeing the most conclusive evidence that the bank possessed an almost unlimited control over the Legislature.

By the original act incorporating the bank, the institution possessed the exclusive right to issue paper money, but the interest upon the loans of the branches was never to be at a higher rate than six per cent. per annum. It is well known that by various devices the bank avoided that provision of its charter. In 1843, when it became doubtful whether under the decisions of the courts the principle of such loans would not be forfeited, a provision was inserted in the resumption law legalizing the past and all subsequent usurious loans. Up to that time the State participated with the bank in a violation of her own laws against usury, and since that period has enjoyed with her associates the exclusive right to take a usurious rate of interest.

There are many texts in this little volume of laws in reference to the State Bank, each of which would afford ample food for useful reflection, but my limited time will only permit me to present one thing more, and that is the certificate appended to each amendment to the charter of the bank, that the "assent of the State Bank and branches to the act amendatory of its charter" &c., had been filed in the office of the Secretary of State.

Suppose the bank had refused its royal assent to an act of the Legislature passed even by a unanimous vote of that body, it would have been as effectually vetoed as if it had been passed by the parliament of England and her majesty Queen Victoria had withheld her signature approving it. Much has been said here against even the qualified veto power given to the Governor, but in reference to one of the most important interests in the State, this institution possesses the absolute veto power.

A power to forbid legislation possessed not by an officer elected by the people and amenable to public opinion, but by an independent, irresponsible monied institution. The thought is humiliating in the extreme, that no difference how much the public interest require a change in the policy of the State in reference to banking, the kingly negative of the bank effectually controls the legislative power of the State. The legislative power of a sovereign State prostrated before a moneyed monopoly.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I will venture the prediction that the closing up of the present State Bank will result in showing a large loss instead of a profit upon the money it has absolutely received from the State. Gentlemen arrive at different conclusions based upon the reports of the affairs of that institution. Without intending to impeach the integrity of a single officer of the bank, I must express my conviction, that he who adopts the conclusion that their reports are not illusory will in the end find himself most egregiously mistaken. If in the final winding up of the business of the bank its condition should be as good as it is now supposed to be by its friends, the result will differ materially from the experience of the world in banking everywhere else.

The experience of every country where banking has been carried on is that the reports made by the banks are utterly illusory, and although the annual statement of the bank with other reports made to this body seem to indicate that the State's interest is worth perhaps twenty per cent. more than the par value of the stock, I will with great pleasure vote for a proposition to sell the interest of the State at twenty per cent. less than the bank represents it to be worth.

The allotted half hour having expired, Mr. McFarland resumed his seat.

It was moved that the rule be suspended in order to allow the gentleman from Tippecanoe to terminate his remarks.

Mr. COOKERLY deindeed the yeas and nays.

The question being upon the suspension of the rule, the yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, and resulted—yees 69, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermilion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Foster, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Howe, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Taylor, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—69.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Chandler, Chenoweth, Clements, Coats, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hogin, Huff, Kendall of Wabash, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Prather, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—54.

So the rule was not suspended.

Mr. BORDEN desired to make a suggestion which he thought the Convention would be willing to adopt. It occurred to him that, from the manner in which the Convention proceeded, they were not likely to come to any definite conclusion. He thought that, if a select committee were formed of one from each Congressional district, to be chosen by the delegates representing the district, and the whole subject referred to them, such a committee would be very likely to hit upon some plan that would meet the views of most of the members of the Convention. [Cries of "No! no!"] He would, therefore, move the adoption of a resolution embracing in substance what he had suggested.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that it is not in order to introduce a resolution at this stage of the business.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I offer it in the form of a motion.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that it is in the form of a resolution.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, I will strike out the word "resolved."

Mr. BORDEN. I make this motion to refer, as before stated, because I think it will have a tendency to expedite the business of the Convention. I am satisfied that if something of the kind be not done, and the wishes and views of the different portions of the country thus brought together, we will be engaged here day after day in noting down amendments, and in a month will be no nearer a conclusion than we are now. We can do more towards settling this matter by sitting down in a committee constituted as I have suggested, than we can by public discussion here.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise to a point of order. The motion, I understand, is to refer the section and pending amendments to a committee. Yesterday the section was laid on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. It is the section under consideration.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Owen that the motion has reference to the subject under consideration.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. I am entitled to make an inquiry. Was not the first section, sir, laid on the table?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. Then, of course, it cannot be referred.

The PRESIDENT. Of course, a motion could not be made in relation to a matter not before the Convention. The report of the committee on banking is now before the Convention. The first section of the report was laid on the table yesterday. The article is now up, and a section is now under consideration, with pending amendments. The gentleman from Allen now moves to re-commit it and the remainder of the article.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand the first section was laid upon the table yesterday. I propose that the section and pending amendments, together with the whole of the subject of banking, be referred to a select committee, as before said. Will gentlemen understand the matter now? The Chair has decided the motion to be in order, and I hope gentlemen will see that it is in order. I say let us refer the subject now; if we do not, my word for it, in some weeks hence, you will be just where you now are. You will have to refer it then. It is perfectly idle for us to waste time here voting to lay gentleman's motions and amendments on the table, in order that men may get in their own favorite plans. I think the plan I have suggested is about the best course we could adopt in relation to this subject. I readily admit that this is a question upon which I do not know much, but it is one in regard to which I have strong principles.

I do desire, sir, the wisdom and good judgment of this body in a committee, to calmly investigate this whole subject, and decide upon a plan calculated to consult the best interests of the people. For, sir, no question that has come before this body goes so directly to affect the interests and welfare of the community as this currency question. It is a question, of all others, in the treatment of which we should lay aside everything of personal consideration, and have no object in view but that of arriving at the best possible conclusion.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley observed that, whatever report this proposed committee might make at some future day, gentlemen would still offer their amendments. It occurred to him that the present was the best time for gentlemen to present their propositions; let them be taken and voted upon, until we could strike upon something that would meet the wishes of the majority of the Convention.

Mr. RITCHEY hoped the motion to re-commit would not prevail. We had heard speech after speech; and he was of opinion the Convention was not one inch nearer the settlement of the question than when they began the discussion. He thought gentlemen should propose a general isolated restriction, and have a vote taken upon it. They could easily ascertain if there were a majority in favor of the proposition; and then let some other gentleman propose another isolated restriction. He was of opinion the Convention could never attain its object by gentlemen proposing a batch of restrictions at a time.

He was not willing that the Constitution should go forth to the people without its containing some restrictions upon the banking system that might be adopted. Gentlemen would recollect that, during the last session of Congress, discordant matters, not appertaining to each other, were negatived when combined in one bill; but, when taken up singly, they were adopted. He alluded to the so much talked of Omnibus Bill. We should (continued Mr. R.) follow the example of Congress in that respect. I am satisfied that if you refer this subject, as proposed by the gentleman from Allen, you will have the same difficulty to obviate that we have been endeavoring to wade through during the last week. I think we ought to adopt something like that proposed by the gentleman from Ripley last evening. Let us take a vote upon that. I think a majority of the Convention will agree to the proposition; if they cannot, then let some gentleman propose that this bank shall be responsible—

[The remainder of the sentence was lost in the noise.]

I have no doubt but that it will carry, and in that way we can get along without saying a word about State or free banks. I care not whether we have State or free banks; all I want is, to have them properly restricted. I voted to lay all these "Omnibus" propositions on the table, one after another, because I did not approve of any of them. And, sir, I will say here, that if it be proposed to authorize the Legislature to establish a State Bank, I will vote against the proposition. I am opposed to all banks—to use a vulgar phrase, "they are of the same breed of dogs." [Laughter.] They are all evils; and perhaps at the present time we cannot say which system of banking will be the most productive of benefit or injury to the people. But let us place proper restrictions on all kinds of banks; if we are to have any, it is the proper course. I hope the Convention will not, by referring this subject, give an opportunity of having the question re-opened at another day.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved that the motion (Mr. Borden's) be laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. The Chair has already decided that a verbal motion cannot be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair still adheres to that decision. It is not a verbal motion, but a written one.

The yeas and nays were demanded upon the motion to lay on the table.

But the Convention refused to order the yeas and nays.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. PEPPER of Crawford, to lay the motion to re-commit, &c., &c., upon the table,

It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 71, noes not counted.

So the motion to re-commit to a special committee, &c., &c., was laid upon the table.

Mr. COOKERLY. Would it be in order, sir, for the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It would not be in order.

Mr. COOKERLY. Then, sir, for the present, I will make a motion in regard to it. But before I do so, I shall state, that I am in favor of the amendment; and if it should be laid upon the table, I will move, at the proper time, that it be taken up. I now move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio on the table.

The amendment was here read, by request, at the Secretary's desk.

A DELEGATE. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio on the table.

The question being upon the motion to lay on the table,

It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 62, noes not counted.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. COOKERLY. I now move, sir, to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts) upon the table.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 72, noes 62

So the amendment was accordingly laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN. I propose to offer an additional section. I offer it in consequence of the remark made by the gentleman from Johnson, (Mr. Ritchey,) "that we ought to vote upon one restriction at a time." The section I offer now is only a sort of frame-work. We all agree that there must be some restrictions—that we shall not have a banking system without restrictions. The section is as follows:

"SEC. — The General Assembly shall not have power to establish or incorporate, in this State, any bank or banking company, or moneyed institution, for the purpose of issuing bills of credit or bills payable to order or bearer, except under the conditions prescribed in this article."

If you adopt that, you can then go on and say what these restrictions shall be.

Mr. BORDEN. I have a proposition to offer. It is a matter of very little consequence to me what the body does with it. I have here drawn up what I would propose in regard to free banking, and if it be voted down I shall vote against all banking. I propose the following amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Posey:

The amendment was sent up to the Secretary, and immediately after,

The PRESIDENT remarked that it would not be in order to offer a series of sections, by way of an amendment.

Mr. BORDEN. The Chair is right, I believe.

Mr. LOCKHART handed in an amendment which he proposed making to the section under consideration.

A DELEGATE. I move to lay it on the table before it is read. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. Which one of the series of amendments does the gentleman propose? He cannot offer the whole series.

Mr. LOCKHART. The proposition of the gentleman from Posey says, "under the conditions prescribed," &c., &c. Now I go on to say in my amendment, what shall be the first, second, third, &c., &c., conditions and restrictions.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has not the right to offer a series of sections as an amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. I propose to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Posey, by striking out the word "article," at the end of the section, and inserting the word "Constitution."

Mr. OWEN. I accept the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. RARIDEN. It is evident to me, that we can never come to any conclusion by the presentation of isolated propositions. I would suggest, that a select committee, composed of two State bank men, two anti-bank men, and two free bank men, be appointed to take the whole matter into consideration. [Cries of "ugh!"] I say that is the only way by which we can do justice to the country. I do not think it would be as well if the Convention adjourned and left the question an open question. I think we can harmonize, if a committee of six be appointed, as I have suggested. They can ascertain, by associating together, what plan will meet the wishes of a majority of the people. I make the motion.

Mr. BASCOM. I think I can say, in behalf of the anti-bank men, that we will not enter into any league with the bank men. We have got the subject before the Convention, and here let the matter be settled. I venture to say, for myself, that no committee shall bind me, or sway my vote. I care not what their report may be, if it be not one which suits me, I will not go for it. Neither do I want any committee to frame out for me any system of banking. Therefore I hope the Convention will go to work and vote. I agree with what has fallen from gentlemen, that the only legitimate way to get at the matter is to vote directly on each proposition that may come up.

The section before us does not say that we are to have any banks. But I say I will vote against all banks. However, sir, as I remarked a few days ago, I hope the Convention will settle the question. Let us have a direct vote upon the subject, and if the majority says we shall have some kind of banking, then I am willing to vote whether it shall be State or free banks. I have no particular sympathy for either, but I wish the matter decided, and we never can decide it, so long as we bring up whole series of propositions at a time. If those who act with me vote against the free bank, and then against the State bank system, their power is thus thrown against both, and consequently we cannot settle down upon either. But if the Convention will settle directly the question of "bank or no bank," then I think the hard money men are driven to an issue; and, when that question is settled, as a dernier resort, must choose what system we shall have. Then the question will be tested, and we can frame the restrictions. I would then be for the most strenuous restrictions. I would impose all the restrictions that the invention of the human mind could throw around these banks; nothing can be too strong for me. Therefore I hope the subject will not be re-committed, and that the vote will be directly taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from Posey.

The question being upon re-committing to a select committee of six,

It was decided in the negative.

Mr. WATTS moved to amend the section in the following terms: "and that all banking in this State shall be on a specie basis, actually paid in."

A DELEGATE. They could pack up their specie, and send it off, whenever they pleased.

Mr. KENT moved the previous question. [Cries of "Oh no!"]

The call for the previous question was not sustained.

Mr. PETTIT. I now move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn on the table.

Mr. WATTS. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, were taken, and resulted—yeas 53, nays 82—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gregg, Hardin, Helm, Hitt, Howe, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Trimble, Wheeler, and Wiley—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warlick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendrick, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Clinton, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—82.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

The question recurred on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. The question now is upon the adoption of the amendment. If this amendment be adopted, it will destroy free banks, as of course every gentleman knows. The no bank men, and the State bank men, together, have sufficient strength to vote down the free bank men; and then, on the other hand, if the no bank men join with the free bank party, they can destroy your State bank. That is perfectly clear. The only reason why I desire that no such amendments as this should be presented, is because it will bring us to a stand still upon the question.

Mr. WATT'S. I wish to say a word or two on this subject. There have been many intimations thrown out against free bank men, and against State bank men. I never had a dollar in a bank, and never have had any interest directly or indirectly in any bank. But if we go into banking in Indiana, I want our system to be founded upon a specie basis, so that the great mass of the community may be safe against all shaving operations. Sir, when we establish a bank upon the basis of what we owe, we can take ourselves by the waistbands of our trousers, and lift ourselves off of the floor. [Laughter.] We never can establish any other kind of safe banking, but that which is placed upon a specie basis.

I am willing to go as far as other gentlemen to throw restrictions around all these banks; but to say that we can furnish the people with a sound circulating medium, based upon our own indebtedness, is to me impossible of accomplishment. It may be that I want strength of intellect to perceive the possibility of the plan. But, sir, I have lived long enough to have seen the time when I was obliged to shave my money three times a day, when traveling, in order to buy my breakfast, dinner, and supper; and I can assure this Convention, sir, that I have no desire to see such times again.

I want, if we are to have any banks, to see them established with sufficient restrictions thrown around them. It is not the banker, or the stockholder, or the broker, who suffers during periods of monetary depression. They make money by the depression of the currency. It is the poor man, who digs his subsistence and that of his family, who suffers during such times. Therefore it is that I desire to have our banks established on such a basis as will enable them to redeem in specie their issue, when presented. That was the reason why I offered the amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. Is it in order to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, because it is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. Would it be in order to move to refer the section and pending amendments with instructions?

The PRESIDENT. It would, sir.

Mr. COLFAX. I move now to refer the section and amendment to the committee on banking, with these instructions: "Add these words: 'said specie basis to be equal in amount to their entire circulation.'"

Mr. KELSO. I would be glad to have that amendment made.

Mr. PETTIT (having taken the floor at the same time as Mr. K.). I did not know that the Chair recognized the gentleman from Switzerland.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Switzerland.

Mr. KELSO was in favor of having dollar for dollar. He put it upon this ground, that if it were safe to bank upon a paper basis, it was safer to bank on a specie basis. Instead of going forth to buy stock as a security for the billholder, let them put that same money with the same officer of State, as a security for the billholder, and bank on the specie. Then, they might call it a State bank, or a free bank, or a general bank, or whatever bank they pleased. If they put in safe custody a dollar in specie for every dollar of their circulation, he for one did not care how soon they embarked in banking. But, for his life, he could not see the necessity of taking the money out of the State, and going to Wall street, to buy from the bankers there the bonds of the State or of the U. S., and then bring them back to Indiana to bank upon. Far better would it be to take the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn, engraft it upon the section offered by the gentleman from Posey, and afterwards add the amendment of the gentleman from St. Joseph. He would be allowed to say to the gentleman from Posey that he did not fear his threats, but would go with the State bank men or with any other party, to place our banking system upon the basis now proposed.

Mr. OWEN. I disclaim for the past, present, or future, the slightest intention, by insinuation or otherwise, to offer any threat to this body.

Mr. KELSO. Certainly the gentleman denies it, as any other man would, who possessed the sense that the gentleman does. Perhaps the word "threat" is too harsh—"explanation" is better. It amounts to saying—"Now gentlemen, beware of what you do. Here is a proposition to put banking upon a specie basis, and we choose to bank upon paper—if you put us on the specie basis we have the power to destroy you." The gentleman spoke with a bland smile—there was no threat, but it was a direct remark that ninety-nine out of one hundred would have taken for a threat. I hope the Convention will adopt the proposition, and say that if we have any banking system, it shall be a safe one.

Mr. BIDDLE moved the adoption of the following additional instruction:

"Said specie to be paid into and kept by an officer of State."

[Cries of "consent."]

Mr. OWEN. One, single word in reply to the gentleman from Switzerland. I had no intention of doing more—and I did no more—than to state a fact that is known to every member of this Convention. It is known that the "no banks" cannot carry in this Convention, and that the "free bank" or the "State Bank" cannot carry in this Convention. I did state to or remind this Convention of an acknowledged fact. And if any motion carries upon its intrinsic strength here, it will destroy one or other of the two plans, and we shall have lost all the time we have spent in talking upon the subject.

Mr. STEVENSON next took the floor, but owing to the great noise and confusion which prevailed, his remarks were not at all audible at the table. He was understood to say that he did not consider that the favorite proposition of any of the three parties in the Convention could be adopted; there would be an amalgamation of two of the three parties against each proposition. He did not think that referring the subject would relieve the Convention of the difficulty under which they labored. All that could now be done was to arrange some compromise between the State Bank and the free bank men. That this object might be accomplished and a proposition of the nature of the one alluded to introduced, he would move to lay the section and pending amendment upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN. I want to know if the gentleman includes in his motion all of the sections behind?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir, only the section under consideration.

The question being upon the motion to lay the section upon the table,

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 49, nays 80:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Norden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, May, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Pettit, Ristine, Shoup, Stevenson, Thomas, Todd, Wheeler, and Wiley—49.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Ballingall, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Dick, Dobson, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—80.

So the section and pending amendment were not laid on the table.

On motion, by Mr. WATTS,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the Bank question, the pending question being the motion of the gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle) to re-commit with instructions.

Mr. BORDEN. I rise simply for the purpose of making a suggestion to the advocates and friends of both the free bank and the State Bank system. It has been already decided that the business of the State shall be open to all alike—the no-bank party voting with the free bankers to carry the measure.

There is another proposition which has been laid on the table providing that the credit of the State shall never be given or loaned in aid of any corporation or loan, nor shall the State ever become a stockholder in any company or association. Now if the free bankers will go with us anti-bankers, and take this proposition from the table, and pass it, it seems to me that it will effectually decide this question in favor of the free bankers. The anti-bankers cannot vote either for free banks or a State Bank, but we can vote to impose restrictions upon their systems. To effect this object, then, I move to lay the section and the pending amendments on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden) is not in order, inasmuch as the Convention has refused before the adjournment at noon, to lay the section and pending amendments on the table. It is not in order in the same stage of the proceedings to make a motion the Convention has just rejected. If this were the practice, the time of the Convention might be continually occupied with the consideration of motions of the same character.

Mr. DOBSON asked for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first taken upon re-committing.

Mr. NILES. Though I have occupied too much time upon this question already, it seems necessary to avoid being misunderstood, that I should submit a few more remarks. I wish it distinctly understood that I am no enemy to the banking system. I have opposed the idea of State banking from no such feeling, but from a wish to see the system founded upon sound principles combining the elements of permanence and uniformity. Public indignation will always be aroused by bank failures, against all banking. To be useful, the system must be able to command the public confidence. And public confidence never can be permanently secured unless it rests upon a surer basis than the mere personal responsibility and good conduct of the bankers themselves.

Some gentlemen have argued in this debate, that the free banking plan which we propose would be little less than a plan for free swindling, and they seem to imagine that we propose to bank upon collateral securities as the basis of the circulation, without providing for the redemption of the bills in specie. Now it is a sufficient answer to such an objection that banking of that kind could not be sustained for an hour, as it could not secure the public confidence. Gentlemen have strangely overlooked the fact that we require the redemption of bills at all times in specie, and that we refuse any power to the Legislature to authorize the suspension of specie payments for a single day. In arranging the details of a general banking law, on the plan which we propose, the Legislature would be bound to adopt all reasonable provisions as to the amount of specie which a bank should have in its vaults, on going into operation, and at all other times. It could not well be less than under the old system of special charters. We also propose the individual liability of stockholders to at least an amount, over and above their stock, equal thereto. And in addition to all this, we require that they shall keep at all times, on deposit with the State Treasurer, collateral securities amply sufficient for the prompt payment of all the bills put in circulation. How gentlemen can imagine that such a system would afford less security to the bill holder than banks organized on the old plan of special charters, with special privileges, is past my comprehension.

I repeat again that I feel no sympathy with that horror of banking which has been expressed by some of the gentlemen with whom I have commonly voted upon this question. But I wish to make the system permanent and I yield to no one in my desire to make it safe. Many persons seem greatly attached to the present State Bank, on the account of the mutual liability of the branches, and their obligations to protect each other. That circumstance does give them strength, but it would aid equally in supporting a rotten, as a sound institution. If however that connection and mutual liability of banks were thought necessary, I see no reason why free banks could not be associated together as well as banks created under special charters. The branches of our State Bank are separate institutions excepting their mutual liability and supervision. Free banks or any others, connected in any such manner, must necessarily have a general board of control, meeting periodically at the seat of government or some other point. They would constitute a great concentrated moneyed power in the State—an evil always to be avoided.

The scheme of the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) is certainly fallacious. In order to avoid the most odious features of the present State Bank, he proposes that branches should be organized wherever the people would raise the requisite amount of capital. But I apprehend few discreet men would take stock in a bank when they might be compelled at any moment, to receive any number of new partners for whose acts they must be responsible. An institution on the plan of our present State Bank, must be a strict monopoly or it could not exist at all. The bank was right in principle, when it refused to organize new branches, though their organization was desired by the Legislature and the people. But if men associated in banking would be willing to receive new partners indiscriminately and without limit, under the old system, it is passing strange if they would refuse to receive the same partners after they had deposited ample securities for the redemption of their bills, with an officer of the government.

Gentlemen complain that free banks would be shaving shops. That is to say, a bank organized under a special charter, with a capital of an hundred thousand or a million of dollars, without having pledged collateral securities for the redemption of its bills, would be innocent of all shaving, while if similarly organized in other respects, but under a general law, with a deposit of securities, it would degenerate into a shaving machine. But I ask, would a bank be less likely to practice extortions if organized under a special charter and with special privileges, than if all men were authorized to bank on the same terms?

It is also said that free banks would flood the country with irredeemable paper. This objection would lie much more strongly against a bank organized on the plan suggested by the gentleman from Shelby. Men do not very recklessly issue paper which they know that they cannot, in any event, avoid paying. The only essential objection to the free banking system as applicable to the west is, that it will be too restricted, and will not afford sufficient banking facilities. But it will possess an element of elasticity, by which it may be gradually adapted to the necessities of the country.

A great deal has been said about the danger that foreign bond holders will become our bankers. What harm could all the bond holders in the world do us by coming here and subjecting their capital to our laws, or by sending it here to be managed by our citizens? But gentlemen need not be so much alarmed. The capitalists of Europe will not pass by the great commercial cities, in order to engage in banking in the interior of Indiana.

I would gladly reply to all the objections which have been urged against free banking, were it not that from the time I have occupied upon this question, in the early part of the debate, I should feel it to be an inexcusable trespass upon the time of the Convention. I am strongly attached to the system and believe that it combines the principles of free competition and safety to the public interests, to a greater extent than any other known to the commercial world. But in common with many others, I am free to admit, that there seems to be little prospect that a majority of this body can be induced to agree upon it as the only system. We have reached a point where concession and compromise seems to be indispensable. I am ready, for one, to meet the gentlemen with whom we differ, upon any fair and reasonable grounds. A reference of the whole subject to a select committee, with a view to such a compromise would seem to me entirely proper, and I hope that the reference will be made.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I would inquire what is the question before the Convention?

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon re-committing the section under consideration to the committee on currency and banking.

Mr. TAYLOR. I think, sir, the wisest course for this Convention to pursue is, to re-commit this subject. I cannot but think that if we would cease interrupting each other by offering motion after motion, thereby creating confusion, and the presentation of which, as far as I can see, during the last five or six days, has resulted in no benefit, we would get along a great deal faster. I, sir, have no more interest than any other member of the Convention in this question. It is a mere question of policy whether we will direct our attention to some legitimate object of banking for the benefit of our constituents, or not; and I think that so far, we have been quarreling about our peculiar views, rather than attempting to unite upon some system for the benefit of our constituents.

It must be apparent that there are other parties in the Convention on this subject, and that neither of them have a majority; therefore, of necessity, there must be some concession by each of these parties, or they will not come to any reconciliation.

What, sir, has been the usual course pursued among all political bodies, when they have got in to confusion and difficulty in regard to any subject? I have observed that when that has been the case in Congress and in Legislatures, that they refer the contested question either to a select or a standing committee, and that that committee may have an opportunity to deliberate and decide upon some happy plan of compromise on which the opposing parties may unite.

I do not wish to inflict a reprimand upon this Convention, but I would ask gentlemen whether any good has grown out of their action during the last four or five days; and whether the result of that action has not been, that they are now more at variance with each other than when the subject was first broached?

Sir, we have become tired of listening to each others's speeches. No matter what may be the proposition in regard to which arguments may be presented, we become impatient during the delivery of those arguments; and the only way in which we can arrive at any degree of harmony upon this subject is, to authorize a committee to come together, and endeavor to form such a system of banking as shall meet the views of the members of this Convention generally. I think the State Bank party are well convinced that they cannot carry out their measures in their present form; and I believe that this is the case with the free bank party, that they do not expect to obtain what it was their desire to obtain. There must be concession—something like give and take in our opinions—or else we will never come to any conclusion that will be for the interests of our constituents. Presenting propositions and calling for the yeas and nays upon them, when not more than thirty or fifty members vote either one way or the other, is not the true course to pursue in order to arrive at a speedy settlement of this question.

I have only to say in conclusion, that I have taken no part in this bank fight, because I did not think I could do any good either to my constituents or the citizens of the State generally.

Mr. KELSO. I am not going to make any opposition to this motion to refer, but I am clearly of opinion that the subject should not be referred to the committee that had charge of it before; I therefore move that the section under consideration be re-committed to a committee composed of one member from each Congressional district.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's motion is out of order. The motion to refer to a standing committee has precedence over a motion to refer to a select committee.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. President, I regret to witness so much excitement on a question so plain—so practical.

Why do gentlemen deal so much in denunciatory remarks against all who ever had anything to do with banks. There are there, as elsewhere, honorable men. Dishonorable men may be found there also. What has that to do with the question? Who are they who make wholesale assertions of dishonesty? Are they any more honest? I say not. Are there not among them men who are most annoying to these very banks they denounce to get loans, and among the slowest to pay them? Would those censorious gentlemen not be as well occupied by practically discussing the subject, as in occupying the time of the Convention by pointless motions and wholesale denunciations? Most assuredly they would, if they understood the subject. Their great object is, popularity; and brief I think it will be if thus acquired. We have witnessed too much recrimination from each of the bank parties to-day, where we ought to practice mutual forbearance. For my part, from the moment banking was referred to, the committee of which I am a member, I saw a middle ground ought to be taken. I urged it on that committee. When I had the honor of addressing this Convention at the commencement of this debate, I again urged it, as gentlemen well recollect, and that I then favored private banking, or that banking be free to all under the restrictions as reported. I also favored the views of the minority report No. 3. When the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) offered the section this morning, it seemed to me we ought to adopt it, as one that both sides would agree to; that other sections, such as met general approval, ought to follow; and where a difference of opinion existed on which a majority could not unite, let that be referred to a special committee to compromise and harmonize. We have spent more than a week on this subject. What do gentlemen expect? Don't they see, compromise is all that is practicable? Why, then, waste more time in useless motions and fruitless discussions, each arguing in favor of his peculiar plan?

I trust, Mr. President, this subject will be referred, but not to the committee on currency and banking, which is composed of gentlemen differing so widely on this important subject, some of whom very recently seem to have changed sides. I go for closing this matter in the spirit of compromise, in which I trust we will meet all subjects where a great diversity of opinion exists.

Mr. WOLFE. I am opposed, decidedly, to this reference. This subject has already been in the hands of a committee, and one section of their report has been voted down. We have been eight or nine days working on the bank question, and we are just beginning to approximate towards a settlement of it, and I think we should proceed with the consideration of the question until we have come to that settlement. If we refer the subject, when the report of the committee comes back we will only have to travel over the ground we have already passed over. I think this proposed reference entirely unnecessary. We are getting now to close quarters in our discussion, and let us continue it until we have come to a conclusion of the matter.

Mr. COOKERLY. If there is any question that has been or can be presented to this Convention, that requires calm and unbiassed reflection and action in regard to it, more than another, it is the question now pending before us. Upon that decision, in my opinion, depends the adoption or the rejection by the people, of the Constitution we are now engaged in framing. In arguing this question, and in deciding upon it, we ought to be calm—we ought to be cool—and we ought to be conciliatory. There ought to be a spirit of compromise pervading this Convention in regard to this matter. I came here, sir, as a free bank man. I represent a constituency living in Vigo county, who, I believe are thoroughly free bank men. I am in favor of that system, and I will not go in favor of any other system, if I can help it. But, sir, are we to adjourn without doing anything in regard to the subject? May we not, as the representatives of a free people, meet upon one common platform of compromise, conciliation, and concession? And, sir, I must deprecate the action of certain gentlemen here, in regard to the proposition of a compromise upon this question. What do we hear, for instance, from the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) who has been one of the most violent in denunciation of the free bank party, upon this question? Why, he affirms he will not listen to any compromise. That, sir, is not the proper spirit that should be manifested by the members of this Convention upon this subject. I have voted against the proposition of the State bank party, as long as I thought it was necessary, and now if they are willing to come up and become parties to an honorable compromise of the matter, I am willing to meet them on one common platform. I am unwilling, sir, to assist in protracting the debates of this Convention on this subject, at an expense of some six hundred dollars to our constituents—acting at the same time almost like a mob; I would rather compromise the question at once.

Now, gentlemen of the State Bank party, I desire to try your faith, and I have only to say to you, introduce a measure of compromise, so that we can see where we stand. The truth of it is, we want a bank predicated upon democratic principles, and I ask gentlemen who belong to the democratic party, whether you are willing to stultify yourselves on this question? [Loud cries of "consent," and "no consent."] Are you willing to have a State Bank monopoly with branches, in the face of the section which was adopted a few days since, wherein you declared that the General Assembly should never grant a privilege to any citizen or class of citizens, which, under the same circumstances, might not be granted to others. And are you willing to vote for a State bank now, whereby you confer privileges upon a certain portion of the community, to the exclusion of the remaining portions? The State Bank men promise very fairly, but will they carry out those promises? Will they put into effect the principles of equal rights and justice to all men, about which they now talk so earnestly? I think not, sir. Sir, the sentiments I have advanced, I fully believe, are the sentiments of all true republicans of the genuine democracy.

Now, my friend from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts,) proposes to have the circulation of banks predicated upon a specie basis. I ask him in whose keeping he proposes to deposit that specie?

Mr. WATTS [laughingly]. In the keeping of the gentleman from Vigo.

Mr. COOKERLY. The gentleman from Vigo does not want to have anything to do with banks. Sir, I go for the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Cass, (Mr. Biddle,) upon this subject, that whenever a bank desires to predicate her circulation upon a specie basis—the specie shall be locked up and given in charge of some proper State officer, so that when it is called for it may be obtained. I trust, sir, that some plan of compromise may be presented upon this subject, and to effect that object, I shall vote for its reference to a committee.

Mr. RITCHEY. I cannot see any propriety, Mr. President, at this stage of our action upon this question, in referring it to any committee whatever. Is there any propriety in re-committing the subject to the committee on banking, when that committee has already considered the subject, and, after a long and tedious examination, brought in four or five different reports in regard to it? And further, the chairman of that committee does not wish to have the subject referred to it again, and I think he is right.

I am equally opposed to referring to a select committee. How do gentlemen suppose, after the votes that have been taken on this subject, that any committee, I care not how selected, can embody a series of provisions in relation to banking, which the members of this Convention generally will endorse? Sir, it will be but a useless waste of time. Let us go on and vote, and vote, until we have either agreed upon something definite, or come to the conclusion that we can agree upon nothing; and then leave the matter open for the Legislature to deliberate upon and adjust. I trust the subject will not be re-committed.

Mr. KELSO. In relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) I have only to remind him and the Convention that it is certainly within the last thirty-six hours, that he has been converted to compromise and concession.

When this subject first came up, there was no man on this floor who opposed more decidedly everything in the shape of a compromise, and who declared more emphatically that the free banking system would carry—that its friends had the power to adopt it, and they would exercise the power. But he is now in favor of a compromise, and I am glad of it; the sign is favorable; for, whenever the big stars begin to fall the little ones follow. [Applause.] If he has concluded to concede a little, and to extend the right hand of fellowship to his opponents, I go with him.

I trust, sir, that this subject will be referred to a select committee, composed of one from each Congressional district, and that the Chair will select that committee from among the different parties to this question, so that the different views of members may be fairly represented. For, sir, if it is referred to the standing committee that has already reported upon it, I do not think any good will result. I have no idea that a single member of that committee has changed the position he took upon it when under its consideration before; and therefore we cannot reasonably expect a satisfactory report from it. For these reasons, I shall vote against the proposed reference to the standing committee, and in favor of referring to a select committee.

Mr. HALL. [The first few remarks of Mr. H. were inaudible at the reporters' desk.] Mr. H. proceeded. This, sir, is one of the most important questions that has yet come up for the consideration of the Convention. And, sir, the action of the committee in bringing in four or five different reports upon the subject, no doubt has tended to distract and divide the minds of members in regard to it. I am satisfied that under present circumstances there is no hope of our agreeing upon the subject in Convention, and therefore I am in favor of re-committing—though I am opposed to re-committing to the standing committee on banks. I believe that a select committee should be raised to have charge of the subject, and that the Chair should select that committee with a view to bring about a scheme of compromise. One party must yield a little, and another party must yield a little, and so on, and then we will be able to unite upon some general plan for banking. If the gentleman who moved to re-commit this subject to the standing committee on banks is not willing to withdraw that motion and substitute a committee of one from each judicial circuit, I hope the proposition will be voted down in order that a motion of that kind may be presented.

Mr. COLFAX. If it will facilitate the action of the Convention I will now withdraw my motion to refer to the standing committee, and move that it be referred to a select committee composed of one member from each judicial circuit.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I renew the motion to refer to the standing committee on banks; and the reason I do this is, that by the votes already given in this Hall the preferences of members for this or that system of banking have been sufficiently indicated; and I want to know how the Chair can escape censure if in appointing the members of this committee he selects a majority of State Bank men or a majority of free bank men, and that majority report provisions to their own liking. What would be the benefit of such a committee when we have not as yet had any definite scheme of compromise offered. What concessions are the State Bank men ready to make? Do they propose to give an additional security for the issues of that bank? Do they propose to divest it of the character of a monopoly? Are they ready to locate new branches wherever the business of the country may require them? No intimation of this kind of a satisfactory character has as yet been given. Now unless we know what we are to make by this compromise I can see no advantage in re-committing. We who favor free banks, on the other hand, are willing to take such restrictions as may be safe and salutary, and such as will secure to the people equal rights. Until, then, we have some such measure of concession broached I do not think it necessary to have this reference; but if it is to be made at the present time I prefer that the reference should be made to the standing bank committee.

Mr. OWEN. I believe, sir, if we will refrain from re-committing this subject to a committee we will be able to pass some four or five sections of it this afternoon with very little difficulty. There are certain sections in regard to which we are all agreed, and if we will go to work and pass those first it will be so much done; and then we can take up the sections about which there is any difficulty and proceed with their consideration.

Mr. WATTS said that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) proposed to begin at the end of their legislation on this subject and come back to the beginning in saying that they ought to pass those sections which were of minor importance and about which there was not much difference of opinion first, and then proceed to the consideration of the more important sections. Now he thought that the better plan was to lay the broad platform first, fix the basis on which it was proposed to bank, and then take up the isolated sections. He was in favor of settling the great principle about which they were now contending first, and the minor propositions afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER hoped that the reference would not be made. For his part from certain indications which had come to his notice he began to think there was a wavering in the free banking ranks. There was already considerable division among them, there being a diversity of opinion on the subject of free banking between the two celebrated leaders, the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles). He, (Mr. F.,) professed to be a conservative; and he must say to the Convention that unless there was more conservatism in the new Constitution than had been already placed there it would never receive the approbation of the people. He would say then to the friends of the State Bank system—to the friends of a bank existing upon a specie basis in contradistinction to rotten paper—to stand firm and they would carry the day.

Mr. NAVE. It seems to me that every gentleman on this floor must be well satisfied from the present condition of things that neither the free bankers nor the State bankers can carry any of their favorite measures on the subject of banking. And yet, sir, the people of the State generally are in favor of inserting in the new Constitution a provision authorizing a banking system of some kind; and I believe a majority of them are in favor of the present State Bank system.

If it was put to a vote at the public polls I believe the people of the State would sanction the State Bank system, and why? Because it has furnished them with a sound circulating medium, and all that has been charged against the institution amounts to nothing.

The charge against the bank of incurring without cause the suspended debt of two hundred and seventy thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars and seventy-seven cents, is without foundation. That debt was the result of the relief laws passed by the Legislature. In the session of the Legislature held in 1841 they passed a relief law requiring that property should be sold for two-thirds of its appraised value, and in consequence of the passage of that law the bank was debarred from collecting its outstanding debts at that time, and hence the suspended debt of two hundred and seventy odd thousand dollars was created; and there can be no question that the law was passed by that Legislature with the view of breaking down the bank.

In regard to the charge of one million of dollars having been lost through this bank, I would say that that loss was not the result of any unwise action on the part of the bank. They had no connection with that loan. Certain individuals who desired to have new branches of the bank established got the Legislature to pass a law to borrow a million of dollars for that purpose—the profits accruing therefrom to go towards paying for internal improvements. The loss was in no wise attributable to any misconduct on the part of the bank; but was the fault of the Legislature.

I desire, sir, briefly to answer an argument put forth by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) that the representatives of the people have the power at the present time, to repeal the charter of the present State Bank. Now, sir, this assertion I deny, and I have taken some pains to procure what I think will be considered by gentlemen, good and weighty authorities in support of my position, that this Convention has no power to authorize the Legislature, nor has the Legislature itself any power to repeal the charter of the present State Bank.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of the United States Bank vs. the Planter's Bank—9, Weaton, 907, held that a State Bank might be considered a private corporation, though owned entirely by the State.

Chancellor Kent, in his 2d Vol. of Reports, says that "a Bank whose stock is owned by private persons, is a private corporation, though its object and operations partake of a public nature, and though the government may have become a partner in the association, by sharing with the corporators in the stock. Chancellor Kent, also lays it down as the settled law of the land, that a private corporation is a contract between the government and the corporation, and the Legislature cannot repeal, impair, or alter the rights and privileges conferred by the charter, against the consent and without the default of the corporations, judicially ascertained and declared." This great principle of the constitutional law, was settled in the case of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward, and the same principle had been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, previously to that decision, viz.: the cases of Fletcher vs. Peck—6 Cranch Rep. 88; the State of New Jersey vs. Wilson—7 Cranch Rep. 164; Terret vs. Taylor—9 Cranch Rep. 43; the Town Pawlet vs. Clark—9 Cranch Rep. 292. Justice Story held that "grants of property and franchises coupled with an interest to public or political corporations, are beyond legislative control, equally as in the case of the property of private corporations.

Mr. N. was proceeding to comment upon these citations, but owing to the confusion which prevailed, said that the conduct of the Convention was so flattering to him that he would take his seat.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford called for the previous question.

The call having been seconded by the Convention, the main question was ordered to be put.

The PRESIDENT. The main question is, shall the section with the pending amendment, be re-committed to the standing committee on currency and banking.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 14, nays 127:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Bryant, Chandler, Gibson, Harbott, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Niles, Shoup, and Steele—14.

NAYS.—Messrs. So the section and pending amendment were not re-committed.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on committing the section and pending amendments to a select committee of one from each Congressional district.

On this question, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Barbour, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chandler, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Garvin, Gibson, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Howe, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Rariden, Sims, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, and Work—42.

So the section and pending amendments were not re-committed.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts).

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, they were taken with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Holliday, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman,

So the amendment was adopted.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is on adopting the section as proposed by the gentleman from Posey, with the amendment of the gentlemen from Dearborn.

The section was read as follows :

"The General Assembly shall not have power to establish or incorporate in this State, any bank or banking company or moneyed institution for the purpose of issuing bills of credit or bills payable to order or bearer, except under the conditions prescribed in this Constitution ; and all banking in this State shall be upon a specie basis actually paid in."

MR. PETTIT. I would ask whether the section is capable of further amendment?

THE PRESIDENT. It is not. We are under the operation of the previous question.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered on the adoption of the section, they were taken, with the following result:

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Clements, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—79.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of J., Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Helm, Howe, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, and Work—59.

So the section was adopted.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

MR. PETTIT. I move that the Convention adjourn.

[Loud cries of "No, no, no, no," and "Consent, consent."]

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

The question then being taken on ordering the section, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading, and the yeas and nays having been demanded and ordered, they were taken, with the following result:

YAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—77.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Gibson, Gregg, Harbolt, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley and Work—60.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. SMITH of Ripley moved the following as an additional section:

"All banks established under the provisions of this article shall be mutually liable for the redemption of the circulation of each other.

The stockholders shall be individually liable in their private estate to the full amount of their stock, whether paid or unpaid, for all liabilities of the bank or banks, in which such stock is held, and from the date of the failure of such bank, the individual liability shall attach and operate as a lien upon the real and personal estate of such stockholder.

A suspension of specie payments shall be a forfeiture of the charter of any bank, and no law shall be made suspending or legalizing a suspension of specie payments.

No bank shall issue, circulate, or pay out any bill or bank note of a less denomination than five dollars.

No bank shall be allowed to take or receive, directly or indirectly, more interest than private individuals are allowed by law.

Every bank dividing six per cent. profit on stock paid in, shall pay over, as may be provided by law, the half of one per cent. for common school purposes, and one per cent. for common school purposes when the bank profits amount to ten per cent. per annum.

In payment of debts, the note holders shall be first paid in case of a bank failure."

Mr. KELSO moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. BASCOM offered the following amendment to the amendment:

"The Legislature shall not have power to create, authorize, or incorporate, by any general or special law, any bank or banking power or privilege, or any institutions or corporations, having any banking power or privilege, whatever, except under the following conditions, to-wit:

The legislature may submit to the voters at any general election the question of "bank or no bank?" and if, at any such election, a number of voters equal to a majority of all the votes cast at such election, on that subject, shall be in favor of banks, then the Legislature shall have power to grant bank charters, or to pass a general banking law, with such restrictions, and under such regulations, as they may deem expedient and proper for the security of the bill holders;

Provided, that no such grant or law shall have any force or effect until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the electors of the State, at some general election, and been approved by a majority of the votes cast on that subject at such election."

On motion by Mr. PETTIT,

The Convention adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. LOCKHART,

On Banking; delivered in the Convention, January 7, 1851.

Mr. LOCKHART. There was, perhaps, no period in the history of the Western country so favorable to the assembling of a Convention to lay down the fundamental laws of a free State, as the period at which the Convention of 1816 assembled. It was immediately after the close of the late war with Great Britain, that the delegates of the Indiana Territory assembled in Convention, at Corydon, to form our present Constitution. It was at a period when universal bankruptcy pervaded the land—when business of every kind was prostrated; at a period when we had but little or no commerce upon which to levy import duties, or to replenish an exhausted, a bankrupt National Treasury. It was at that gloomy period in the financial history of the United States, that our Constitution was formed, and it will not be saying too much for the delegates of the Convention, that they formed a better Constitution for Indiana than any then known in our political history. It was the first Constitution, I believe, of any State, in which the elective franchise was declared open and free to every citizen. It was at that day, a model Constitution; since then many of the older States have assembled in Convention to alter, revise, and amend their organic laws, the bright example set by Indiana in placing all her citizens upon the same broad political platform, by most of them, was deemed worthy of imitation. Indiana was the first State of the Union that declared in her Constitution that there should be no bank or banking institution established in the State unless it should be a State Bank and branches in which, by implication at least, the State was to be a stockholder, and that individual stock to a sufficient amount should be subscribed and paid in, in specie, before the bank could commence operations. The framers of the Constitution had seen the evils incident to independent or free banking. They had seen the entire banking system of Kentucky go by the board. They had seen bank after bank in other States become bankrupt. They had seen the country flooded with the paper of broken banks, not worth a cent on the dollar. They had known the farmer, the mechanic, and the laboring man to receive in exchange for his produce, his wares, or his labor, that which was supposed to be money, and that which passed for money in the evening, which, on the following morning was of as little value as so much blank paper. They had been eye witnesses to the monstrous frauds which had been practiced by these "shin plaster machines," upon the honest, unsuspecting citizens. To remedy these evils they placed the provision in the Constitution to which I have alluded, and but for that wise and wholesome provision, I have no doubt but that Indiana would have been this day overrun with rotten, with worthless banks, the same as many of our sister States have been, and now are. As Indianians, we may feel proud of the Convention of 1816, if our labors shall close with the production of a Constitution as far in advance of other States now, as was the Constitution of 1816 then; we may congratulate ourselves with having discharged the high and important duties assigned us, to the satisfaction of those who sent us here. Under that Constitution Indiana took her place in our glorious sisterhood of States with a population barely sufficient for admission; but how does the account stand to-day? In the brief period of thirty-four years our population has increased from sixty thousand to a million. How rapid the change! How amazing the advancement! Up to 1834 we progressed slowly but steadily. In that year the Legislature incorporated the present State Bank. From that period a brighter day dawned upon Indiana. From that time to the present our growth and improvements have been extremely rapid. Since the organization of the State Bank, as imperfect and monopolizing as it is, and the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, every interest throughout the State has prospered and improved, without a parallel in the progress of States. Since then our population has rapidly increased; nearly doubled, perhaps more than doubled.

It must be admitted by every gentleman upon this floor, that the State Bank has done much towards producing the rapid changes to which I have alluded. It has enabled produce dealers and commercial men to purchase for cash, and at fair prices, the rich productions of the soil. It has furnished means to the farmer, by which to enable him to add to his possessions and the number of his fields, by increasing the value of his produce. No one, I think, will deny this. If he does, let me refer him to the ten years immediately preceding the establishment of the bank, and ask him to contrast that period with the ten years next succeeding its establishment. By so doing, he will find that the products of the farm brought at least fifty per cent. more, on the average, annually, after its incorporation, than before.

I have now briefly alluded to some of the benefits which I think the community at large has derived from the institution of the State Bank. That the bank has been productive of some evil, as well as much good, no one acquainted with its operations, will pretend to deny. But that the benefits which the community at large have derived from it, are infinitely superior to the evils which it has entailed, but few, I apprehend, will dispute. With a knowledge of these facts before us, can we, in the present financial history of the country, as prudent and consistent men, withdraw this institution, and substitute in its place free banks? Shall we destroy an institution which, from its commencement, has furnished us with a safe and sound paper circulation, a circulation in which our entire population have confidence?

I call upon delegates to pause and reflect before they do it—to be well advised before they transplant to our soil the New York or Michigan system of free banking. Banking, I have always regarded as an evil, but an evil which, for the present, we must tolerate. The interests of the people demand it. We are an agricultural people; our farms and plantations are every year being enlarged, and an increased amount of territory brought within the bounds of cultivation. As an evidence of our rapid increase in agricultural productions, it is only necessary to refer to the well-attested fact, that more produce passes through the Wabash and White rivers, in the course of a year, than, twenty-five years ago, passed down the Ohio in the same time. This rapid increase in the productions of the soil, is not limited to Indiana. The entire West is becoming one vast garden. Our lakes and rivers, which but a few years ago were our main thoroughfares to market, are now inadequate to our wants. A canal, passing from the north-eastern corner to the south-western angle of the State, is nearly completed. To this, rail roads and plank roads are being added, in almost every direction. All of which are needed to bear off the rich productions of the soil. To sustain these interests, is the plain duty of every citizen. Can it be done by limiting the circulation to gold and silver? Those best acquainted with the financial affairs of the country, say no. They insist that our currency, with all the aids we receive from banks, is inadequate to our wants. Withdraw from circulation the $125,000,000 of bank paper now in circulation, and put in circulation the $51,000,000 of specie in the vaults of the banks, and you will withdraw from circulation $74,000,000 of currency; a result which no friend to commerce or the interests of the agricultural portion of our people would desire. Yet to annihilate banks, would produce this very result. Hence the cry for banks. The people in the portion of the State from which I come, are generally in favor of a State Bank and branches. In the northern and central portions, the cry is "free banks." For myself, I can say, that if I must choose between the two systems, I am decidedly in favor of the State Bank system. My great anxiety is, that if we tolerate banks at all, that we should have none but sound, solvent, specie-paying banks, and if we cannot have such, let us have none. The State Bank approximates as near to this standard as any banking institution well can. Will free banks do as well? This inquiry can only be answered by comparison, as we have no practical experience in free banking.

In New York, the free banking system is said to be the most perfect, yet they have broken banks there under the free banking laws, as I will endeavor to show from the following extract from the Democratic Review, a periodical favorable to free banks:

"In the working of the free banking law thus far, it would appear that 139 banks have been started under it. Of these, 88 are in operation, 21 have been closed by the proprietors without loss to the bill holders, and thirty have been closed by the Comptroller. Of these, twenty-six have been settled at 76 per cent. average."

From this extract it will be seen that of the thirty free banks that had been closed in New York, twenty-six paid but seventy-six cents on the dollar. What the remaining four paid, we are not informed. And, sir, upon whom does this loss fall? It does not usually fall upon the banker nor does it usually fall upon the merchant. No, it falls upon the unsuspecting farmer and laboring portions of the community—upon the working classes—upon the individual who holds the one, two, or three dollar bill. It falls upon "those who earn their living by the sweat of their brows"—it is this class that suffers most by these failures.

They must have means upon which to live and are compelled from necessity, to dispose of the notes they hold at ruinous discounts. Out of 139 banks brought into existence under the free banking system in New York, only eighty-eight are in existence, the balance have gone by the board. Just contrast that system with our own—in fact there is no comparison to be instituted—the one is so immeasurably superior to the other. Here the bill holder is always safe—there his security is uncertain. This must always be the case when the one is based upon an ample specie basis—the other upon what is termed "ample collateral security deposited with an officer of State." It may not be amiss to inquire what is meant by ample security in New York. It means United States and State stocks, and bonds, and mortgages upon real estate. I have already said that thirty of the free banks in New York, have failed and that twenty-six of them paid but seventy-six cents on the dollar, yet they had all deposited "ample collateral security with the Comptroller." How then, you are ready to ask me, did it happen that but seventy-six cents on the dollar was paid by this batch of broken banks to the bill holder? A ready answer will be found to this enquiry, in the report of the present Chief Magistrate of the nation, made while Comptroller of the State of New York. His report shows that in selling of these "ample securities," great losses were sustained. For example, the Farmers Bank of Orleans, had deposited $61,000 of Indiana five per cent. bonds—this large amount of bonds were sold for $12,117 50, or $48,882 50 less than they were pledged for. The Erie county bank had deposited as part of its "ample security" mortgages on real estate, for $15,000. The property mortgaged exclusive of buildings, was appraised at $31,500. These mortgages sold for $3,000. The St. Lawrence Bank had deposited—

	stocks which were sold
for	- - - -	$2,587 50

45,000	Arkansas State 6 per ct.
	stocks which were sold
	for - - - -	12,545 00
21,277	Bonds and mortgages
	which were sold for -	12,100 00

$81,277		$27,232 50
----------	--	-------------

From this statement, it will be seen that $81,277 of "ample securities" pledged by the St. Lawrence Bank, were sold for $27,232 50, or $54,024 50 less than they were pledged for.

The New York Banking Company deposited as security to the bill holder—

$20,000	Illinois State 6 per cent.
	stocks which were sold
	for - - - -	$3,350 00
6,000	Michigan State 6 per ct.
	stock which sold for -	1,020 00

$26,000		$4,370 00

An absolute loss of 21,630 dollars on twenty-six thousand.

I might give other instances where as great losses have been sustained in the sale of securities pledged as those given, but I will not detain the Convention further with them. I have given enough to show the great depreciation of stock and mortgage securities, and that they are very inadequate to protect the bill-holder. The gentleman from Cass (Mr. Biddle), to whom I always listen with great interest, went so far as to intimate that railroad stocks would be, after a while, introduced into the list of "ample securities" for banking purposes.

Mr. BIDDLE (interposing). What I said was in reference to the statement of the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Rariden), who said that railroad men would go into free banking. Nothing but State or United States stocks is my doctrine.

Mr. LOCKHART. I understood the gentleman from Cass as expressly stating, that these were not the only stocks that would be taken. It was said on yesterday by one of my colleagues (Mr. Owen), that the friends of free banks did not propose to put in these stocks at their face, but at their market price, not above par. Does that better the thing? Does not every one know that stocks are constantly fluctuating in value. To-day they may be at par, to-morrow they may be worth but eighty cents on the dollar, and the next day but forty. Suppose that an association is formed for banking purposes, with a capital of $100,000, and they deposit $300,000 in Indiana State stocks, which they have purchased for thirty-three and one-third cents on the dollar, that being their value at the time; they get $100,000 of paper to bank upon; in a month these stocks increase in value in the market, and are worth sixty-six and two-third cents on the dollar. Is it not clear that the bankers will ask for and obtain another hundred thousand dollars in paper on these stocks? Then suppose that the price of stocks fall in the market to thirty-three and one-third cents on the dollar again, what will then be the result? Why, sir, the bank will be closed, the stocks pledged, sold, and the bill-holders paid off at fifty cents, or less, on the dollar.

But it may be said that this state of facts will never happen. I trust they never may; but those who have watched the stock market for the last ten years, will say that, reasoning from the past, just such results may happen.

From the best examination I have been able to give this subject, after a careful reading of such statistical information as was within my reach, I am clearly of opinion that a system of banking based upon stocks, or stock and mortgage securities, instead of gold and silver, ought not to be introduced into Indiana. With my present views upon this subject, I would much prefer that we should say nothing upon the subject of banking in the Constitution, than to incorporate this as an exclusive system, trusting to the Legislature to deliver us from so great a curse.

Some gentlemen who have spoken upon this question, were unable to find terms in the English language bitter enough to express their indignation against the State Bank. It has been denounced as bankrupt and rotten, and its officers fitted only to be associates of robbers and cut-throats. Such declarations, made without evidence to support them, is unworthy of any gentleman who has been honored with a seat upon this floor. In making this declaration I do not wish to be understood as presenting myself before the Convention as the champion or defender of the State Bank or its officers. I have, however, felt it to be due to truth to give a positive denial to any such assertion. I must be permitted to express the opinion, that much of the opposition to the State Bank manifested in this Convention, grows out of the fact that her capital is too small to afford the accommodations required by the wants of the community, and because she has refused to establish branches where she ought to have done.

In regard to this latter objection, I can only say that I think the bank did wrong in not establishing branches where desired. I think a branch ought to have been established at any point where the requisite amount of stock was taken and paid in under the charter. And while upon this subject, I will remark that I am in favor of leaving that clause out of the Constitution which limits the number of branches to one for every three counties. Equality of privileges ought to be guaranteed by the Constitution. But, sir, this free banking system is one of ephemeral growth. It was not until within the last ten or twelve years, that free banks were introduced into the United States. It was not until $200,000,000 of the stocks of the different States were found to be in the hands of European capitalists, that this scheme of banking on stocks was concocted. It was a device, sir, gotten up in the offices of the brokers and money-changers in New York, London, Amsterdam, and Paris, to enhance the value of American stocks, many of which were then selling at ruinous discounts. The plan adopted was to make these stocks the basis of banking, instead of gold and silver.

As soon as the scheme was agreed upon, efforts were immediately made to put it into operation. New York, under the control of brokers and stock-jobbers, bit readily at the bait, and so did Michigan; and now the attempt is being made to make Indiana swallow this sugar-coated pill; and all to enable the foreign banker, broker, and stock-jobber to send home our bonds for bank capital, draw his regular interest, and, in addition thereto, make six or eight per cent. through the banking operation, and that, too, without investing a single dollar. Bond-holders and stock-jobbers, I affirm, are at the bottom of this movement. They are now looking with anxious eyes to the decision of this Convention on this question. I state, upon the most reliable information, that a prominent broker and stock-jobber, residing in the city of New York, has been in this city since this Convention commenced its session, urging upon his friends the importance of having this free banking system adopted by this body; and when asked by a friend where the bonds were to come from, he replied by saying that there would be no difficulty; bonds were plenty, and could easily be had.

Mr. President, the bond-holders have a twofold object in view in urging this system upon us. They know that this State cannot consistently, with honor, tax her bonds in the hands of the holder; hence, if they employ them here as bank capital, they not only get the interest upon the bonds, but they get the bank dividend upon them, and, at the same time, avoid taxation. This is a refinement upon financiering that the people of the State never dreamed of, much less thought of; yet, it will prove true to the letter, if free banking is established.

It has been clearly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that a State has no right to tax United States bonds. That question has been settled in terms so clear, that my honorable friend from Monroe (Mr. Read) has been compelled to yield the argument.

Mr. BIDDLE (interposing) was understood to say that the question of the taxation of bonds was settled, perhaps. He would inquire what was the difference, whether our bonds were in floating circulation or constituted the basis of a banking system, so far as the question of taxation is concerned?

Mr. LOCKHART. If the bonds are not in the State and money which is taxable is sent out to buy them, the process removes that amount of taxable property from the State and introduces the same amount of that which is not taxable in its place; this is strictly true so far as relates to United States bonds, and for the reason already given applies to State bonds also. It will not be maintained I apprehend by the gentleman from Cass that there are State or United States bonds owned in Indiana to any considerable amount, not any thing like the amount which will be required to establish free banks upon the basis which he proposes, hence in order to purchase them taxable property must be sent out of the State to buy them. This answer must be taken however with this qualification, if the bond holder sends his bonds into the State and invests them as a basis for banking, the amount of taxable property would not be changed, but in this case you would give the non-resident a decided advantage over the resident, by allowing him the privilege of banking upon capital that is not taxable—an advantage which I presume the Legislature would never give. I can view the free banking system as proposed as nothing less than a splendid shaving operation, got up as I have before said, by holders of State stocks for the purpose of increasing their interest. A careful survey of the whole promises I think will satisfy the most sceptical that a deeper laid scheme to make money by the process of shaving was never before attempted on so magnificent a scale. I fully concur with the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Dobson) in saying that free banking is one of the most stupendous schemes ever conceived to lull our people into security, and drive home our bonds under the specious pretexts of furnishing us with a substitute for gold and silver—as a basis for banking. The secret of the whole game is either to sell the bonds to our citizens and take the gold and silver out of the country, or else invest them so that they will yield double interest.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Vanderburg that his half hour has expired.

On motion, the rule was suspended in order that Mr. LOCKHART might conclude his remarks.

MR. LOCKHART. I feel very much obliged to the Convention for this kindness in suspending the rule for my convenience. But as the question has been already discussed at length I must decline occupying the attention of the Convention any longer.

QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

The following section being under consideration, viz.:

“That in all elections not otherwise provided for by this Constitution, every white male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, who has resided in the State six months immediately preceding such election, and every white male of foreign birth of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, having resided in the United States one year, and having declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, and having resided in this State six months immediately preceding such election, shall be entitled to vote in the township where he resides, except such as shall be enlisted in the army of the United States, or their allies.”

MR. WOLFE addressed the Convention, as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: From a sense of duty to myself and those whom I represent, I feel compelled to vote against the section as it stands. Some object to the former, but I object to the latter part of this section; which provides that every elector shall vote in his own township or presinct. This is a provision that should never (in my opinion) be incorporated in our organic law. It is true that just after the excitement of 1840, a law was passed to that effect, but it has been repealed in a number of the counties long since; and every year it grew more and more unpopular and odious, by the people; and no wonder; for it is a direct insult to every man of integrity and veracity. And for one, I am unwilling to say by my vote that my constituents are so dishonest and corrupt that they cannot be trusted to go to the polls anywhere in their county, at a general election, and vote like freemen, for the men of their choice. It is an acknowledged doctrine that all power is inherent in the people. And we have said in another section, that all elections shall be free and equal; and by this we presume to say (for it is presumption on our part), to the people, that they shall not even vote in their own county, for county, district, or State officers. This is a kind of reform that cannot receive my sanction. We should be careful with whom we tamper; for the offspring of this Convention will never be able to stand alone, unless the people give it life and strength; that being done, it may rule and regulate men and things. (I mean corporations). This township voting never did prevent illegal votes being cast, as some pretend to say. It was the penalty;—but the good honest citizen should not be punished, and his liberties and privileges be abridged, for fear that some loafer will deceive some inspector or judge of an election, who can now, and ought to be punished, by a penalty commensurate with the crime. But this is the question: Shall all the good citizens of a county or the State, be punished, for fear that some one out of a thousand will do wrong. This is contrary to the spirit and notions of our free institutions. Sir, let us stop and inquire who are we—by whom were we created, and for what purpose? It might be well for us to work out the answer to each of these three interrogatories, which may serve to teach us that the creature should never forget, or attempt to rise above the Creator.

SATURDAY, DEC. 28.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BORDEN desired permission to introduce a resolution to fix a day for the final adjournment of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT ruled the resolution out of order, a former resolution for the same purpose having been indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BASCOM thereupon in order to enable the gentleman from Allen to introduce his proposition, moved a re-consideration of the vote by which the resolution on that subject had been indefinitely postponed.

After some remarks by Messrs. BORDEN, KELSO, and NILES.

Mr. BASCOM said: Mr. President—I made the motion to re-consider at the request of my colleague, who desired to introduce a resolution fixing a day for adjournment, and I desire to say a word in reference to the matter. I think if there was less time taken up in talking about adjournment and amending the rules we would be ready to adjourn a great deal sooner than we otherwise will if we proceed in the manner we have heretofore done. I am of the opinion there has been as much time taken up in amending the rules as there has been in the legitimate business of the Convention. I hope, therefore, we may proceed with our legitimate business and finish our labors as soon as possible. I therefore withdraw the motion to re-consider.

SATURDAY, JAN. 11, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRUMBACKER, a delegate from Lake county.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the committee on accounts, submitted the following report in relation to the account furnished by

THE STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The committee on accounts have had under consideration the claim of the Reporter of the debates of the Convention for twelve hundred pages of the work, from the commencement of the session up to the 17th of December, 1850, inclusive.

The Congressional rates, under which the Reporter makes his charges, appear by various papers before the committee, to be $2 50 per 1000 words.

The computation of the precise number of words in so large a number of pages is a somewhat difficult task. To count every word in the twelve hundred pages, and those which are to follow, would be impracticable. Your committee have, therefore, adopted the mode of counting the exact number of words contained in a number of pages taken from the volume indiscriminately; and by averaging the same by dividing the whole number of the words by the number of the pages counted, have obtained a mean of the whole. The result of this computation will be seen by the statement marked "A," and appended as a part of the report.

The Reporter, however, in making out his account, has followed what he stated to be the Congressional rule of computation, the result of which will be seen by the statement marked "B," and also appended hereto. The difference in favor of the Reporter by the latter rule of computation, amounts to the sum of $205.

A majority of the committee, believing the mode of computation adopted by the committee to be just and fair to all parties, recommend the same to the approval of the Convention, and that the account of the Reporter be ordered to be paid in accordance with the same.

STATEMENT [A.]

In making the calculation of words, I have taken six fair pages, carefully counted them, and taken the mean thereof as a basis, thus simplifying the operation. I have also counted three other pages, which give the same result.

Those noted are as follows:

" 225	"	904 "
" 320	"	1044 "
" 581	"	952 "
" 1081	"	915 "
" 1192	"	955 "

Leaving the mean, perhaps 955 words, which, multiplied by the number of pages, 1200, gives a total of 1,146,000 words, which, at $2 50 per 1000, amounts to $2,865.

STATEMENT [B.]

The Reporter claims the following as the correct computation:

Lines, per column,	64
Words in a line,	8
Words in a column,	512
Columns in a page,	2
Total words in every page,	1024
Number of pages published,	1200

Total number of words,	1,228,800
Which, at $2 50 per 1000 words, amounts to	$3,070
Difference in favor of the Reporter by the above rule,	$205 00
The report was concurred in.

RESOLUTIONS.

The resolution offered by Mr. Colfax, on the 4th inst., lying over under the rule, relative to the Convention meeting at half past eight o'clock, A. M. for the future, was taken up.

The resolution was read by the Secretary.

Mr. PETTIT moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Upon which motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and, being taken, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 38, nays 77:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Barbour, Biddle, Blythe, Brookbank, Chapman, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Foster, Frisbie, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hendricks, Kelso, Kinley, Milroy, Mooney, Mowrer, Newman, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Shoup, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—38.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bowers, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Chandler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogg, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Ristine, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Trimble, Watts, Wolfe, and Yocum—77.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

The question being "Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. DICK moved to amend by adding the words—

"And that hereafter, the Convention shall hold night sessions."

The motion to amend was decided in the affirmative—ayes 62, noes 45.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution, as amended.

Mr. PETTIT. I understand we have not rented this Hall for the night time. I do not know where we shall be able to sit at night, unless we change over to where we formerly sat in the Capitol. In the night we have lectures, theatrical performances, shows, and every other kind of amusement here. I do not know that we can sit here. It is a burlesque upon all reason and common sense to ask men to sit here to try and do business in the night. I move that the resolution, as amended, be laid on the table.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I will ask the gentleman from Tippecanoe to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. PETTIT. I have no objection; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I move, sir, to amend by adding, "and shall not adjourn for dinner in future."

[Loud cries of "Consent."]

The question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from Lake,

It was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. KELSO. I will now move to lay the resolution on the table.

The PRESIDENT. The chair would remark that the gentleman from Switzerland cannot move it again, when it was decided in the negative just now.

Mr. KELSO. A resolution is offered that the Convention meet in future at 8½ o'clock, A. M. A motion is made to lay it on the table, and negatived. The resolution is then amended so that we are to hold night sessions; it is then a new resolution. It is further amended to the effect that we shall not adjourn for dinner; so that it becomes separate and distinct subject matter. It is twice amended; it now contains three parts—when the vote to lay it on the table was taken, it consisted of but one of them. It cannot surely be out of order to move to lay the whole thing upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will find the rule to be, that at the same stage of the proceedings, and on the same day, it is not in order to move to lay upon the table, the Convention having already decided a motion to that effect in the negative. The question then was, "shall the resolution be adopted." An amendment is adopted, and the question is again the same, not having moved to any different stage whatever on the same day, and in the same stage of the proceedings.

Mr. KELSO (in his seat). Every amendment changes the stage.

The PRESIDENT. Not at all. I will put a case to satisfy the gentleman. For instance, a bill is upon its second reading, and an amendment is adopted. Is the question then, "shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" The mere adoption of an amendment does not engross it. It does not move the bill from the stage in which it was.

Mr. DOBSON. I voted against laying the resolution on the table, and if a motion to reconsider the vote were in order, I would make that motion. I was in favor of that resolution, and if we had the use of the Hall in the evening, I would as soon come here and listen to speeches from the gentleman from Tippecanoe and other gentlemen, as to be sitting at home in my room.

Mr. PETTIT. I beg to inform the gentleman that I will not entertain him with any night speeches.

Mr. DOBSON. As the Convention has fixed on night sessions and no dinners, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was negatived.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that there is a much shorter way of getting at it; it is by voting against the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I have but a word to say. The resolution as amended does not say that there shall be a session every night. Now there might be a difference of opinion in regard to on what nights of the week sessions should be held; some might wish for certain nights, and so with others. [Laughter and confusion.]

Mr. SHOUP moved that the resolution as amended be indefinitely postponed.

The question being upon indefinitely postponing,

It was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SHOUP offered for adoption the following resolution:

"Resolved, That all further debate upon the subject of banking shall cease upon next Monday, at 4 o'clock, P. M."

Mr. CARR. I am not in the habit of troubling the Convention with speeches, and I do not propose doing so now. I think we ought to discuss this highly important question until we come to a proper conclusion upon it. I do not wish to curtail the rights of gentlemen, for I consider that they have the right to discuss questions within reasonable bounds. I do not think that this question of banking and currency has been over discussed yet, and therefore move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being upon laying the resolution offered by the gentleman from Franklin on the table, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. HAWKINS offered the following:

"Resolved, That the committee on accounts be instructed to contract for the binding of the debates of this body at a price of not more than fifty cents per volume."

Mr. PETTIT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WATTS. I move to amend by inserting the words: "At the expense of the delegates of the Convention."

Mr. DOBSON. I think that perhaps there is no necessity for adopting the resolution, with or without this amendment. The Legislature, in the act calling the Convention, provided for the reporting and publication of the debates of this body. I suppose that hereafter they will provide for the binding of these debates.

Mr. CARR moved that the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn be laid upon the table.

The motion was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was laid upon the table. The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. EDMONSTON moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being upon the motion to lay the resolution offered by Mr. Hawkins on the table,

It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 65, noes not counted.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN. I offer the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Convention now proceed to take up the orders of the day."

The resolution was adopted, and the Convention proceeded to the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The section offered by Mr. Owen, as amended by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Watts,) and ordered to be engrossed on yesterday, was then read a third time.

Mr. OWEN. I move to recommit the section with instructions as follows: "Strike out all after the word 'Constitution,' and insert, 'all Bank bills or notes issued in this State, shall be redeemable, at all times, in specie; and no law shall pass, authorizing, directly or indirectly, the suspension of specie payments by any Bank or Banking institution.'"

I voted against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn yesterday for one reason, and it was because the word "basis" taken in that connection seemed to imply that there could be no other security—no collateral security—for the redemption of bank bills except gold and silver alone.

I desire most distinctly to state—other gentlemen can state if it be so with them—that I could not vote directly or indirectly for any currency that was not at all times redeemable in gold and silver. In that sense no man can be a stronger advocate of a specie basis than I am. But if we say a specie basis alone, and do not say to what extent it shall go, we leave the whole thing open. It may be a specie basis of one-tenth or one-twentieth for anything that is declared in that amendment to the contrary. Suppose a case more reasonably, and say the basis is one-third, and that is not very uncommon in the old system of banking. Say that they have thirty-three cents paid in silver for every one hundred cents they issue in paper; I ask any gentleman whether that is a security—whether if these bills come back, the bank can with 33 cents pay 100? There is no security. If gentlemen wish dollar for dollar, well and good; that would be a security, provided always that the specie was taken out of the hands of the bankers, and put in other hands where we would be sure it would be kept safe until the time the obligations would have to be redeemed. No man will say that it should be left in the hands of the banker. Now, sir, this amendment which I propose to make, is in fact a much stronger restriction, so far as regards the basis, though differently worded, than the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Watts). For, it declares that notes or bank bills, shall at all times, dollar for dollar—no uncertainty about it—be redeemable in specie; and for less than that I am not willing to vote. I voted against that amendment, (Mr. Watts's,) not because it went too far, but because of its not going far enough. There is no system of banking that was ever yet proposed, the basis of which was not to some extent upon specie. The free banking system has a specie basis. The free banks always intended to redeem their notes in gold and silver; and if at any one time there is a refusal to pay in specie, the effect is, that their deposited securities are sold out. It is because I desire to see a good collateral security provided, that I voted against the gentleman's amendment, and now move those instructions.

Mr. BIDDLE moved to amend the instructions, so that no bank bills shall be issued, until an amount of specie equal to the circulation should be deposited with a public officer for their safety and redemption.

Mr. B. said, I want to say a word on that proposition. I wish gentlemen who adopted the clause yesterday, to show their sincerity, and how far they intend to place the currency upon a redeemable basis. It was well remarked by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) that the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn does nothing whatever. I venture to say that no Legislature or court can give it a substantial meaning. What is the specie basis? When you tell us in what proportion it is to the issue, then we understand it. When we say it is dollar for dollar we understand it. When we say it should be in the hands of an efficient public functionary, then we understand it. But there is no security so long as that specie is in the hands of the banker. It is just as absurd as to take a security from a man, and then return him the obligation.

I do not design to make a speech, as I have on a former occasion stated my views. I desire gentlemen to say, what they intend, so that we may fight for or against them. I was about to remark, sir, that gentlemen who differ with us, have risen in their seats, and boldly asserted that "we intend to bank upon a paper security, as a means for the redemption of our bills." The assertion is totally unjust and unfair. No gentleman put forward that idea; very far was it from me. That was not the argument. It is not true in a single particular. We desire to bank with a collateral security that will ultimately secure the bill holder. But, that we desire a bill redeemable in anything but specie, is totally wrong. Our basis is specie, to which we desire to add stock, to be deposited in the hands of the State, and under the eye of the State, so that there will be an ultimate security for the redemption of the bills. We desire a specie basis, and in addition to this, collateral security. The gentlemen do not represent our argument rightly when they say we desire to bank on a paper currency. The moment a bank is not able to redeem its bills, the State will make them good by means of the security placed in her hands. And let me tell gentlemen in conclusion, that stocks are better as security than specie, because they bear interest.

Mr. WATTS. At the time I offered the amendment to which gentlemen have alluded, I thought there was some sense in it. Gentlemen on this floor—[much noise and confusion] It is not my intention, gentlemen, to inflict any lengthy remarks upon you. I expect to be treated as a gentleman if among gentlemen, but not, if not among gentlemen. [Increased noise and stamping of feet.] And I can tell who those are with whom I associate by the manner in which they treat me. At the outset yesterday morning, a platform, as a basis upon which to start, was introduced by the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen). I offered this amendment, that all banking in the State should be upon a specie basis. And in all the arguments advanced by gentlemen before that time, there had not been a word said about a specie basis. I venture to say, sir, that this motion to re-commit with instructions would not have been made, had not that little amendment been adopted. In addition to that, as weak, and as feeble, and of as little sense as is that amendment, yet it seems to have created a great deal of sensation in this Convention. And although it comes from one who does not pretend to possess any great stock of information, yet, from my experience, I can say that I have seen gentlemen who, if they were sold at the estimate they put on themselves, and not at their real value, would realize capital enough to bank upon as long as they lived [laughter]. There is no particular bank which possesses my sympathies. I have no particular interest in banks that is not identified with the great mass of the community. My object is, to see a bank established in Indiana—if there be one established at all—that will secure the people against imposition. I believe a bank established on a specie basis, is such a bank. If gentlemen desire to have the amount specified, I am willing to go with them and designate what amount of specie capital there shall be in the vaults of the bank before any paper is issued, so that you do not destroy the system altogether. I am willing to leave the details to the Legislature.

Mr. CONDUIT. Mr. President, I am admonished by the length of time that has been consumed in this debate, that the patience of the Convention must be very nearly exhausted, and if it were possible to express the wishes of my constituents by voting alone, I would not continue the discussion.

But, sir, I am compelled to vote upon one proposition after another, each containing something of good, and other things that I cannot approve, and I feel it to be my duty to make some remarks on the subject, to avoid being misunderstood by those who alone have any right to an explanation of the reasons for my course here.

The language of the section, as ordered to be engrossed, and which it has been moved to re-commit with instructions, is, in my judgment, highly exceptionable. Sir, let our Constitution declare what it may, I desire that its provisions shall be definite. The worst of Constitutional evils known to our form of government, grow out of loose and imperfectly expressed provisions. The language here employed, "that all banking shall be upon a specie basis," to some minds conveys one idea which to others never suggests itself. To say that all banks shall have a specie basis is to declare that a bank may issue fifty dollars of notes for circulation to one of specie, or that it shall issue no more paper than it may have specie on hand. The language itself will bear either construction—one as well as the other. The first construction would permit the establishment of the most dangerous system of banking that its wildest and least practical friends could desire, while the latter construction of the language—that the specie basis should equal the issues of paper—would be fatal to the establishment of any system of banking whatever.

Sir, the people, as far as I can judge, will reject the new Constitution with a hearty good will, if the business of banking shall by it be either prohibited or trammelled further than to secure the safety of the public against the evils that seem necessarily to pertain to it.

The section as it now stands has no practical safety in it. While you leave the entire basis upon which a bank depends—especially if it be specie—in the hands of the bank itself, you cannot feel certain that it will remain there for the protection of its creditors. Except upon occasions of making a display of its condition, or in some way exhibiting its business to the public gaze, a bank may be as bare of the means with which to redeem its notes and other obligations, as some gentlemen say they are of honesty of purpose; and, sir, when these exhibitions of strength are made, it is possible that the means paraded before the public are furnished for the occasion; like jewelry obtained at the pawnbrokers, with which to dazzle the eye of the beholder at one of fashion's resorts, to be returned when the show shall have ended, perhaps to be replaced by the habiliments of unmistakable poverty. Such things have been done, and may be again and again.

Other gentlemen have, during the discussion, illustrated the nature and principles of currency, and the duty of government in relation to it.

I shall direct my remarks to an examination of the practical necessity for, and influence of, a paper currency upon the business of the country.

I am not disappointed to find this subject exciting a deep interest in the Convention. Among the people it is certainly regarded with intense interest—by far outweighing in the public mind any other proposition connected with the amendment of the Constitution.

Sir, our prosperity under the Constitution of 1816 has been the subject of frequent eulogy, and has no parallel in the history of these States. In defiance of the reckless legislation which characterized a part of our history, the enterprise and unconquerable perseverance of our citizens have made our State pre-eminent in all that constitutes the strength and greatness of a commonwealth. But, sir, there has been a serious obstacle across the path of our industry; and it was to provide a remedy for, and a removal of, that obstacle that induced thousands of our people to vote for the call of this Convention. Our natural advantages cannot of themselves, if crippled by unwise systems of currency, enable us to reach that high degree of prosperity to which we have a right to aspire. Industry must be rewarded. As well attempt to nourish and develop a healthy and robust physical constitution with a meagre and unwholesome diet, as to attempt to cherish, build up, and maintain a high degree of commercial thrift, without the provision of a sufficient and safe currency.

As sure as that effect depends upon cause, so sure does the reward of labor depend mainly upon the maintenance of a circulation of money that shall be competent to represent the productions of that labor.

A safe and liberal currency is the sun, whose warmth and light stimulates the germ of commerce, and causes it to quicken and grow into a substantial condition of health and strength, giving free scope to the industry of the people, and placing within their reach the appliances of comfort so readily yielded in our country to industrious hands.

It seems almost unnecessary to argue about the propriety—nay, the necessity for paper money. We are not permitted to choose. The circumstances by which we are surrounded—the fact that nearly every other State has authorized the making and circulation of paper money, precludes us from refusing to employ it. We might determine not to establish banks, nor to allow the issuing of paper credits by individuals; but we had as well attempt to wall out a flood, as to assume the task of preventing its introduction among and employment by our people. Its superior convenience, the habits and customs, and, I may add, the absolute necessities of the business and trade of the country, will always be inducement enough to continue the use of it. To refuse to authorize banking in this State, is but to declare that our citizens shall be exposed to the uncertainties and dangers of employing paper money from abroad, of the character of which they cannot judge, and over which they can have no control, and to make them pay a heavy tribute in the shape of bank profits, to bankers of other States. Heavy losses have fallen upon our people, who, in the course of business, have been compelled to receive the notes of foreign banks; and we are not at liberty to pursue abstract notions on this subject, which can only result in additional injury and inconvenience to the country. By refusing to provide for a paper currency of our own, we invite from abroad that kind of currency having the least credit at home. Where the supply will admit of choice, the best of any commodity will be preferred, and the worst rejected; and while dependent upon other States, we could only expect to be permitted to employ what they reject or do not prefer. That class of banks least deserving of credit, is necessarily obliged to give precedence to others of better reputation, and to circulate their notes in remote districts where their character is not familiar, or where the sparseness of money drives the people to the use of everything in the shape of money not known to be absolutely worthless.

Sir, in my opinion, it is our duty to decide this question of banking, so as best to meet the circumstances by which we are surrounded. It is not expected that any system can be devised that will be free from faults; but we are forbidden, by every consideration of prudence and of interest, from banishing banks from the State. To do so, were to tie the hands of enterprise—to clog and cripple the industry of our citizens, and to drive out and keep out of the State that kind of commercial spirit that is the best auxiliary to the success of an agricultural people.

We are peculiarly fortunate in having for our guide and instruction the experience of the country in the different systems of banking. While Indiana has been unfortunate in her domestic policy in relation to many subjects, she has been comparatively fortunate in respect to banking. While the constitutional provisions on the subject were singularly loose, leaving to the Legislature all the details as connected with the institution of a State Bank, it is no more than truth to say that we mainly owe our good fortune to the high capacity and integrity of the men who have conducted its affairs.

But, sir, we are now prepared to avoid the principal evils that have attended former efforts to furnish a safe paper currency. We need not grope in the dark. The path of safety is well defined and lighted by the experience of our own and other States, so that we need not go astray.

Mr. President, I would have three main objects in view in defining the business of banking under our Constitution—the investment of capital sufficient to meet the demands of business—to so arrange that capital under separate control as to create a wholesome competition—and lastly, to provide the amplest security to the public against losses by insolvency of banks from any cause.

It needs no argument to prove that the capital and other facilities of the State Bank are altogether inadequate to accommodate, as it should be done, the business wants of our people. The practical impolicy of the system exhibits itself clearly in the comparative dearth of money accommodations, and, I may add, the extravagant profits of the single banking institution in the State, as shown by her own reports.

With respectable management, it could not be otherwise than that the State Bank should make enormous profits, as is shown in her large dividends, the unparalleled value of her stock in the market, and the rapid increase of the shares of stock arising from her surplus earnings. Money accommodations are too rare to go wanting long for a customer, upon the hardest terms. But, while some gentlemen see in these large earnings of the Bank only cause for gratulation, I think that I perceive much to deplore. It is only giving the subject a superficial examination to say that these extravagant earnings prove the correctness of the system. The same process of reasoning would prove that to be the most honorable and legitimate wealth which is accumulated by the heartless bartering of a Jewish pawn-broker, who lives only on the misfortunes of mankind, doling out the pittance that serves only to keep poverty from starving. Sir, it is not the speculator who pays these heavy profits. They ultimately fall upon the producing classes; and when you tell me that the State Bank has earned for the State a million of dollars, and has beside enriched her individual stockholders, you but say that she has coined the sweat and toil of the industry of our people, who have had no way to escape from the hard conditions of the money-lenders.

With a monopoly of the business of banking, and her inadequate capital so distributed as to create no competition among the several branches; a continual increase in the tide of trade in our State, with a doubling and trebling of the products of the soil, and the multiplication of the pursuits of industry ten times over, since the establishment of the Bank, how could it be otherwise than that the prosperity of the Bank should be very great; but in the system itself, exclusive as it is, there is no intrinsic security. Sir, I desire to see that condition of things brought about, that will permit the supply of capital to be equal to the demand for it. The true doctrine is that money should be found seeking employment, rather than that our people should be compelled to creep and cringe to the lender, to have it doled out, even for the most legitimate business purposes, as corn might be doled out in a time of famine, when the only hope is to scare away grim starvation, and at last to submit, because they cannot avoid it, to the hard exactions of the monopolist.

That is a false doctrine which would deny commercial facilities, on the ground that competition is dangerous to the pecuniary safety of individuals or communities. Sharp competition is the best security for a different result. It is that which compels, above every thing else in business matters, the strictest regard to prudence and general economy. With the knowledge that a given business occupation is full, and that all its avenues are filled by watchful tenants, we have the best assurance that other branches of employment will be sought out and occupied. But at any rate, sir, it is no part of the duty of government to assume the guardianship of its citizens, by limiting the right to engage in any honest business pursuit. When competition is open and unrestrained, we have the best assurance that real merit will be appreciated and rewarded, and that the relations of business with the wants of the country are of the healthiest character.

But, sir, upon whom principally falls the losses of an unsafe or inadequate currency? Undoubtedly, I answer, upon the agricultural and mechanical classes. Our country may and does abound in that kind of resolute and thorough-going enterprise, so characteristic of the American people. But a want of means—of money, has, and will continue, under the present system, to cramp and confine the efforts that may be made to develop the resources of our State, and extend her commerce. The granaries of our farmers may be full—their fields may groan under their weight of cereal wealth—their pastures may abound in animal productions; but, sir, they are often obliged to wait until "hope deferred maketh the heart sick," for the appearance of the foreign carrier of these surplus articles. This is eminently true of the interior portions of the State. Your next neighbor may have enterprise, and wealth too, in property; but a medium of exchange cannot be created by industry—and thus, sir, the produce is at the mercy of the buyer, who in the absence of competition claims his own terms. The dubious alternative is, to sell on credit—but too frequently resulting in serious loss and injury to the seller.

I make no war upon credit, Mr. President, but it is vastly preferable that such a condition of things shall be secured, as will answer the real business wants of the people. Why should a country, so rich in all the elements of substantial wealth, continue so utterly poor in the means of readily transferring property from hand to hand?

In view of the rapid improvement of our State, her vast means of production, and already great but growing facilities for transportation, it would be a kind of commercial suicide to tie ourselves down to a mere bartering in commodities.

Sir, it is expected that in any plan of banking to be devised by this body, the principle of providing security, on the part of banks, for the discharge of their obligations to the public, shall be fully recognized. It sounds strangely in my ear, that at this day, when experience has taught the country such bitter lessons, that any institution of the kind should be permitted to become a debtor to the public, with its obligations in the hands of the rich and poor, influencing, to the extent of thousands and millions, the pecuniary prosperity of the country, without having first provided the amplest security to its creditors.

The objection at first made to this proposition elsewhere, has been proved by actual trial to have no foundation. It was said by the friends of banks, that money would not be invested under such conditions; but this objection has given way. Capital has been freely invested under this restriction, elsewhere. None but they who deliberately plan a violation of faith in business transactions, will refuse to guarantee the performance of their obligations, when of an important character. How much more important that a corporation, amenable only to law, and not to public sentiment, (which is so imperative with individuals,) should guarantee its contracts, when millions may be the temptation to fail in compliance.

The object to be attained by the establishment of banks is not to create money, but it is to induce a concentration of capital, with a view to its employment in the accommodation of those who may from time to time need its aid in business transactions—to supply, for temporary periods, the means of purchase and transfer. Money, to be profitable to its owner, must be employed; and a favorite business with capitalists, is the loaning of money for an equivalent for the use of it. The borrower generally desires only a temporary accommodation, with the privilege of making an early re-payment. All experience proves that the opportunity to readily obtain these accommodations, is a valuable promoter of internal and external trade, and as a consequence, promotive of the thrift of a people who produce more than they consume, or who desire to convert their labor into articles which they cannot produce.

It is unsafe to leave unrestrained and unrestricted the business of supplying these inevitable wants of the country. It is right that government should permit these wants to be supplied, but also proper that protection shall be given to the unwary and unsuspecting, who might otherwise become the dupes of dishonesty and fraud.

Sir, the proposition to open the business of banking to competition, under careful restrictions, is greatly misunderstood and misrepresented. The subject is treated as though it was intended to inundate the country with an irredeemable trash; and gentlemen who denounce all banks because they are liable to mismanagement, are resisting efforts here making to prune away the dangerous features of the business as experience suggests. Sir, they in effect say that they prefer to have an exclusive system, depending for its safety mainly upon the integrity of the bankers, rather than to resort to one under which our paper circulation shall be represented, dollar for dollar, by securities of the most tangible character, to be placed in the hands of the State, as a trustee, and to be applied for the protection of the note-holder after the failure of the bank—when its capital shall be lost by misfortune or mismanagement. It is not intended to neglect any check or guard hitherto practiced in the establishment of banks. When an individual purchases property at the sale of a decedent's estate, on credit, it is customary to require approved security for the payment of the purchase money, without regard to the wealth or standing of the buyer; and this is done to guard against any possible misfortune that might happen, to disable the debtor. The interests of the estate are thus protected from injury. So, sir, should it be in the case of banks. Their obligations are in the hands of all classes. The failure of an institution of the kind falls with crushing weight upon the industry of the country, and we cannot too well guard our fellow citizens against injury, that only years of privation and industry can retrieve. It is no argument to say that the securities to be deposited in trust, may fluctuate in value. This may of course be true; but at last they remain a guarantee to the full extent of their value; and it will be the duty and province of the Legislature to provide that they shall, from time to time, be made fully equal to, or exceeding, the entire amount of notes in circulation.

Sir, I ask the friends of the present system to point out its intrinsic securities? Is it at all impossible that such a system may fail. I refer you to the instance of the State Bank of Illinois, which suddenly and unexpectedly made one of the most disastrous failures that has occurred in the western States. The only safety in such a system depends upon the integrity and capacity of the men who control it, and a fortunate state of circumstances that we have no right to build upon in our calculations for the future—hey may or they may not occur. The mutual liability of the branches is a desirable protection in a time of prosperity, and not objectionable where there is an identity of interest, at any time; but, sir, when a period of general embarrassment comes upon the country—when a commercial panic invades our business circles, when mutual confidence in pe-uniary affairs takes its flight from the people, the storm will beat with perhaps equal violence upon all the branches, and then, instead of sustaining each other the country will have cause to rejoice if the entire institution be not prostrated.

We have evidence abounding in the country every where, that the means of the State Bank are unequal to the demands of business. One half our circulation is made up of the paper of foreign banks. No gentleman denies this. In some instances, perhaps in many, the branches are agents for the putting in circulation, the notes of banks situated far distant from us; that may be safe, but they are beyond our knowledge or control; that may not fail, but will certainly drain from us thousands and thousands of dollars yearly, in the shape of bank profits.

While we are providing for an increase of banking capital, let us secure a separation of interests, so that competition in supplying the demand for such accommodations may, by possibility, grow up. Give not, or rather do not continue in the hands of a single directory, such a fearful power as is that, to control the financial prosperity of this great State. I trust that this Convention will not provide for a monied league—a cordon of banks, to be placed at all the prominent business points, having no diversity of interest, but bound together by the indissoluble ties of mutual gain and profit, to rule with more than Russian despotism the commercial interests of our people.

That non-resident persons might, to some extent, become our bankers under a secured system, may be true; but this is rather an objection against our poverty than to the system itself. If we possess the means to meet the demand for banking capital we shall be entitled to its profits; but if we look to others for this capital we ought not so object, while we enjoy the advantage of a liberal and safe currency, that the dividends should go to those who furnish the capital. The same objection could as well be made to the prosecution of our works of public improvement. The money with which they are making comes largely from abroad, and of course the dividends should go to those whose money pays for the work, let them reside where they may. But, sir, the lion's share of the profits of Railroads and other improvements, fall to our people. They can count their profits in the shape of increase prices for their property—a home market, and innumerable advantages that go to fill up the measure of their wealth and comfort.

Sir, the advantages of valuable institutions to the general prosperity of a people, are not all in the shape of paltry declarations of profit upon money invested. They are rather to be found in a general condition of convenience and comfort, and adaptation of means to the various wants of society. Mr. President, gentlemen have dwelt with great earnestness upon the evils of free banking in New York. They have paraded before us the long list of failures that occurred under the general banking law of 1838, and declare that they are the necessary result of the system. But, sir, these gentlemen do themselves and the subject injustice. The fatal error of the law of 1838 was, in permitting the stocks of all the States to be deposited as securities, not doubting but that the honor and faith of all the States would be kept by a regular compliance with every obligation, and the consequent maintenance of the value of their stocks. But the events of the next few years proved otherwise. In the general wreck of State credit, the securities of many of the banks were reduced to a mere nominal value, and this, together with the fact that the banks were not required to keep a particular proportion of specie on hand for the redemption of their circulation, involved their creditors in much loss.

But, sir, in her new Constitution, New York has applied the remedy for this danger, and her present banking law, permitting the deposit of no other stocks than those of New York and the United States, and making the stock-holders individually liable, and securing to the note holder preference in payment, over all other creditors, serves to give her present system a degree of solidity and safety, unknown to the banks of any other States. But there is still an objectionable feature in the New York plan of banking. It is not, however, attributable to her Constitution, but is the fault of the law. I refer to the omission to require a certain proportion of specie capital to be retained by the banks, which would impart additional confidence, and effectually guard against the dangers of fluctuating securities. The system of independent banking in Ohio is, in this respect, superior to that of New York. There, while the best of securities—Ohio and United States stocks—are deposited to the entire amount of the circulation, the banks are required to keep up their specie basis to the proportion of $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. of the circulation. This feature I desire to see in any independent system of banking that we may adopt.

It is suggested that in case of a failure of a bank whose circulation is secured as we propose, the note holders would be shaved to death before the securities could be converted into cash with which to redeem. This must be a groundless fear. With a full knowledge that the notes of a failing bank are fully secured, it is not likely that they would suffer depreciation, but would continue to command confidence, and go on fulfilling their office, as safe representatives of property, to be finally redeemed, without delay, too, under the trusteeship of the State, without involving any who may receive them in loss. How different, sir, with the bank which offers no other means of payment to its creditors than what may be found in the capital stock, depleted as it may be, by a succession of disasters that menace every institution of the kind. From the first breathing of a suspicion approaching trouble to it, a scene of fluctuation and uncertainty commences. Its note holders become the prey of the brokers, who fatten upon the fears and suspense of the creditors of the bank, and after hanging thus, by the eye-lids as it were, sometimes for months, sometimes for years, the scene finally closes in the utter failure of the bank, and the ruin of those who hold its obligations. Sir, we want a system that shall secure the confidence of the country in all seasons and in all changes. None other should receive the sanction of this body.

It is objected that after the indebtedness of the State and General Government shall have been reduced so as not to afford securities in that shape, the independent system of banking must become impracticable from the want of a basis. If these were the only securities that could with safety, be adopted, the objection would be good, but fortunately, we may safely depend upon other securities, after the lapse of fifteen or twenty years. When our State shall have become populous and wealthy, and the opportunities for the investment of money shall be curtailed by the completion of all necessary internal improvements and the appropriation of the public lands by private purchase or otherwise, then the bonds of individuals bearing interest and amply secured by mortgages upon productive real estate, would as certainly command the confidence of capitalists, and be as readily convertible into specie for the redemption of the notes of a failing bank, as any other securities whatever.

The State Bank is an institution belonging to the people, it is said. What do we learn from the report of the bank itself? Why, sir, that in twelve branches there are but six hundred and sixty-six individual stockholders! and we are by no means to suppose that they are all citizens of Indiana. This small number of stockholders are distributed as follows: In the branch at Indianapolis forty-four, Richmond seventy, Lawrenceburg forty-seven, Madison nineteen, New Albany eighty, Vincennes sixty-three, Bedford fifty-nine, Terre Haute forty-seven, Lafayette fifty, Fort Wayne fifty-one, South Bend twenty-three, and Michigan City thirteen. And, sir, of the debts due the institution we find that over a million and a quarter is due from her officers and stockholders either as principals or sureties. Thus, sir, we see that the favors and immediate advantages of the bank are not as universally diffused as gentlemen would have us believe.

It has been claimed as a distinguishing and meritorious feature of the present system that the circulation of the State Bank is found to be remarkably equal at the various periods of making reports of her condition; but when we come to examine the cause of these slight fluctu-tuations it reflects no merit whatever. The cause is readily found to depend upon her meager capital when compared to the wants of business. The charter fixes the proportion that the issues shall bear to the specie on hand, and, sir, the bank has but to choose among the multitude of applicants for loans—upon terms dictated by herself, and can have no difficulty in circulating at any and all seasons the last note that she is permitted by the charter to issue. Sir, there is regularity in her circulation, but it results from necessity—the necessity imposed by the incapacity of the bank itself and the business wants of the country which can have no choice but that of submission to this condition of things, except through the interposition of the Constitution itself.

I do not think it safe however to confine ourselves exclusively to any one system of banking. If all the bonds of Indiana could be obtained to use as securities they would not alone be sufficient, and even now I consider it doubtful whether the bonds of the United States could be procured to any great extent. They are the most valuable securities known in the money markets, and those having sixteen or seventeen years to run are now selling at 16 to 18 per cent. above par. Their extraordinary value is not likely to permit them to pass into the hands of our people for banking purposes; and besides, sir, the whole amount of outstanding bonds of the United States government is reported at less than ninety millions, affording even with the bonds of debt paying States an amount altogether insufficient to secure the banking issues of the several States that are likely to adopt the secured system of banking.

We need not fear the employment of too great a capital in banking where there can be no fiction in the systems adopted. Capitalists are remarkable for their wariness and timidity. They will not embark their money when the prospect of profit is not flattering. Like water, if left at liberty, capital will find its level, and the demand and supply will adjust themselves to each other.

I desire to see such an arrangement of our Constitution as will permit the establishment of a State Bank and branches differently constituted from the present one in many respects, and a system of independent banks; but let these grand features of competition and ample security for the protection of the creditors of banks be fully provided in each system.

Our sister State, Ohio, after having been scourged thoroughly with the evils necessarily belonging to banking where no other security than mere stock contributions as capital are provided, has found safety in the combination of State and independent banking, both of which are well secured. The success of their operations for several years, and the report recently made of the condition of the Ohio banks, is sufficient evidence of the practicability of their plan. We are fortunate in having so safe a system in a neighboring State to whom we are so much indebted for a circulation of money.

Mr. President, I will say in conclusion that we have but too many drains upon the industry of our people already. Now, at a time of comparative ease and prosperity, we have a universal complaint of the sparseness of the currency. Taxes are high, and are to be necessarily increased. The drains upon our resources for the purpose of interest on the public debt will constantly deplete the current of our money circulation, and it is no violent supposition to say that we may yet be seriously embarrassed by this cause at a time of failure in crops or other misfortunes. A wise system of State currency is a main auxiliary to individual and public prosperity, and such a one we should seek anxiously to establish. Give us a system that shall have guards at every point. Exact securities of the most available character to the full amount of the circulation, so that ultimately there can be no loss to the note holders—provide for the registry by an officer of State of every note issued, so as to guard against fraudulent and over issues—make stockholders liable in their private fortunes for the debts of their bank, and in that way secure the utmost caution in their management—give the bill holder preference in payment over all other creditors, because he is an involuntary creditor—one from necessity in the pursuit of his ordinary business, the country is most interested in his protection—forbid over issues in proportion to the specie capital paid in and remaining undiminished—fix the minimum capital of banks, so that they may be established only where business really calls for them, and subject the business to taxation so that the burthens of government shall be equal.

This may be free banking, but its freedom consists in its equality of privileges, and its freedom from the dangers that have often afflicted the country in the shape of a currency of fluctuating value and uncertain credit.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope this section will be re-committed; and why, sir? I will briefly say that if we are to have banking at all, free or partial—for that is the struggle here—I trust that there will be not only an amount of specie equal to one-fourth of the amount of issues, but an equally reliable and sufficient basis for the whole amount of issues. That, sir, is what I want. I am not very partial to any species of banking, but I utterly protest against any rotten system that may be forced upon the State, whether it be general or partial. I prefer the general system to the partial, only when it is upon a right basis—for I desire that all citizens shall stand upon the same equality in all business.

It was said here yesterday, by a member, that the free bankers were trembling in their shoes —that their knees were shaking, and their legs giving way under them; and that they would soon tumble, with their favorite system, to the ground. I regretted much to hear such a remark. To say that the friends of equality and of equal rights were trembling in their shoes—that the power of self-interest and concentrated wealth was so strong here as to make the lovers of freedom and equal rights waver in the defense of their principles, was an assertion as uncalled for as it was untrue. I regret that there should be a man in Indiana who would proclaim such a sentiment. How dares a man rise up at this age of the world, and demand at our hands exclusive privileges—how dares he come with his deformed heart, if not head, into a body of this kind, and ask a privilege for himself and his neighbors, which may not be granted to others? Sir, let me say as an expression of my deliberate judgment—and it is the cool and unbiased opinion I have long entertained; that any man, I care not who he may be—beggar, priest, angel, or devil—who shall ask more for himself than he will concede to his neighbors, and to all his fellow-citizens in a State, is a thief and a robber. He can be nothing else, and the man who will yield, unless forced to yield—the man who will tamely submit to allow another to enjoy an advantage or privilege, which, as an citizen, he may not enjoy, is a coward and a craven, and deserves the lash of the slave-driver on his back. He is a coward and a craven, who will willingly reside in a State which does not mete out to its citizens equal justice. He is a thief and a robber, who will ask it, and a coward and a craven who will submit to it. All that the free bankers have asked, was, to have the people in their connection with banks, to be placed upon an equal footing. Let this section be re-committed, with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from —, and you will have all safe and all secure.

Mr. MURRAY said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: I know the Convention is weary of debate, and that scarcely anything can be said without traveling over ground that has been pre-occupied.

I will, therefore, confine myself to a few practical remarks, and as it is my custom always to be brief, I shall occupy the floor but a few minutes. We have had enough of theory, though ingeniously presented and ably supported. It is time that we find some ground on which we can unite to lay a sound foundation for the currency of the State.

That we must have something to represent the value of our vast productions beyond what the precious metals are capable of representing, is apparent to all who have any commerce with the world. The most eminent orator on Political Economy, show that there is less than 400,000,000, of specie in circulation. This does not include bullion, to be sure.

Ingots of gold and silver do not enter into the common business of life. The only question then is, whether we shall use bank paper or private credit, to supply the deficiency of metallic currency. For one, I protest most solemnly, on relying upon credit to purchase the stock and agricultural products of the farmer. Men who purchase on credit, are seldom so prudent in their operations, as when they have actually paid their money for the property on which they operate. I do not speak at random. It is an admitted fact. There is a daring adventure exhibited by more who handle public funds, or the money of the many entrusted to them in small sums, that does not prevail so generally with men who operate on their own capital, actually paid for the articles in which they deal.

This leads to frequent failures, and who then suffers? Why, sir, the whole farming interest suffers, and often suffers most painfully. It is known as a general rule that small farmers do not, under favorable circumstances, lay up more than one hundred dollars a year, beyond current expenses. The farmer moves forward through the season, with a prudence and uniformity unknown to the merchant and speculator. His industry is unceasing; late and early, through heat and cold, he pursues the even tenor of his way, literally earning his bread by the sweat of his brow; and when the season closes—before the year dies away—he is careful to settle his account with the merchant, the mechanic, the doctor, and, above all, with the printer and the school master.

He is happy in his family and his home. The day school, the singing school, and innocent conviviality, pass away the cold winter with its long bright evenings of merry hours. It is a picture the rich and the proud, may well envy. But, Mr. President, let a system of credit be introduced, (and you must introduce it if we have no Banks,) and how changed is the scene of this rural comfort. The purchaser of their produce is unlucky—he fails to pay, and the farmer is disappointed. He disappoints the merchant, the mechanic, and all the trades and professions he has dealt with. His family are coarser clad—the school is neglected—conviviality must be restrained. The chords of sweet music are unstrung—every comfort is contracted—the strictest economy introduced, and the most vigilant labor resorted to, to repair the loss. And, Mr. President, we must not look upon this as an isolated case. What one suffers, all suffer. The calamity and the desolation spreads over all the land.

This, Mr. President, is no fancy sketch. It is a misfortune that has often occurred, and will often occur, where the practice obtains of selling the stock and produce of the country upon credit. I therefore enter my solemn protest against placing the country in a situation where we shall be compelled to resort to credit. Nothing is more common than the failure of the most competent and prudent speculators. The farmer claims not their profits—he should bear their loss. We must then have a paper currency, and it must have a locality. Its name, its charter, and restrictions are, I apprehend, all that we have to reconcile. A large majority, I think, see clearly the absolute necessity of a paper currency, but upon their details, I know we are unhappily divided, and in order to heal our divisions, we must surrender for the public good, a portion of individual opinion. I hope we ever do this. I feel unwilling to leave it an open question, because I think we can save much to the State by settling it now. The same differences of opinion will probably exist in the Legislature, that exists here. We have devoted much time to the subject, and we have it in our power to prevent the discord and waste of time, which will follow its discussion in the Legislature. It is very important that the currency of the State should be settled as early and as permanently as possible, and I am desirous now to mark its bounds and make it a part of the Constitution. For myself, I cannot see the monstrous objections to the present State Bank, which others do, although I can see defects in it, which I would remedy hereafter, by more careful guards and restrictions. It is said to be a monstrous and odious monopoly. What is its office, and what has it done to make it so monstrous and odious? Its office is to provide a sound currency for the State—to loan money to its citizens, and deal in bills of exchange. Has it not fulfilled its office! It may be charged with partiality in its loans and some extortion in bills of exchange. To some extent, I fear this is so, and these are some of the defects that should as far as possible, be remedied. But the Bank, in addition to a sound circulation, and furnishing facilities for purchasing the produce and stock of the country, has saved near $100,000 for the school fund. I should think this ought to atone for some sins, if it has committed any.

But, Mr. President, any association of capital becomes, to some extent, a monopoly. All manufactories driven by machinery, monopolize the business they are engaged in. The spinning-wheel, the hand-loom, the making of nails, threshing of grain, even sowing, reaping, and mowing, all these, and ten thousand other things have been monopolized by machinery. But who complains that they are not beneficial to society? Who would strike machinery out of existence, because it monopolizes business? Private individuals sometimes become monopolists, in the most odious sense of the word. I remember once the Kanawha salt was monopolized. At another time the flour in the city of New York. And so odious were both these cases held, that in the first instance, the life of one of the principle actors was taken, and in the other, the mob collected and threw the flour out of a fourth story into the street, until it was virtually kneed deep, and the poor took it without money or price. The public journals teemed with the event, far and near. Monopolies can be created with money, any where, and for any purpose. Our business is to improve upon the past, not annihilate enterprise and machinery.

I would not, therefore, restrain the Legislature from re-chartering the State Bank under proper restrictions, if they shall think best. I have not full confidence in free banking. I have seen so many plausible systems fail, that I am unwilling to give up a sound currency until we have proved free banking. I am very willing to vote for a judicious system of free banking, partly because I am willing to try the experiment, but more especially because I am sensible my constituents call for it.

I hope, Mr. President, that we shall soon compromise this matter, and close this exciting subject upon which such singular variety of opinions prevail.

We cannot expect any system to be made perfect. Objections may be found to any system. Perfection belongs not to man. Let us then adopt a system which the experience of the past and the best light we have before us may suggest, as the safest and best for the citizens of Indiana. If we neglect to do this, the paper of other States will circulate among us, and the people of other States will monopolize our trade, or we must resort, as I have said, to private credit, which seldom fails to carry ruin in its train.

Mr. BIDDLE. I would inquire of the Chair whether I can withdraw the additional instructions I offered?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. BIDDLE. I withdraw them then.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the instructions I offered, also; and move the following instead: add after the words "specie basis," in the section as amended by the gentleman from Dearborn, the words "for the redemption of all notes issued."

Mr. COLFAX moved to amend Mr. Owen's instructions, by adding "such specie basis shall be to the full amount of their circulation, or the difference between the two shall be made up by ample security for the redemption of the bills in specie, to be deposited with some officer of State."

Mr. DOBSON. I think it would be as well not to re-commit this section. I would say to the friends of the section, to stand just where you are, and let the battle wage on until we find we are overcome by superior numbers. It does seem to me that the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) has not given to this section his usual calm and deliberate consideration. The word "basis," he thinks, means anything or nothing; at any rate, its meaning does not seem to be clearly understood. Let him go to the people and ask them what basis means, and they will begin to think about the "basis" of their log cabins, and that it must be as wide and as long as the top, in order to support the superstructure. And just that wide, in my opinion, should be this bank basis. The people are not so ignorant about this matter as gentlemen may suppose, and they will want a basis sufficiently wide to support the superstructure, or they will reject it; they want a solid foundation for their cabins, and nothing short of that will satisfy them for banks. The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Dunn,) threw out a threat, that, by the free bankers combining with the no bank men, they could put anything into the Constitution they wanted; but I thought the gentleman let his zeal run beyond his discretion, if he thinks that such a combination could fix free banking upon the State.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. We will do it.

Mr. DOBSON. If you can, I know you will; but will the hard money men vote with you? If they are consistent, they will not. In regard to the triumph the gentleman alludes to, does the gentleman remember another triumph! they supposed the State Bank men to be defeated when the section was adopted which provided that the State hereafter should not borrow money for any purpose whatever. I then stated that we would reach another fork in the path, and then we would see who would carry the torch, and who would be in the dark. Now, as to this matter of triumph, I apprehend there is no true cause for any particularly triumphant manifestation. We are all attempting to discharge our duty to our constituents, and when one party of us have been beaten, the other should not rejoice, and when we are charged with being bought up, we might as well turn round and say that foreign bond holders had bought up a few of these distinguished free bankers. But no man would say that men were bought up. If any one here would act so, I would not own him as a slave, if he were given to me.

Why not, sir, pass this section? This is not the last day of the Convention; neither is it the last thing that will be urged upon the Convention. We can pass this section, and then proceed with the other sections. There are several other sections before us on their second reading pertaining to this subject, which may be passed with but little difficulty. Let the Convention say that all banking shall be done upon a specie basis. I have, from the first, been in favor of it. I think the people are in favor of it. This free bank system is something like an Irish potato crop—never worth anything until the tops are dead and they are dug up, and you come to the roots; and then, too, like the potato crop for the last few years, may be subject to the rot. [Laughter.] If they depart from a specie basis, the moment their notes are presented, they break; and what is such a system, but one of credit, based upon credit. Sir, the system is wrong—rapidly wrong, and the people will never tolerate it. I am opposed to it, because it is not good until after it is dead; and I desire some good to result from it while it has life. The idea that, the specie used as a basis must be deposited at the seat of government, is a great incongruity. If I should want to get a five dollar note redeemed in specie, I should dislike the idea of having to travel from a remote part of the State, to come here merely for that purpose; it would be rather too expensive a bill of exchange. [Laughter.] The people all over the State want pocket change occasionally, and that too, without having to come here to get it. I hope this section will be passed, and that then we will proceed with the consideration of the remaining sections of the article on banking.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I move to lay the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment, on the table.

Mr. COLFAX. That will carry the section also to the table.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I will withdraw that motion, then, and move to lay the amendment to the instructions on the table.

Mr. COLFAX. I would inquire of the Chair, whether that motion carried the section with it? The PRESIDENT. It will not.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I withdraw my motion to lay upon the table for the present.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. We read that Jonah was in the whale's belly three days and three nights—that the floods compassed him about, the billows and the waves passed over him, and the weeds were wrapped about his head. As pitiable as was the condition of poor Jonah, it was not more so than is that of the subject of banking, which this Convention has now had under consideration for more than twice three days and three nights. Truly may we say of this important subject, that the billows and the waves have been passing over it, that the depths are closing round about it, and that the weeds are rapidly accumulating about its head.

I regret, sir, that a subject of so much importance to the people could not have been discussed in a calmer and kinder spirit. We should remember that we have now to settle one of the most delicate as well as one of the most difficult questions that has or will come before us—one that affects the value of property, the operations of trade, and the business of the country in all its varied and complicated relations. I am deeply sensible of my inability to do justice to this question, and I do not now arise so much for the purpose of discussing it, as to call the attention of the Convention to the position the different parties here occupy towards each other, and to say that unless a spirit of concession should prevail, and some terms of compromise can be agreed upon, we may contend here forever without arriving at any useful result. Neither the free bank nor the State Bank party have a majority of this House, while either of them united with the no-bank party, have a majority. Yesterday, the friends of the State Bank system appeared to be greatly elated with their success in carrying a provision which they deemed peculiarly obnoxious to the friends of free banking. This victory was won by the aid of the hard money men. The State Bank men are delighted with their new allies, but they should remember that these allies can be drawn from them at any moment the free bankers may choose to hold out to them an inducement to desert. These hard money men, like the old Swiss Guards, will fight on whichever side they see the specie dollar, and are ready to-day to turn their swords against their friends of yesterday, if thereby they can prevent all banking in this State. The plain truth, then, is, that unless the friends of the two systems of banking can agree upon some terms of compromise, we shall have no banks of any kind, because there is an evident determination on the part of the friends of each system that the other shall not be adopted as an exclusive system, and that rather than the system they oppose should be adopted to the exclusion of the one they advocate, they will unite with the no-bank party, and insert in the Constitution a positive prohibition of all banking. Now, sir, I should regret such a result as this extremely. Well regulated banking institutions, in my opinion, contribute greatly to the business and general prosperity of a State. Moreover, we are surrounded by the banks of other States, which will furnish our people with a currency, if we fail to do so ourselves. The convenience of business requires that the people should have paper money, and paper money they will have, in despite of all the laws and Constitutional provisions that may be adopted to prevent it. The only question, then, is, whether it is better for us to provide for the supply of such a currency through banking institutions of our own, or leave that supply to be furnished by the banks of other States. It appears to me to be obvious, that it is better to have a currency issued by banks over which we can exert a control, and the value of whose issues we can at all times have the means of ascertaining, than a currency issued by institutions not amenable to us in any respect.

I advocate the permission of banking not for the benefits that may accrue to the banker, but for the facilities banking affords to trade. The great mass of the people of our State are engaged in agriculture, and I rejoice in the prospect that Indiana will shortly become one of the most productive agricultural States in the Union. Every facility that can be given to those engaged in purchasing and carrying to market the productions of the soil, is a direct benefit to the farmer. Before the establishment of the State Bank, the farmers were compelled to a great extent, to sell their surplus products on credit. If the trader was unfortunate in his speculations, the farmers who had sold him on credit had either to sustain the loss, or suffer a great delay of payment. Now the case is very different. Those who deal largely in hogs, grain, and other staple articles, if they need credit, do not ordinarily ask or expect to receive it from the farmers, but they procure accommodations from the banks—from the men whose business it is to give credit. If the produce dealer is unfortunate in his operations, the loss or delay of payment now falls upon the banks, or the endorsers of the debtor, and the farmers are happily relieved from all embarrassments on that account. By means of bank loans, a very useful class of persons are enabled to engage in business, who otherwise would be unable to do so. Men of honesty, energy, prudence, and capacity for business, though without capital of their own, can procure money from banks for the purpose of engaging in trade. This they take on short loans, invest in the products of the country, and out of the proceeds of the sale of these products, discharge the loans. Such facilities of course increase the number of purchasers, increase the competition in trade, and thereby secures to the farmer a better price for his surplus products. If you confine the business of the country to those operating solely upon their own capital, we will experience a sudden and great depreciation in the price of property of every kind. Sir, in my opinion, no class of our people are so much interested in the establishment of a good, safe, and sound system of banking, as the farmers; and as they constitute the great mass of our population, we should be especially careful not to deprive them of the benefits of a good system, nor force upon them the evils of a bad one.

Of the two systems of banking under discussion my impressions are decidedly in favor of the free bank system, and if I have to vote for one system to the exclusion of the other, I shall vote for free banks. It appears to me to be as safe a system as has ever been in operation, and that it can be made as entirely safe as it is possible to make any system that is dependent upon human agency for carrying on its operations. Under such a system, any person or association of persons would be permitted to issue their bills to circulate as money upon depositing with some officer of State ample security for the redemption in specie of all their bills on presentation at the counter of the banker. It would be required that all the bills previous to their issue, should be registered by the officer holding the security, and that they should not exceed in amount, the market value, nor the par value of the security deposited. Now if ample security for the redemption of the notes is deposited beyond the control of the banker, with an officer of State who is to hold the same in trust for the benefit of the bill holders, I cannot see very well how the bill holders are to sustain any loss. But what is "ample security?" I should regard the stocks of the United States and of the State of Indiana as ample security. The stocks of the United States are now above par. They must continue to be good while our Union exists, and I see no occasion for regarding the dissolution of the Union as an event at all probable or scarcely possible. But should the union of these States be dissolved, in the general ruin that would follow the injury to our banking institutions would be considered a matter of very trifling importance. The stocks of Indiana taken at their market price, or with such a margin for depreciation as the Legislature might deem prudent, would be good security, because the money issued on that security would circulate among our own people. Every citizen, that held a bank bill, would be directly interested in sustaining the credit of the State, because he would feel that any great depreciation in the value of our stocks might affect the value of his money. Those stocks will not depreciate so long as the interest on them is punctually paid, and therefore so long as we are faithful in the performance of our just obligations, the money issued upon the security of our stocks would be good. Those stocks are now, and so long as the interest is punctually paid, will continue to be, readily convertible into specie at a fair price in the city of New York and the other principal cities of the United States. I trust we are to hear no more of repudiation in Indiana, and that our stocks will take and maintain that position in the market which the bonds of a State so rapidly increasing in wealth and population are entitled to hold. But gentlemen say, that if we bank upon the security of the bonds of Indiana we are banking upon our own indebtedness. This would be true if the State should undertake to bank upon her own bonds, but it is a very different case when citizens of the State undertake so to use her bonds. If I owned one hundred thousand dollars of the bonds of Indiana I do not think I should regard myself as a very poor man, or grumble about paying my portion of taxes for the discharge of the State debt. If I desired to raise money for any purpose, I think I would be able to do so without much difficulty either by the hypothecation or sale of my bonds, and if I desired to issue bank bills I should think my bonds ought to be regarded by the State of Indiana as very good security for their redemption. I would say to the State, with great confidence, "if you will keep up the credit of your bonds, I will keep up the credit of my bills." The bonds of the United States and this State are the only securities I would be willing to receive if I were now, as a member of the Legislature, called to vote on the passage of a law providing for free banking. But these bonds will, after a while, be paid off, and therefore, it is improper for us in this Constitution to designate them as the ample, and only ample securities. It is sufficient for the Constitution to say that ample security shall be required, and leave it to the wisdom of future legislators to say what securities shall be deemed sufficient. The Legislature, undoubtedly, would provide in any general banking law, that the banker should deposit additional security whenever that was considered necessary, or cease banking operations.

The adoption of a system of free banking secured in whole or in part on the bonds of our State, would have a tendency to bring our bonds home and gradually work them into the hands of our own citizens. If this result could be accomplished, it would certainly prove a very beneficial one. We are now paying an interest of two hundred thousand dollars per annum on these bonds, and after the first of January 1853 that interest will amount to three hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars per annum. Nearly all our bondholders reside out of this State, and many of them are residents of Europe. This interest is a very heavy drain upon us, and it certainly would be a great relief to our currency and business, if any considerable part of it should become payable to our own citizens. And here permit me to say, that a currency secured by a deposit of the bonds of the State, might with propriety be made receivable in the payment of taxes and all debts due the State. This would give additional credit to the currency and would make the Legislature and officers of State particularly careful that the security deposited should be amply sufficient for the redemption of the circulation.

The friends of an exclusive State Bank system charge us with being in favor of issuing paper money upon a paper basis, and in their zeal to prevent the adoption of so monstrous a system, they yesterday, with the aid of their strange allies, passed an amendment to the section under consideration, which, if it has any substantial meaning, would embarrass their system quite as much as it would the free bank system. That amendment requires that "All banking in this State shall be on a specie basis, actually paid in." Now, I would be obliged to any of the gentlemen who voted for that amendment, if they would inform me precisely what it means. Does it mean that the banks shall issue no greater amount in bills than they have specie in their vaults? If it does, it effectually prevents banking on any system, and I cannot understand why the friends of the State Bank have any occasion to congratulate themselves particularly on its adoption. But if it means that the specie basis may be less than the amount of the circulation, then I would like to know how much less, or who is to decide the question? Shall one dollar in specie be a basis for the circulation of two and a half, or two hundred and fifty dollars in bills? This amendment either means too much, or it means nothing at all. I voted against it because it is one of those indefinite expressions that are always dangerous, and should be especially avoided is so important an instrument as the Constitution of a State. We do not know what construction might be given to it by the courts, and for that reason, if for no other, the amendment should not have been adopted. The language of a Constitution ought to be so plain as to prevent all controversy about its meaning. That amendment is a "weed", a pernicious weed. I am sorry it is wrapped about poor Jonah's head, and hope that it will yet be removed. No one here has advocated, and certainly I shall not advocate, any system of banking that does not require the banker to redeem his bills in gold and silver, whenever they are presented at his counter for redemption. If he always does that his specie basis is sufficient, and if he does not his basis is insufficient, no matter what your Constitution or laws may say on the subject. As to what per cent. of the circulation should be kept on hand in specie for its redemption, that is a question depending upon too many circumstances to admit of any fixed rule. If the bills have the confidence of the community and enter into general circulation, a small per cent. of specie will be sufficient; but if the contrary is the case, the basis will have to be increased to the amount of the circulation. If the banker is required to give ample security for the redemption of his circulation, and if on failure to redeem he forfeits valuable privileges, self interest will make him very careful about the sufficiency of the specie basis. There is nothing in the charter of our State Bank that requires one dollar in specie to be kept on hand for the redemption of her notes. The charter required a certain amount of specie to be paid in, in the organization of the several branches, but it did not require that it should be kept in.

The State Board of Directors of the Bank have an order that forbids the branches from keeping out a circulation averaging over twice and half the amount of specie on hands. I think the free banks could live up to an order of that kind, and if that is what you mean by a specie basis, say so in direct terms, and let us have no further controversy about it. The free bankers will not only pay in, and what is of more importance, keep in a specie basis of two-fifths of their circulation, but they will give what the State Bank has never been required to do, ample security for the redemption, in specie, of their entire circulation. It appears to me that it would be difficult to get up a panic that would occasion a heavy run upon banks so constituted. If an alarm should be excited about the safety of any of our branch banks, such a run would take place because the rule is, first come first served, and the bill holders would know that when the specie was exhausted they would have to wait for the redemption of their bills until the assets of the bank could be made available. But under the free banking system the bill holders would know that whenever the specie on hand was exhausted, an officer of State who held a security for the redemption of the bills, beyond the control of the banker, would convert that security into cash, and cause the bills to be promptly redeemed at the counter of the banker.

But the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) has discovered that the free banking system is a monopoly, because none but the rich can engage in it. It is true, sir, that men who have no money had better not experiment in banking, for if they do no harm to themselves, they are very sure to do harm to others. Every man is not able to own a valuable farm, or erect valuable mills. Are those who do own valuable farms or mills monopolists? According to the gentleman's mode of reasoning he is himself a monopolist, because he occupies a seat in this Convention which another man earnestly sought for but could not obtain. The shares of stock in free banks may be fixed at fifty dollars, or even as low as ten dollars, if that is thought desirable. In this respect the free banking system can be made as liberal as any other system.

The free bank system has, in my opinion, been very unfairly discussed by its opponents, and in many respects has been grossly misrepresented. They refer us to the general banking law of New York, adopted in 1838, and show that a great number of banks organized under that law, failed to redeem their issues, and say that it is the system the friends of free banks wish to establish in this State. Under that law the stocks of any of the States, and mortgages of real estate were receivable as security for the redemption of the issues. The bonds of Indiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi were taken as security for the circulation. It was not then supposed that a sovereign State would fail to sustain her credit. New York has learned better since, and profiting by her experience, now receives no securities but the bonds of the United States, her own bonds, and mortgages, to a very limited extent, on real estate at two-fifths of its valuation. Since this amendment of her laws the system works admirably, as is shown by the reports of her comptrollers. Extracts have been read here from the reports of Mr. Fillmore and Mr. Hunt that ought to silence all cavil on this subject. We may profit by the experience of New York, and may adopt the latest improvements in her system. No one here has advocated the adoption of a general banking law like that of 1838.

But, sir, I find I am extending my remarks on this subject much further than I had intended. I would not desire, even if it were possible, that our Constitution should establish the free banking system, as an exclusive system. I shall be satisfied, if the way is left open for the adoption of such a system, when the people desire its adoption. The subject has not been generally discussed among the people, and the system is not generally understood by them. I feel great confidence that it will bear investigation, and that it will grow in popular favor, as its provisions become generally known and understood. The people are naturally jealous of all propositions affecting the currency of the country. They have good reason to be so. They have suffered enough from experiments in banking, to make them cautious about the adoption of new systems. I would not try to cram down their unwilling throats any system, no matter how good I might consider it. If you do not close the door against free banking, I for one am willing to wait until the people are prepared for its adoption.

Nor, sir, do I desire to incorporate in the Constitution a provision prohibitory of the establishment of a State Bank and Branches. I do not know what may be the condition of the monetary affairs of the country at the expiration of the present charter of the State Bank. We are now on the flood tide of prosperity. But the tide will ebb, and that, perhaps, before long. Sagacious men now predict it, and prudent men are preparing for it. It might add greatly to our difficulties, if the State Bank should be compelled to close up its business at a time of general pecuniary embarrassment. I wish, therefore, to leave the question of the re-charter of the State Bank, with certain modifications and restrictions, or the establishment of some banking institution with branches, also an open question, to be decided by future Legislators as they may deem best for the interests of the country. In my opinion, a very unjust and unfounded clamor has been raised here against the State Bank. The gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) with a strength of lungs and an energy of manner peculiarly his own, has denounced it as rotten to the core, and those engaged in its management as but little better than thieves and robbers. Now, sir, I believe that if I were to seek, even without the aid of a lighted candle, I could find among the conductors of the State Bank, as many honest, respectable, worthy, and useful men, as can be found among those who so loudly denounce them. Difficult questions of finance cannot be settled by the language of denunciation. Such language may irritate, but it cannot convince. The charter of the State Bank is a good one. It is one of the best banking systems ever established—affording reasonable profits to the banker, and a good currency to the people. With some exceptions, its affairs have been prudently, fairly, and honestly managed. It is true, the State Bank suspended specie payments, and it did right. Public opinion justified her in that suspension, and it would justify her for suspending, under the same circumstances, again. There was a general suspension of specie payments amongst the banks in the country, and if our bank had not refused to pay out her specie, it would all have been drawn from her by the banks and brokers of other States, and our people would have been left almost without a currency. There were others, about that time, besides the banks, that suspended payments, not only of specie, but of any sort. Where the people lost hundreds of dollars by the depreciation of the bills of our bank, they lost thousands of dollars on the bills of the banks of other States in circulation amongst us. If gentlemen are anxious to learn the cause of the universal derangement of the currency and embarrassment of the business of the country that prevailed at that time, they can find a sufficient one in the experiments on the currency that had been indulged in by the National Government.

The State Bank is also charged with the loss of the million of dollars negotiated on credit to the Morris Canal and Banking Company by Mr. Merrill. She can be charged with that loss with no more justice than she could be with the money uselessly spent on the Central Canal. Both losses are chargeable to the internal improvement system. The stockholders in the bank asked no increase of her capital by the State. They were disinclined to have the capital increased at that time; but the State, availing herself of a right retained in the charter, to increase her capital in the bank, determined to do so, for the purpose of enabling her, out of the dividends, to pay the interest on her internal improvement debt. It is true, the then President of the bank negotiated this unfortunate loan, but he did so as the agent of the State, and not of the Bank. The true account of the State Bank with the State, stands thus:

ing the bonds for the $1,390 00, $870,223 49

The above is the account the State Bank could render to you to-day, if called upon to close up her business. She has punctually paid the interest on the bank bonds, has the means to pay the principal of all that are outstanding, and has made a profit for the State, on her investment, of $870,223 49. But gentlemen have said, and will say again, these are mere bank reports, and are therefore unworthy of credit. Well, sir, whatever you may think of these reports, I say that men of business and capital believe them, and stand ready to give the State a premium of at least one hundred thousand dollars for her stock in the State Bank, if the State desires to sell her stock in that institution. Ah, sir, if the finances of the State of Indiana had been conducted with but half the ability and integrity with which the State Bank has conducted her business, we would not this day be involved so deeply in debt as we are. Suppose the affairs of the bank had been managed by your bank-hating politicians, how much do you think the State's stock in it would be worth?

But I may be asked, why I prefer the free bank system, if the State Bank has done so well? I reply, in the first place, because the State Bank is a monopoly, and in a free government no monopoly ought to be allowed, unless it is necessary, in order to procure a great public good. Such a necessity existed at the time of the establishment of the State Bank. We needed banking facilities in the State, and under our Constitution, no other system of banking could be established, than that of a State Bank and Branches.

In the next place, I object to the State Bank as an exclusive system because it does not grow with the growth of the country. The capital of the State Bank is but little more now than it was when the bank first went into full operation, while in the mean time the trade in the State has increased perhaps tenfold. It has been said that this evil can be remedied by an increase of the capital stock of the bank. But how can you do that if the new Constitution is adopted, for it forbids the State from borrowing money for any such purpose. The individual stock holders may not be disposed to increase the capital, because the general scarcity of money enables them to make greater profits. Again: under the State Bank system the number and location of branches is made to depend upon the will of the corporators, instead of upon the demands of trade. This difficulty, it is said, can be avoided by compelling the State Bank to establish branches whenever and wherever persons are willing to organize themselves according to the requisitions of the charter. Whenever you do that it will be necessary to do one thing more—make a law requiring capitalists to take stock in the bank, for surely they will not be disposed to invest their money in a business where new partners may be forced upon them any day of the week. The most beneficial feature in the charter of the State Bank is the one that makes the branches responsible for each other's debts. Will capitalists be willing to take stock in an institution that will involve them in liabilities, the amount of which they can neither know or control? It seems to me that a State Bank and branches must of necessity be a monopoly, and if so, the system can only be justified on the score of public policy. A State has no right to grant such privileges solely for the benefit of the corporators.

Another objection to any exclusive system of banking is, that it prevents a wholesome competition in that business. For instance, the bank in this city is now selling exchange on the East at one per cent. premium, while at Cincinnati exchange can be had at par, or even at a discount. Would exchange bear this price here if there was a free bank or any other independent banking institution located in this city? Establish independent banking institutions, along side of each other, and then their customers will be able to procure accommodations on the fairest terms. Preserve the State Bank system, if you please, but leave the way open for competition. Give us a free system also, so that in this business, like all others, capitalists may engage in it when and where they please.

But, sir, I desire that the question of re-chartering the State Bank, or of establishing some similar institution, may be left with the people, to be settled by them through their representatives when the question comes properly before them. The bank charter will expire in 1857, and her business must be closed up within two years thereafter. The bonds of the State for the bank loan fall due as follows: $500,000 in September, 1864; $450,000 in August, 1865; and $440,000 in July, 1866. These bonds draw but 5 per cent. interest, and the money can be made to yield at least 10 per cent., thereby making for the State the sum of $69,500 per annum so long as the money can be used as banking capital. I am not prepared to say that under all the circumstances of the case, sound policy will justify us in refusing the bank charter to be extended until nearer the maturity of these bonds, under such amendments of the charter as experience has shown to be necessary. Let that also remain an open question.

My greatest fear, sir, is, that our new Constitution will contain too many restrictions upon the will of the people. Too much law making has proved a great evil in this State, but we may have yet to deplore a greater evil, too much Constitution making. I, for one, indulge a comfortable hope, that after this body—for whose wisdom I entertain a high respect—shall have dissolved into its original elements, the people will be able to select from their midst other agents entirely competent for the prudent management of our State policy. I deeply regret, therefore, the disposition manifested here, to limit and restrict on all sides the legislative power of the State. It is far better to err in the exercise of a too generous confidence in the wisdom of future legislatures, than to assume that the safety of the people is wholly dependent upon the superior wisdom and forecast of this honorable body. Let, then, the friends of the free banks and of the State Bank endeavor to come to some terms of fair compromise on this difficult question of banking and currency. Let us insert in our Constitution no restrictions of the subject, except such as experience has clearly shown to be necessary, and such as judicious men of all parties will cheerfully assent to. Then it will be for the people, through their representatives, to decide whether they will establish the State Bank system, the free bank system, or both, or neither of the systems.

Mr. RITCHEY called for the previous question.

The call was seconded by the Convention on a division, by ayes 67, noes 46; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first taken on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph (Mr. Colfax) to the pending instructions.

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 74, nays 64:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Ver., Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, March, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—74.

So the amendment to the instructions was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon re-committing the section with the instructions as amended.

Upon this question the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 73, nays 65:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Holman, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—73.

So the instructions as amended were adopted, and the section committed.

On motion of Mr. SHOUP,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of moving a re-consideration of the vote taken prior to the adjournment this morning, by which the section and pending amendments were ordered to be re-committed to the committee on currency and banking; and I wish to state the motive which induces me to make this motion. It must be very apparent to every member of this Convention, from the course we have been pursuing, and the disposition which we have made of this first section of the article now under consideration, that it is not probable that this Convention will, in any reasonable time, come to any definite conclusion on any question connected with the subject of banking; and it is also very apparent, that whatever conclusion we shall come to—whatever shall be the final action of this Convention on this subject—that action will not be in consonance with the opinions of a majority of this Convention. It has been truly remarked that there are three parties here—a State Bank party, a free bank party, and a no bank party—and, according to the statement made by the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) it seems that no one of these parties constitutes a majority in this body. If this be the case, and no concession be made by any of them, then it is manifest, that whatever policy we may adopt, it will not be consistent with the views of a majority of this body.

My motive in moving to re-consider the vote taken previous to the adjournment this morning is this: I propose, if the motion be re-considered, to make the following motion:

"That the whole question of currency and banking be referred to a select committee of one from each Congressional district, and that such committee report a series of sections restrictive of banking, and limiting the powers of any corporation or association hereafter authorized by legislation to issue bills or notes to circulate as money; and that such restrictions and limitations be such as will be equally applicable to special or general banking powers."

Mr. President, if we attempt to go further than this—if this Convention, by a vote, sanctions the State Bank policy—I verily believe that there is a large body of the people of the State of Indiana who will vote against the Constitution for that reason, if for no other. The like will undoubtedly happen if we adopt the free bank system; and even if we refuse all banks, the same result will follow. Then, from the action we have had on the subject, it is manifest to my mind, that our true policy is this: to create restrictions to limit banking in every shape and form, and then to let the character of the institutions, hereafter to be created, depend upon legislative enactment.

I would like to inquire of members of this Convention, if they conceive that the result of the voting this morning is truly indicative of the sentiments of this Convention! if they believe that the section and instructions, as adopted, are really in consonance with the views of the Convention! Suppose the committee report back the sections just as they are instructed to report them; I will venture to say that, in such case, there is not a majority of the Convention prepared to endorse such a report. And so it would be with the next section. If we re-consider the vote taken this morning, and refer this whole matter to a select committee, with instructions not to report a general or special banking law, but to report restrictions on banking, we shall then attain a desirable end; we shall simply submit to the people of Indiana a Constitution in which no particular banking project is specified, but in which limitations of banking alone are specified. I would inquire how many gentlemen are prepared to say that any proposition of this kind will not be adopted! If, for instance, a restriction were reported that no association of men engaged in banking shall receive a greater amount of interest for their money than individuals are entitled to receive, why, nobody would object to that. And so it would probably be with every other reasonable restriction on banking. But, when we talk of adopting one system or the other, the difficulty then presents itself. In consideration of presenting such a Constitution as the people will approve, I think we ought not to vote specifying any given plan of banking, but merely to create restrictions.

Then, Mr. President, if the Convention will re-consider the vote taken this morning, I propose to offer the resolution which I have in my hand. I would again say to the Convention that the subject of banking is one that I know nothing about. I have not occupied the attention of the Convention on the subject, nor do I wish to be a member of any committee to which this question may be referred. I simply offer the resolution with a view of having the matter settled in some satisfactory manner, which will result, not in the rejection, but in the adoption of the new Constitution.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I would merely say that I am not going to vote for the purpose of re-committing. I think we can settle the matter as well here as in any other place. But I rise to make a point of order, and that is, if this motion to re-consider should prevail, what will be the operation of the previous question? The section was re-committed under the operation of the previous question. A motion is made to re-consider. Is that question open to discussion?

The PRESIDENT. I suppose not. If the Convention move to re-consider the vote, the question will go back under the same circumstances as when it was re-committed.

The question being on re-considering the vote by which the section was re-committed,

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

Mr. BORDEN moved a call of the Convention.

The motion was decided in the negative—ayes 44, noes 59.

The question then recurring on the motion to re-consider,

The yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—68.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Harbolt, Helm, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—65.

So the Convention agreed to re-consider the vote.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section be re-committed with the instructions?

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following instructions—

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move a call of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of the gentleman from Vigo is not in order. We are now under the previous question. The question is, Shall the section be re-committed with the instructions?

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio, Will it not be in order to move to amend the instructions?

The PRESIDENT. Not under the operation of the previous question.

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, they were taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Harbolt, Helm, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—64.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—70.

So the section was not re-committed with instructions.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section pass?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I wish to ask whether it would be in order to move a re-consideration of the vote sustaining the previous question?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, not under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. OWEN. I ask whether it be in order to move to re-commit with instructions differing from these?

The PRESIDENT. Not at all.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. Has the Chair decided that the previous question cannot be re-considered?

The PRESIDENT. Not at all. The Chair made no such decision.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to re-consider the vote ordering the previous question. I understand the decision of the Chair to be this: that the motion to re-commit the section to a select committee with instructions is out of order.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that any motion is out of order, the previous question being in operation.

Mr. HOLMAN. And is a motion to re-consider the vote ordering the previous question under the operation of the previous question?

The PRESIDENT. Yes; there is nothing now to discuss. It is all under the operation of the previous question. If the gentleman from Dearborn wishes to appeal from the decision of the Chair, he can do so.

Mr. BORDEN. I voted with the majority. I think it is in order to move to re-consider the vote ordering the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. Such a motion is not in order, under the previous question.

Mr. BORDEN. Then I most respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will please to send up his appeal in writing.

Mr. BORDEN. I will state to the Convention what I conceive to be the position of things. I see no reason why we should desire to insult each other here, or do anything out of order, and—

The PRESIDENT. Debate cannot be allowed under the previous question. If the gentleman persists in his appeal, he will please to send it to the Chair in writing.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to state the manner in which I understand the question, in order that I may be corrected, if I am wrong. The previous question was—

The PRESIDENT. The previous question was called on the motion to recommit with instructions—

Mr. BORDEN. Well, sir, that having been done—

The PRESIDENT. If the gentleman from Allen will have a little patience, the Chair will explain the "position of things."

Mr. BORDEN. O certainly, certainly.

The PRESIDENT. The history of the matter is simply this. In the early part of the day there was a motion to re-commit the section with instructions. A motion was then made to amend the instructions. Pending that motion, the previous question was called and sustained. The question was taken on the instructions, and decided in the affirmative, and then on re-committing, which was also decided in the affirmative. Since the meeting of the Convention after the adjournment, a motion has been made to re-consider the vote on re-committing, and it was re-considered. That brought the matter back to where it was before, under the operation of the previous question. The vote was then taken on re-committing with instructions, that being the pending question, after the motion to re-consider was decided in the affirmative; and the motion to re-commit was decided in the negative. The main question now is, Shall the section pass?

Mr. BORDEN. Then it appears we are still under the operation of the previous question. Now suppose that I voted in the majority on the call for the previous question, the question is whether I would not have a right to move to re-consider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already decided that a motion to re-consider the vote ordering the previous question, while the previous question is in operation, is out of order.

Mr. BORDEN. Then with all due respect I must appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. To that the Chair can have no objection, and he will only remark to the gentleman from Allen that if he will send up his appeal in writing, the Chair will entertain it.

Mr. BORDEN. I will withdraw the appeal for the present.

Mr. COLFAX. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether the previous question is not exhausted in the motion to re-commit.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir, the previous question is not exhausted, until the main question is put.

Mr. COLFAX. I would like to inquire further, whether a motion ordering the previous question can ever be re-considered, and if so, under what circumstances?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir, the previous question can be re-considered. The Chair has already explained the matter. Had the motion made by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) been to re-consider the vote ordering the previous question, then that vote might have been re-considered. But the motion was to re-consider the vote ordering the re-commitment of the section, and that being decided affirmatively, the previous question was still in force, and could not be exhausted until the main question was put, which was on the passage of the section.

The question was then taken on the passage of the section, and the yeas and nays being ordered and taken, they resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mower, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—78.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hardin, Helm, Howe, Kent, Mathew, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nofsinger, Owen, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—59.

So the section was passed.

The PRESIDENT. The next business, in the orders of the day, is the following additional section, proposed by the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith).

Mr. WALPOLE. In order that this question may be finally settled, I move to re-consider the vote by which the section was passed.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that the Convention adjourn.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, on the motion to adjourn, and were taken, with the following result :

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Gibson, Gibson, Gregg, Hardin, Howe, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Milroy, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Thornton, Wheeler, and Wiley—33.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chenowith, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hawkins, Helms, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Nofsinger, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—101.

So the Convention did not adjourn.

Mr. COOKERLY. I move that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. WALPOLE. The yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORDEN. I would inquire whether, if the motion to adjourn is withdrawn, the subject would be open for discussion?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will decide that point of order when it comes up. At present it is not before the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN. Then the Chair might as well not decide it at all.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise to inquire whether immediately upon the Convention having refused to adjourn, another motion to adjourn is in order without the intervention of any other business?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order, as the gentleman from Delaware may learn by a reference to the 33d rule. The Chair will read it for his information:

“A motion to adjourn shall always be in order and be decided without debate.”

The yeas and nays were then taken on the motion to adjourn, and there were—yeas 29, nays 92—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cookerly, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Gibson, Howe, Mather, McFarland, Milroy, Mowrer, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Ristine, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, and Work—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Owen, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—92.

So the Convention refused to adjourn.

Mr. MILROY. I move that the Convention adjourn.

Mr. WATTS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KILGORE. I again put the question to the Chair, whether it is in order to move to adjourn immediately upon the Convention having refused to do so, and without any other business intervening?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair has already informed the gentleman from Delaware that it is in order. He has read to him the rule and given him the reference, that he may read it for himself, if he doubts the Chair did not read it correctly.

Mr. KILGORE. Then I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will please to send up his appeal in writing.

Mr. KILGORE. After consultation with some of my friends around me, I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. McFARLAND. Then I renew the appeal.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Tippecanoe will send up his appeal in writing.

Mr. DOBSON. I wish to read a section of the old Constitution. I think it is very applicable to this case.

[Loud cries of "read, read, read;" "order, order, order;" "consent, consent;" and "no, no, no;" and "yeas and nays on the reading."]

Mr. BORDEN. I object to the reading.

Mr. DOBSON. I move for leave to read it.

Mr. BORDEN. The yeas and nays on the motion for leave.

Mr. DOBSON. The section is about cruel and unusual punishments [laughter]. Now I think this is too much punishment—

[Cries of "order, order, order," and "read, read, read," and "no consent."]

A MEMBER. I move that the gentleman from Owen have leave to read the section.

ANOTHER MEMBER. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman there is a motion to adjourn pending which must be decided before any other motion is entertained.

Mr. COOKERLY. Will it be in order to move a call of the Convention?

Mr. PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I move a call of the Convention.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion for a call of the Convention.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALPOLE. Would not the previous question cut off that motion?

The PRESIDENT. Not now. This is a call of the Convention.

Mr. GIBSON. The yeas and nays were ordered upon the motion for a call of the Convention. Let us take them and see whether we decide there shall be a call.

Mr. PRATHER. I would call the attention of the Convention to the 27th rule. I hope the Chair will read it.

Mr. BORDEN. Let the gentleman from Jennings read the rule himself.

Mr. PRATHER, amid much confusion, read the rule as follows:

"In case of any disturbance or disorderly conduct in the gallery or lobby, the President or Chairman of the committee of the whole shall have power to order the same cleared."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Jennings that the Chair has perhaps scolded until members have complained, and has begged and urged them to keep order, that we might get along with the business; and if gentlemen are determined not to heed any of its admonitions, they must take their own course.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The disturbance is in the lobby.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot keep a hundred and fifty gentlemen in order if they are determined not to preserve order. It may be very good fun for gentlemen to create all this disturbance, but so far as our constituents are concerned, as the frogs said to the boys, it is "death" to them.

The question was then taken on the motion for a call of the Convention, and there were—yeas 48, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Foley, Gibson, Hamilton, Harbott, Howe, Kent, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Mowrer, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shoup, Smiley, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, and Work—48.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bright, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hugin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—85.

So the motion for a call of the Convention was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COOKERLY. The yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire, Mr. President, that I may be excused from voting.

The question being taken, the gentleman from Carroll was excused from voting.

Mr. KENT. I desire, also, Mr. President, to be excused from voting.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The yeas and nays on the motion to excuse him.

Mr. KENT. I will withdraw the request.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the motion to adjourn, and they resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Chandler, Chapman, Chenowith, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hendricks, Jones, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, McFarland, Milroy, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Shoup, Wheeler, Wiley, and Work—35.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

MR. PETTIT. I ask leave of the Convention to be allowed to introduce a resolution.

Loud cries of "read, read, read."

THE PRESIDENT. Will the Convention suspend the rules, in order to allow the gentleman to read the resolution?

Loud cries of "consent, consent," and "no, no, no," and "read, read."

MR. PETTIT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of suspension of the rules. If gentlemen are determined to have everything their own way, let them show themselves upon the record.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the Convention, that it must be apparent to any one, that a portion of the delegates present are determined that no business shall be done, even if we sit here till dark; and as it appears to the Chair that it would be much more in consonance with the interests of our constituents, and more creditable and honorable to ourselves, I pronounce the Convention adjourned until Monday morning, at nine o'clock.

The Convention accordingly adjourned.

MONDAY, JAN. 13, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NEW.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS FROM SELECT COMMITTEES.

MR. KENT, chairman of the select committee, to whom the different subjects in relation to negroes and mulattoes were referred, reported a series of sections, providing that no negro or mulatto shall come into or settle in this State after the adoption of this Constitution; contracts with negroes coming into the State to be void, and persons employing them, or otherwise encouraging their remaining in the State, shall be fined not less than ten nor more than five hundred dollars; there shall be an annual appropriation for the gradual colonization of negroes and mulattoes and their descendants, who are here at the adoption of the Constitution; after 1860, no negro or mulatto shall acquire real estate, except by descent; the General Assembly to pass laws to carry out the provisions of the foregoing sections, if adopted by the people. This article shall be submitted to a separate vote of the people, in this form: Exclusion and colonization of negroes and mulattoes, "aye or no."

The sections were read a first time, and,

On motion of MR. GIBSON, the report was laid on the table, and five hundred copies ordered to be printed.

MR. WALPOLE obtained leave to withdraw his motion, made on a previous day, to reconsider the vote by which the section, providing for banking on a specie basis, was passed.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

THE PRESIDENT announced the question as being on the amendment of the gentleman from Wells (MR. BASCOM) to the section offered by the gentleman from Ripley (MR. SMITH). The amendment proposed to refer the subject of banking to a vote of the people,

MR. LOCKHART moved to refer the section, &c., &c., to a select committee of one to each judicial circuit with instructions to report an article providing "that the General Assembly shall, at its first session after the adoption of the Constitution, enact a general system of banking, and extend the charter of the present State Bank, until two years previous to the last bonds of the Bank are due; the profits to the State, during such extension, to be applied as the Legislature may provide, after which period, a State Bank and Branches may be provided for by law, and shall conform so far to the general law for banking, as the General Assembly may require."

The question being upon the motion to recommit with instructions.

MR. BASCOM. I hope the section will not be re-committed. I desire to have, if possible, a direct vote taken upon the subject. It is as well that the Convention consider this matter coolly this morning. We have endeavored to lay down some rule to govern the banking of this State. In that we have failed; for there was a section adopted which is not satisfactory, perhaps, to a fair majority of this body. It is for us to calculate the results that may follow the adoption of any one system of banking. Gentlemen tell us that, if you adopt a State Bank system, the free bank party, as they are termed, will, when the Constitution is submitted to the people, with all the influence and power they can bring to bear, throw it against the adoption of the instrument. They say that a Constitution, with a provision merely for a State Bank, can never be adopted. You find, on the other hand, a perhaps equally large number of men who are pledged to kill the work of your hands.

I want the Convention to take some ground, and not to smother the section that we have been talking about so long. For my part, I desire that the whole subject should be submitted to the people; we have found that we cannot agree. Though personally, with a small number here, I am opposed to all banking systems, yet I am ever willing that the majority of the people of the State should decide what they want. I was sorry last week to see, when there was a temporary triumph of one party, that they should rejoice over the downfall of their opponents. It is not proper.

Sir, if we should submit this subject to the people, would any man here say that they are not as capable of correctly deciding it as we are? For in truth, we, by a week's labor, have shown to the world our inability to decide it. Like another gentleman, who has previously made the observation, I do not suppose, for a moment, that when this Convention adjourns, all the wisdom and intelligence of the State shall have been exhausted. I believe that other bodies will hereafter assemble, with as much foresight and understanding of the wants of the people, as this Convention. Then why not submit the question directly to the people, whether they want a bank or not? If they want a bank, let them instruct their representatives in the Legislature whether it should be a State Bank, or a free bank, or both. If we have the vote taken in that way, the minority will be satisfied. I think this is the most reasonable and practicable mode of settling the question.

I hope the subject will not be re-committed with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburg (Mr. Lockhart). I do not suppose that a very large number in this Convention would consent to re-charter the present State Bank. They all know that there are many evils connected with it. All these banks tend to the one end—that is, to make money off the people. I care not whether you call them State Banks or free banks, it is all the same to me. The only difference that I perceive is, will you have a shaving-shop in every county in the State, or will you confine those shaving operations to a few, as in the State Bank.

I am not in favor of any one system; I am pledged to none. But I have no desire to embarrass the will of a majority of the Convention. I am willing to meet gentlemen and discuss the question; and when the matter is fairly investigated, and the wishes of the majority are expressed, I sit down contented. It is not my purpose to oppose the will of the majority. If we expect to establish any system, we must agree among ourselves; and when you have decided upon what system it shall be, the members on this floor who are opposed to all banks, will go with you, and help to fix the restrictions. But I do hope the Convention will allow us to have a direct vote upon the question of submitting to the people.

It has been remarked that "a large majority of the people are in favor of banking." We have no assurance of that. I believe that in the county I represent, and many of the contiguous counties, a large majority of the people, if the question were put to them, would say: "No banks." I am willing to hear the views of all; but when we have proven, by a week's experience, that we cannot settle this matter upon any basis that will be acceptable to the majority of the body, let us, in the name of reason, refer it to the people who sent us here, for their decision. This morning there was a report made from a select committee, referring the negro question to the people. Is not this question of much greater importance to the people than all the negroes in the State. The monetary interests of the State are more important than mere political interests of the State. I hope, then, that the section will not be re-committed, and that a direct vote may be taken upon the question of submitting the subject to the people.

Mr. OWEN. There is a difference of opinion in this Convention in regard to banking; but there is one thing in regard to which every man agrees, and that is, we want something done. We want to go on, and pass some section or another. Now it is quite plain that we cannot, by itself, pass a provision that there shall be a general banking system, because the State bank men and the no bank men would unite and vote it down. It is equally clear that we cannot pass a recognition of the State bank system, for it will also be voted down. But we can leave these matters, and pass some general restrictions that will not apply to one system more than to the other. I see no other way of getting on. Then I hope this motion to re-commit will be voted down.

I think the matter of submitting the question to the people in this form is impracticable. You cannot submit to the people all the regulations and restrictions thrown around those institutions. It is not sufficient to say to them, "will you have a State bank?" You must explain the whole matter to them; and so with the free bank. It is in my opinion that should be put through the Legislature to the people. I want to see this matter voted down. We are now on a middle ground, so let us go on, and put in such restrictions as the no bank, the State bank, and the free bank men, will agree upon. [Cries of "consent."]

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I agree with the gentleman last up that now is the time to fix upon our restrictions. I think we have now met upon what I consider a half way ground. I understand a gentleman to propose a proposition based upon the State bank system, and I understand that this side of the House desire to stand upon the compromise ground. I go, sir, for voting down the proposition of the gentleman. I say it is now too late to bring up the old State bank plan, because it has been decided by the Convention that they will not recognize it. The gentleman from Posey is correct when he says "we now stand on a middle ground." I think that the restrictions we are ready to vote can be adopted, and we thus be able to get rid of this bank question to-day. How long will this Convention sit here! Will we never get through with our business? I say that if we dispose of this question to-day, we can adjourn in three weeks. I think the people will be pleased with the Constitution we have so far adopted, if we only go home within a reasonable time.

Mr. PETTIT. The question, as I understand it, is on the motion to re-commit with instructions?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIT. I will say, before I sit down, that I will offer an amendment to these instructions; and I hope the proposition to re-commit will then be voted down. I agree with gentlemen that we ought not to re-commit, nor would I offer an amendment were I not afraid that the motion to re-commit might prevail. I propose then to amend the instructions as follows—

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Tippecanoe a shorter way of arriving at the same thing, and that is by calling for a division of the question.

Mr. PETTIT. Then, sir, I call for a division.

The question being first upon re-committing,

Mr. LOCKHART. The leading motive for making this proposition, grows out of the fact that a large amount of time has been already consumed in the discussion of this subject. As soon as we dispose of one proposition, another one is introduced; and I do not know how long this system of offering propositions will continue. I think that by re-committing in the manner proposed, we may arrive at an early conclusion—a conclusion satisfactory to a majority of the Convention.

The proposition, or rather the instructions, which I have offered, proposes that we shall have a general banking law ingrafted on the Constitution, the details of which shall be determined by the Legislature. It also proposes that the State bank shall be re-chartered.

It is well known to every member of the Convention that a large portion of the capital of the State bank is owned by the State, and that it was borrowed at five per cent. interest; the last of the bonds issued for this loan will fall due in 1866. I propose to extend the charter until within two years of that period, thus affording ample opportunity to wind up the affairs of the institution by the time the bonds are payable.

Power is also proposed to be given to the Legislature, to establish after that period a State bank, with branches, which shall conform to the provisions of the general banking law, so far as the Legislature may require. I know that there are some provisions in the charter of the present State bank that are objectionable, which I propose that the Legislature should remedy, in the act extending the charter.

If we close up the bank at the expiration of its present charter, we must, from necessity, have a large amount of surplus fund on hand, for which we will be paying interest. Sound policy would require that these funds should be kept active and productive. Can this be safely done without a continuation of the bank charter. This is emphatically a compromise proposition—one which ought to meet with the approbation of the friends of both systems.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am anxious to see the Convention take some course that would in my judgment seem a little more like coming to a conclusion. I am surprised to see gentlemen who have been long in public life, opposing matters predicated upon or growing out of parliamentary laws or usages. Now, sir, it was the gentleman from Tippecanoe who has been endeavoring to do so much, and carrying nothing—that opposes every principle of common sense in relation to parliamentary usages. What has been the course of legislative bodies, in a case like this, since parliamentary rules were first adopted? Whenever a question has become so entangled that the body cannot get at it, they divide it and send it to committees, in order that they may be enabled to come to a satisfactory conclusion upon it. All that we want with committees is merely to deliberate for the good of the body of which they compose a part. Why, sir, if gentlemen will ever be convinced, it seems to me a whole week thrown away ought to convince them that we should adopt a rule of parliamentary action, which has been long established. If this Convention be more competent to bring in their own propositions, and do their own business, than committees, I do not see the necessity of our having appointed a number of committees in the first instance. I think it of great importance that this subject should be re-committed. What is the course adopted, when we see two legislative bodies, as the Senate and the House of Representatives, disagreeing upon a bill passed in either House? The one House will not recede a step from its position, nor will the other advance. What do they do? They always appoint a committee of conference who meet together, and strike upon some plan by which they may come to an agreement. They compromise the matter—one recedes a little, and the other comes a little further, and so they are enabled to pass the bill. I will say, too, that so far as my experience goes, I never saw an attempt on the part of one House to browbeat the other from its position. The committee invariably endeavors to arrive at a conclusion that will be agreeable to the two Houses; and when the report of the committee is made, I never knew the body to reject it. It is a principle of common sense. I do not see how we can come to a conclusion, if the course suggested in relation to this matter be not adopted.

It seems to me that this question should not excite the Convention into a perfect perspiration, but rather should elicit the most cool and calm consideration of every man upon the floor. The interests of our constituents are so bound up in this question, that, if we dispose of it in such a manner as to operate injuriously to the public, they never can forget the action of the hundred and fifty men here assembled. We were not sent here to get up the most severe and stringent banking system we could devise. We were sent here, sir, to establish a system the best adapted to the interests and wants of this people. In this large body we cannot settle down upon any one system, pursuing the course that we have heretofore pursued—opinion is too much divided. We may, to be sure, settle some few isolated restrictions, but we cannot come to a definite conclusion upon the main question, as to what sort of banks we shall have. For one, I am in favor of a free bank; but I am not willing to strike out of existence, that old institution that has so long and so well subserved the interests of the people of Indiana. I do not see why the Convention will not agree to re-commit.

Mr. DOBSON. I think, myself, that the section we have passed is a tolerable good one. All we want, is, to have the restrictions settled here, and not re-commit the matter.

Mr. COOKERLY. I hope the proposition will not be referred—[much noise and confusion]. I tell you what it is, gentlemen, I am going to talk. [Stamping of feet.] Mr. President:—[more stamping], I do hope, sir, that the matter will not be referred. We have [increased noise] had this question before a committee.—[The Speaker here grasped a sand-box and looked intently toward the left side of the Hall. The action created much laughter]. I have frequently asserted, [shuffling of feet], and I want the Reporter to take it down now, that this Convention was a mob, and I believe—[the disorder increasing]—I believe it. I want the Reporter to take it down. [Loud hammering, and stamping on the floor.] I see gentlemen here, hammering, who have spoken for hours upon the subject—[noise increasing]—I say I have perceived gentlemen hammering and making a noise, who have spoken at length upon this question. [Disorder unabated.] I think, sir, that the motion to refer comes with bad grace from the gentleman who made that proposition. Why did he not vote to refer this question on Saturday? [Cries of "hear him—order."] He comes in to-day, when he begins to tremble for the old State Bank. That is the reason why he wants the matter referred. I hope a majority of the Convention will not vote to refer. We can as well settle the matter here, as any thirteen men in a committee room. If we wish to refer it, why not, then, without instructions? [Mr. C. here paused for several moments].

Mr. LOCKHART. Mr. President—

Mr. COOKERLY. I have got the floor, I believe: I wish to inform the gentleman that I am not going to yield it until I am ready. Why does he come here to propose a re-committal? [general noise and confusion prevailing]. I wonder, is there any more confusion now than on Saturday, when the President adjourned the Convention?

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). It is only a few of the old bankers.

Mr. COOKERLY. Yes, sir, they will tremble before we get through—[lifting up a glass]—and whenever the question is submitted to the people, they will tremble—[the glass here fell from the speaker's hand, and was broken upon the floor—this caused much laughter and thumping on the desks]. Gentlemen might thump me until they thump me to death, and they would not get me to sit down before I wished. I know who they are—they are the old State Bank men—[increased thumping—general noise]. I will admit, however, that there are some decent men in that party, and some that are monstrous indecent—a perfect set of blackguards—men, whom I would swear, without knowing it positively, were in favor of the State Bank; an institution that has monopolized—[unable to be heard from the noise prevailing]—and eaten out the very vitals of the state [laughter]. Some of them, sir, I am sorry to say—[more confusion]—profess to belong to the democratic party; to that party which has always stood upon the broad platform of "no exclusive privileges"—[the noise and disorder still continued; the efforts of the Chair to repress it having been ineffectual]. Let this noise go on; I like it—it sounds very well in my ear. [Cries of "order, order."] Let them thump away, I do not care for it any more than for the winds that play. I am going to stay here on this floor as long as the rule allows me. [A voice—they are ashamed of themselves now.] I ask the people present to look at their conduct. This Convention has been in session three months; and I want the Reporter to take it down, that these are the men who have kept the Convention so long in session. They are the men who, by every act in their power, have thwarted the will of the people, and have squandered the money of the freemen of Indiana—they have basely squandered it. I wish that to go down, too, for the country. I wash my hands of it.

I never have done an act calculated to thwart the will of the majority of the Convention.

MR. PRATHER. I tried to get the floor yesterday for the purpose of moving a suspension of the rules so that I might introduce a resolution, but I was not successful in my endeavor. I am convinced, Mr. President, from having been an attentive listener to the discussions of this body, that no good will grow out of our remaining here. We have been here four months or nearly so already. When I left home I expected the deliberations of the Convention would be closed in six weeks. I have been in my seat almost every day since we assembled. I believe the yeas and nays have not been called, with but one or two exceptions, without my having answered to my name. But the time has arrived at which I have become convinced that we can do no good by remaining here. I have prepared a preamble and resolution to the effect that on to-morrow morning we adjourn sine die. [Loud cries of "consent."]

I am a State Bank man, but not a State Bank man of the kind you, sir, (to Mr. Pettit,) represent me to be. [Noise prevailing.] I wish gentlemen to know that when they attack State Bank men, they attack me. I am not one of the kind which the gentleman from Tippecanoe termed "swindlers."

MR. PETTIT (in his seat). I did not say you were any bank man.

MR. PRATHER. I say that—

MR. PETTIT. Give me the floor and I will state what I said.

MR. PRATHER. I appeal to the Convention if the gentleman did not say we were "thieves and robbers."

MR. PETTIT (Mr. Prather giving way). I said it, and repeat it, "that the man who in a political community asks for rights and immunities greater than all the other parties in the community have is a robber." I said further, "that the man in a political community who will calmly submit to be shorn of his political rights, is a craven, a coward, and a slave." I made the remark generally, and if the shoe fit, or pinch, let the gentleman have it. [A laugh.]

MR. PRATHER. The gentleman has made his explanation. The Convention heard what he said. If I have misrepresented the gentleman, I can say that I did not desire to do so. Now in reply to the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) I will ask who caused the confusion on Saturday?

MR. COOKERLY. I will answer the gentleman. For one—

MR. PRATHER. You called the yeas and nays?—

MR. COOKERLY. I did, certainly. I ask the gentleman who voted down the proposition to re-commit, when our friends were absent? Under such circumstances I would always call the yeas and nays.

MR. PRATHER. I will now, sir, move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the preamble and resolution to which I have made allusion.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that a motion to suspend the rules would not be in order—there being a pending motion to re-commit.

MR. EDMONSTON thought there would be a great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion if these fire-brand speeches were thrown into the Convention. He had been in hopes that no motion to re-commit would have been made this morning, and the Convention would have gone on and determined the restrictions. His opinion was that the question of banks or no banks, or what description of banks we were to have, should be left open to the Legislature. The people would decide the question in the election of the members of the Legislature at the proper time. He was satisfied, and he supposed every gentleman was satisfied, too, that if the Convention adopted any one system of banking to the exclusion of the others, their entire labors would be in danger of being defeated. It would be so in his section of the State. The free bank section of the country would go against the Constitution if the Constitution adopted the State Bank system, and vice versa. Was it not better then to leave this question (well guarded) to the people? He hoped the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Lockhart) would withdraw his motion to re-commit; the restrictions could then come up one after another and be voted upon. The Convention should try to act with some degree of calmness, and so endeavor to arrive at a conclusion.

MR. KELSO. Before this question is disposed of I desire to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Vigo, (Mr. Cookerly,) because the remarks he made here this morning are to go upon paper, and be transmitted to the people of Indiana, and it becomes necessary that a statement of the facts as they exist should go out with those remarks, otherwise I would not have condescended to notice them. What I say about this matter, I want to go out with his remarks.

He charges the State Bank men with having wantonly and unnecessarily squandered the time and money of the freemen of Indiana—and that charge I assert unequivocally is not true. The State Bank men are no more chargeable than any other portion of the Convention, with occupying its time; and I believe that no one of them has had any other wish than to progress as speedily as possible with the business of the Convention, believing that in so doing they were discharging their duty to their constituents.

I confess, that on Saturday we acted in Convention, very much like a mob; but were not the free bankers as prominent in getting our business into confusion as the State Bank men? Was not the gentleman from Vigo prominent and foremost in that skirmish of words and the scene of confusion?

Mr. COOKERLY rising, exclaimed, "not so!"

Mr. KELSO. Unless there was truth in the charge, I hardly think the gentleman would have jumped up so quick. A short history of the transaction of that scene, will perhaps not be inappropriate. We met and went to work on the bank question. How it happened I do not know, but a majority of the Convention passed a provision providing that all banks hereafter should be organized on a specie basis all paid in. Well sir, the gentleman from Vigo did not seem to rest well under this vote. That was his privilege. I find no fault with him for it. He had a right to get hopping mad if he chose about it. What followed? After this restriction had passed, a motion was made by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) to re-consider the vote; and that gentleman had of course a perfect right to make it. As a member of the committee on elections, I examined his credentials. I found him to be a member of this Convention regularly elected. He has exercised his privileges since he has been here, and to his propositions and speeches I have listened with attention. He is not only a regular member of this Convention, but a business member, and a gentleman who is fully able to defend himself, and therefore I shall not attempt to defend his conduct. He certainly had a right to make the motion; it was not out of order; it was not unparliamentary; and I am sure he made it in a cool and collected manner; there was nothing boisterous or menacing in his style, whatever. What follows? Who led on then? I want to know if motion after motion was not made by the free bankers to adjourn, without the single intermission of any other question except once, a call of the Convention, until finally, the Chair was forced—owing to the general confusion which prevailed—to take the responsibility upon himself of adjourning the Convention. Now, if the gentleman from Vigo denies that he was a prominent actor on this occasion, he denies that which is the truth, and he knows it.

Mr. COOKERLY. I do not deny that I opposed motions which were adverse to the doctrine for which I contended. I referred mainly to the uncalculated for action of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole).

Mr. KELSO. I assert, sir, that no man could have been more free from an excited boisterous, turbulent, or mob-like manner than was the gentleman from Hancock, when he made his motion to re-consider.

The making of a bare motion parliamentary in its character, certainly was not criminal; and yet the gentleman from Vigo, charges upon the State Bank men, the origin of all the disorder that prevailed on Saturday last. The gentleman himself, voted in the majority, evidently with the intention of moving a re-consideration himself. But finding the majority against him stronger than he had anticipated; he changed his vote. It was his right and privilege so to vote. But can he complain? Has he any just reason to complain of the State Bank men voting against any adjournment, when they desired to have a question settled definitely, which had already obtained the votes of a majority of the Convention in its favor? I think not, sir. I deny emphatically then, sir, that the State Bank men produced the noise and confusion on Saturday; they only exercised the privilege which they had the right to exercise in voting against an adjournment, and, sir, they done so in a peaceable manner. The gentleman cannot deny that we had that privilege, and that we exercised it in a proper manner. Therefore, I say the charge he has made against us, was an incorrect charge. I wish to add here that I desire to do justice to the gentleman, for certainly I have no ill feeling towards him. This morning when he got up to speak, I must say that I do not think he was very fairly treated. It is hardly sufficient to justify the treatment he received, when I say that it was paying him off in his money. He led off the free bank men on Saturday, and converted the Convention into a mob, or something very much like it; and I suppose some of the State Bank men thought they would pay him off this morning, in his own coin.

I believe we are commanded to return good for evil; though it is a tolerable fair rule to treat other men as they treat you. I do not blame the gentleman for getting excited and suffering his angry feelings to overflow somewhat, on the present occasion; but I do blame him for charging upon the State Bank men, that they were the instigators and perpetrators of all the noise and difficulty that prevailed on Saturday, when he knows in his own heart, that that charge ought not to have been made. I thin , sir, that the gentleman and those who go with him in favor of free banks, will ere long, find they have mistaken or acted contrary to the wishes of the people. I repeat, sir, that the people I represent, are in favor of a State Bank, with proper restrictions, in preference to any other system of banks, and most decidedly in preference to the free bank system. And this, sir, I believe is the desire of the majority of the people of the State. I have only to say, sir, that if I can defeat the free bankers, I shall use every effort honestly, to accomplish that object; if they defeat us, why, I must acquiesce in the will of the majority. This is the second time I have attempted to speak upon this subject, since it first came up; in my first speech I gave my views at length, in regard to it, and since then, I have been contented to let the matter go on. I hope to learn something from the arguments presented on both sides of the question, and I desire that the discussion should go on until all parties are satisfied. With these remarks, Mr. President, I will take my seat.

Mr. LOCKHART remarked that he was not aware when he submitted his proposition that it would lead to the discussion which had taken place. He had submitted it as a measure of compromise and with no other intention as a proposition upon which State Bankers, free bankers, and no bankers might probably unite. He had thought that the reference he had proposed would meet the views of a majority of the Convention, and that then the question at issue would be settled without any further difficulty.

This morning he had been indirectly alluded to by the gentleman from Vigo, as a disturber of the peace of the Convention. Now, he thought that members would bear him out in saying that his conduct since he entered the Convention, had been uniformly courteous and respectful; that he had not, upon any occasion, united with those who felt disposed to make noise and confusion in the hall, nor had he occupied altogether more than an hour and twenty minutes of the time of the Convention since it met. He had not been absent either, more than two hours of the time since the Convention first assembled. He said this because he did not consider himself obnoxious to the charge brought against the advocates of the State Bank by the gentleman from Vigo. All he would say in reply was, that if the gentleman from Vigo alluded to him, he was ignorant about what he spoke, or he knew not what he said.

Mr. COOKERLY. I did not allude to the gentleman from Vanderburgh; he is too much of a gentleman to have acted in the manner I have described.

Mr. LOCKHART. As my motion is evidently leading to too extended and unnecessary discussion, I will withdraw it.

Mr. COOKERLY. I did not apply my remarks to all of the State Bank men at all. I applied them to a portion of that party only, and I will not take them back.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom) to the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith).

Mr. CARR. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BASCOM. Oh, withdraw your motion and let us have a direct vote upon the question.

Mr. CARR. I will withdraw it.

Mr. WOLFE. I do trust the gentleman from Wells will withdraw his amendment, for there is no use to vote upon it at present. We do not know that we are going to have a bank, and if we conclude, finally, to have one, we can make a suitable reference. I have not occupied much of the time of the Convention hitherto, and I have said nothing as yet on this subject; all I desire to do is to advise the members of the Convention to go on with their business as statesmen should go on. Let us take proposition after proposition, and proceed with its consideration until we have passed or rejected it. I admonish my friends of all parties that the people are looking with anxiety for a speedy and satisfactory termination of our labors. Let us act like sensible and prudent men, such as the people thought we were when they sent us here. (Applause.)

Mr. HALL. I have had some little experience in legislation, and it does appear to me that we are not much in that state of mind in which we are prepared to act upon this subject. If any proposition, either in favor of the State Bank or the free bank is brought up now, we are not now prepared to act calmly in regard to it. I am willing, sir, to leave the subject to the people—to submit the question to them, in a distinct form, whether they will have a free bank or a State bank. I prefer, sir, that this subject should go to a select committee, and then, when the report is presented, we will be able to act calmly and deliberately in regard to it. In the mean time we will have an opportunity to counsel together and reflect upon the matter. I therefore renew the motion to refer the subject to a select committee of one from each judicial circuit.

Mr. MATHER said that he was satisfied that the Convention was not prepared to act upon the subject to-day, and that it would be much better to postpone definite action in regard to it until to-morrow. Men's animal feelings were up and their judgments were down, and they were not prepared to act, at the present time, in a deliberative and cautious manner. They had come to a crisis now, which they could not pass readily, and he wished gentlemen would allow themselves a little time for reflection and sober thought, before they proceeded to action.

Mr. HALL would only say, in reply to the advice of the gentleman, that he thought the same object which the gentleman had in view would be attained by referring the subject, without instructions, to the select committee he (Mr. H.) had proposed. While the committee were out, the Convention would have time for deliberation.

Mr. SHOUP. Mr. President, what is the main question?

The PRESIDENT. The main question is upon the engrossment of the additional section proposed by the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith.)

Mr. SHOUP. Would it be in order to lay the motion to refer upon the table?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. RITCHEY. I expected, sir, a very beautiful fight between the free bank men and the State bank men. I had been looking for it some three or four months, but I really did not expect a struggle so fierce and protracted as this has been. The conflict, so far, has demonstrated clearly, that neither of these two parties will have the power of doing anything they wish to do, and all that we can do, and all we ought to do, is to put some good and wholesome restrictions in the new Constitution, to prevent either the State bank or free bank system doing any mischief to the people. That is what we want, and that is all we can accomplish.

In regard to the suggestion of the gentleman from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) that we had better postpone the consideration of this subject at the present time, and let a select committee act upon it, I have only to say, that if the consideration of the subject is postponed at all, it will only be bottling up our wrath, to be uncorked and flow out in an increased volume when the report of the committee is returned. I am in favor, as argument has nearly been exhausted upon this subject of proceeding with its consideration, and of voting upon the propositions presented, until we have come to some definite settlement of the question, either one way or the other.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. I have not as yet, sir occupied much of the time of this Convention upon this subject, and I desire now merely to throw out one or two suggestions. Gentlemen talk a great deal about the excitement now prevailing here on this subject and assert that in consequence of it we are unable to proceed with our business. Now, sir, so far as I, myself, am concerned, I am as calm as a summer's evening. I feel perfectly cool and collected, and just as well prepared to vote upon the question now as I should be if it was postponed for six months. I am in perfect good humor with everybody, and I am well satisfied that this Convention is as capable of adjusting this matter how as it will be in two weeks from this time.

Some few persons have been excited in regard to this matter ever since it came up for consideration, and that excitement has been manifested at times—was manifested this morning. And, sir, these persons, I care not when the subject comes up—will give us an exhibition of their temper. The discussion of the subject will be to them as a torch applied to a train of powder—it will blow it up. I think sir, we have had the explosion this morning, and that the smoke is now clearing off so that we can see to proceed with our business.

I hope, sir, the subject will not be referred, but that we will proceed to act upon it in as quiet and harmonious a manner as we can under the circumstances by which we are surrounded. I acknowledge, sir, that at times I have been a little too excited and perhaps too mirthful, and to my own shame I confess that on various occasions, I have joined in the clapping of hands but I shall do so no more. Let us have free and untrammelled discussion and act with moderation and circumspection, and it will be much more to our credit, and to the credit of our constituents.

'The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Gibson (Mr. Hall) to refer the pending section to a select committee composed of one from each judicial district.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 34, nays 107:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Borden, Bright, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hendricks, Holman, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Smith of Scott, Spann, Taylor, Wallace, Watts, and Mr. President—34.

So the section was not re-committed.

Mr. READ of Clark. I move to re-consider the vote on the passage of the section passed on Saturday, providing that all banking shall be on a specie basis actually paid in.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 63, nays 80—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Helm, Howe, Kent, Kendall of White, Mather, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod,

So the vote was not recorded.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is now upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom).

The amendment was not concurred in.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs upon the section proposed by the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith).

MR. KILGORE. I move to strike out the first part of the section, and insert the following:

“The General Assembly shall have power to establish a State Bank and branches, with such powers and under such restrictions, as may be prescribed by law.”

MR. KENT. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware upon the table.

Upon this motion the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and being taken, the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 93, nays 48:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Bidle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—93.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Ballingall, Barbours, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Davis of Madison, Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Warrick, Hall, Hawkins, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Tague, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—43.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

MR. OWEN. I move to strike out the provision providing for a mutual liability of banks, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

“No law shall pass sanctioning, directly or indirectly, the suspension by any bank or banking institution, of specie payments.”

I trust, Mr. President, that we will now go to work and take up those restrictions which we can pass without much difficulty. This is one which I think will pass; and after we have passed this, let us go to work upon the others to which there is no particular objection.

MR. SMITH of Ripley. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) proposes an amendment to my amendment. My amendment reads as follows:

“That all the banks which may be organized under the present Constitution shall be mutually liable for the redemption of the circulation of each other.”

I would inquire, now, if the members of this Convention generally, are not in favor of this proposition? Now I desire to call the attention of gentlemen to the covert proposition now made by the gentleman from Posey. My amendment is as strong against the suspension of specie payments by the banks as is the amendment of the gentleman from Posey—for the banks are to be mutually liable for the paper of each other; and yet the gentleman proposes to strike out my amendment and insert his, which we are all in favor of. I think gentlemen are in favor of my amendment, and that it should be retained; the amendment of the gentleman from Posey will come in at the proper time. Why, it was only the other day that the gentleman declared that this proposition of mine was the only thing that would save the State Bank from ruin, and now he wants to strike it out.

MR. FOSTER. For my part I consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ripley, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey, incongruous with each other. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Posey, was not german to the proposition under consideration. I am in favor of both propositions, but I think there is a more appropriate plan for the proposition of the gentleman from Posey.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Posey will perceive that there is no necessity for his amendment, inasmuch as the last section of Art. 24 provides that "no authority shall be given, sanctioning in any manner the suspension of specie payments."

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from Posey persists in his amendment, will not the Chair rule it out of order.

The PRESIDENT. It is not within the province of the Chair to decide that it is out of order, merely on account of its incongruity with the subject before the Convention; it is for the Convention to decide that matter.

Mr. FOSTER (in his seat). It appears to me any one with half an eye, can see that it is out of order. [A laugh].

Mr. OWEN. Now, Mr. President, this proposition of mine has been denounced as a covert proposition; and I would reply that there is nothing covert about it. I will state to the gentleman from Ripley, and the Convention generally, that I did say, some few days since, in regard to the State Bank system, that I considered the doctrine of mutual liability, the best feature in it; and when the gentleman asks me to go for it, I will do so. Let them restrict their own system, and let us restrict ours. [Applause.] Let them pass their restrictions, and we will ours; and then let us take up other propositions afterwards.

Mr. HAMILTON. The question appears to my mind, to be assuming a very different aspect. There are three parties to this question—the State Bank party; the free bank party, and a party who desire to promote concession between the other two parties, and unite upon some general plan of compromise; and of the third party I am a member. But what does the gentleman from Ripley ask of us by his proposition? Why, that stockholders in the southern portion of the State, should be responsible for the debts of stockholders in the northern part of the State. If connected with a banking system, embracing that provision, he would make me liable for the debts of every other stockholder under that system, in Indiana. I ask gentlemen to look at this matter calmly, and take a common sense view of the subject. I trust the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley will be voted down.

Mr. DOBSON. It seems to me that we ought to settle this matter one way or the other. The gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) cannot object to the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley? In the first place, it is admitted on all hands that the mutual liability clause was the salvation of the old bank. If we have another State Bank in Indiana, I would like to see that feature preserved in its organization; I say it is right and fair. The gentleman, (Mr. Owen,) in his argument, the other day, said the mutual liability clause could be applied to free banks as well as to a State Bank. But to-day the gentleman having slept upon it, does seem to wish it.

Mr. OWEN (interposing). I said the Legislature could enact it for free banks, if they choose.

Mr. DOBSON. I understand the gentleman, and I suppose we all understand him; that it would not keep free banks out of existence. If the plan proposed in reference to free banks be carried out where, then, is there cause for fearing the mutual liability principle? They tell us that the free banks cannot go into operation until there is a sufficient amount of bonds deposited to redeem the circulation, in case of failure. If this be the best security in the world, as the gentleman from Cass says it is, what is the harm of saying that, in addition, "you shall be mutually bound?" If you are good, there is no danger—if you are bad, it will make your circulation good. Then, I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley will be adopted first, and the proposition of the gentleman from Posey afterwards; and not strike out one to insert the other. My idea is to get all the security we can obtain. If these banks have enough of assets to redeem all their paper, there is no fear of their being obliged to pay one another's debts.

Mr. NILES. Mr. PRESIDENT: I am gratified to see that there is more of a disposition, than there has been, among the members of this body, to meet on some fair ground of compromise. It is evident that we can do nothing upon this subject, except by mutual concessions.

The gentleman from Owen must be aware that there is no such restriction in the present Constitution, as that proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley—the mutual liability of branches; and yet, under the old Constitution, there has grown up a system of banking, which seems to be the best ideal of the State Bank party. Why, then, is such a restriction necessary in the new Constitution? Cannot something be trusted to the wisdom of coming legislatures, with the same propriety that the details of legislation have been committed to their predecessors? Surely, all legislative wisdom has not been exhausted, and it will hardly all die out with this Convention. Experience may hereafter show that free banks can, with propriety, be somehow connected together and made, in some way, liable for each others debts; but it is a sufficient argument against the amendment, that such a scheme would be an untried experiment, which might operate badly in practice. Should the future history of the free banking system establish the propriety of such a restriction, it can, at any time, be adopted. Why, then, in addition to all the necessary checks and safe-guards which have been tried elsewhere, should we adopt restrictions which may prove fatal, to the entire scheme of free banks! But I see a serious objection of another kind to the amendment—that, if the banks are to be mutually liable, they must have a common Board of Control, meeting periodically at the capital, or some other point in the State, constituting a great central monied power—an evil which all would wish to avoid.

We propose, in the most stringent form, to require the punctual and uninterrupted redemption of the bills in specie. The details securing that object would be fixed by the Legislature, and in addition, we propose to require ample and readily convertible collateral securities for the redemption of all bills put in circulation, to be deposited with an officer of the State. The offensive and defensive league proposed by the gentleman from Ripley might enable the banks to sustain themselves, even in a state of insolvency; but the derangement to the currency and commerce of the country, from a general crash, would be far greater than from the occasional suspension of a single bank. I will not permit myself to suppose that this amendment was offered with the purpose to embarrass the free bank party. It is time that we should endeavor, in a liberal spirit, to compromise this question, and I hope that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON considered the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley one that would be fatal to free banks. Those who entered into free banking deposited stocks as a security to the public. Was it fair, then, that one man should be liable for the obligations of all others engaged in the business? It was certainly not. The State Bank was not required to deposit stocks; and it was proper, therefore, that all the branches of the institution should be liable, one for the other. He thought this principle should apply exclusively to a State Bank, and at the proper time, would move to add at the end of the section these words: "This provision should not be constructed to apply to free banks."

Mr. BARBOUR. I am in hopes, sir, that the gentleman from Posey will withdraw his proposition. I would not be in favor of it, under any circumstances. I desire to state my reasons why, although a large majority of the Convention will be in favor of absolutely withdrawing from the Legislature the power to suspend specie payments in any instance. The only instance in which it was done, and that, too, sanctioned by the Legislature, would not be objected to by ten members on this floor. It saved the State from ruin and destruction. It was undoubtedly the wisest thing of the times; if it had not been done your banks would, without doubt, have gone by the board, and the prices of every description of property necessarily depreciated very low. So we see that in the only instance where the suspension of specie payments occurred, it operated most advantageously for the community. Why, then, should we impose such a restriction as this? Can we foresee what calamities may fall upon the country? did any of us anticipate the calamities which we have had heretofore? Is it wise to withdraw the fostering influence of the Legislature over the interests of the country? Can we suppose that the Legislature is an enemy of the State, and that it would not adopt the course which prudence would dictate when such calamitous circumstances should fall upon us?

One word in regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley. I regard that proposition, if sustained, as breaking down free banks. If the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) withdraws his motion, and allows us to take a direct vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley, it will be a test vote. I say that if this principle (mutual liability) be adopted in regard to free banks, it will strike the death blow of the system, because, under such circumstances, no man would invest his money in them.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw the amendment, and offer instead of it the following:

"The branches of any bank that may be established with branches, shall be mutually responsible for any bills issued as money."

I will say this was not drawn up by me, but by my friend from Shelby (Mr. Hendricks) and submitted to me. I think that both the free and State Bank men will approve of it.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Posey.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. It is not the intention, I suppose, of any portion of this Convention to establish banks with branches. We do not contemplate having two or three systems of banking in the State, but that we shall have a system established upon a specie basis. My proposition only extends to the mutual liability of the banks in regard to the redemption of the circulation; it goes to nothing else.

It is right that our banking should be under some system which will regulate the circulation in the State. We have adopted no such principle as that contained in the gentleman's proposition (indistinctly heard). We have adopted the principle that the Legislature may establish banking in the State, and that on a specie basis. I apprehend it is not the intention of the Convention that we are to bank in various ways, and on various kinds of capital.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I am glad to see the spirit which now appears to prevail in this Convention. The excitement seems to have calmed down, and I hope we will now go to work like business men whose great anxiety is to give the people a safe currency, always redeemable in specie. The proposition first submitted appears to be one which the friends of the State Bank and of the free banks may all agree upon. I hope, by this time, the discovery has been made that we can do nothing without some concession. We ought to furnish the people with a currency of our own State. If we do not make provision for such a currency, our business will be transacted with the currency of other States; for in such a case it will be as impossible to exclude the currency of other States, as to prevent the wild pigeons from lighting on the trees in our woods. If a State Bank and branches are established, the branches must be responsible for each other. That is right. But the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ripley would extend this mutual liability to both State and free banks. That, I think, is not right; for if we have free banks, it is understood that they are to deposit good security with an officer of the State for the redemption of their issues. This is not required of the State Bank. Then you would make banks that give security for the redemption of their issues, responsible for the obligations of those that give no such security. Therefore, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Posey will be adopted, for that confines the mutual liability to the branches of any bank that may be established with branches. I know that free banks, if organized, must make arrangements to receive each other's bills in payment of debts, and on deposit. If they discredit the paper issued under the provisions of their own system, the free banks can get but a very limited circulation. But it is not right that they should be made responsible for each other's debts, because they will be independent of each other in the management of their business.

Mr. SHOUP. This Convention have but two objects in view—one to furnish to the country a sound currency—the other to establish banks on a specie capital alone. The free bank men are anxious to introduce capital in the shape of stocks; and I apprehend that stocks of the United States are equal to gold or silver. No gentleman, I suppose, will object to introducing into our State capital that might be brought from other sections of the country. Gentlemen, then, should unite to permit the free bank men, as we are called—I would rather say, the independent bank men—to employ United States stocks in the banking business of the State. It is evident to every man, that the specie capital in the State is not commensurate with her commercial requirements. The State Bank men, on the other hand, wish to create capital by authorizing a bank to issue two or three dollars of paper for every dollar it has of specie.

The free bank men desire to augment the capital in the State by issuing a circulating medium upon a stock basis. I think we should unite upon these two plans, and let the Legislature hereafter adopt one or the other, as they may see fit. I am of opinion, too, that this mutual liability principle could be placed on the independent banks; but it is not necessary.

Where the basis is in the the shape of a credit alone, I think the mutual liability clause should be imposed, because there are extraordinary privileges granted in the charter, as in the State Bank for instance. [Cries of "Question!"]

Mr. NAVE. I ask gentlemen if one of the first objects of every member of the Convention should not be to furnish the people with a sound and safe circulating medium? I take it for granted that it is. If, therefore, it be necessary we should furnish such a circulating medium, I ask the reason why we should place a restriction upon one system of banking, and not place it upon the other? Can any gentleman give me a satisfactory reason why it should be done? Sir, there is no man on this floor who can do it. A proposition was adopted requiring banking to be on a specie foundation actually paid in; and, unless we change this feature in the Constitution, we restrict the one and not the other.

Mr. OWEN (interposing and Mr. N. giving way). With the pleasure of the gentleman, I will say that we propose this restriction shall apply just as much to free banks as to any other, if we make any banks with branches. But if they be separate, individual banks, that have no connection with one another, or, as a gentleman said, "some in the northern and some in the southern part of the State," it is not to apply. It is not fair, as regards individual banks.

Mr. NAVE. The explanation is not satisfactory. I ask how you can rely upon the security and solvency of the free banks, unless you make them mutually responsible? I say it is the only way by which you can obtain a sound currency for the State, if we should bank upon the free banking system. I look upon banking as an evil to the country; but being instructed to go for a State Bank, I stand up here to do so. I do not, therefore, want to have the State Bank restricted, if we do not restrict the free banks also. I say the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley contains principles that will secure to the people a sound currency. I would ask, then, why gentlemen will vote against it. They cannot do so with any show of consistency.

Mr. KENT. In order to meet the views of the gentleman last up, I will move to add the following—

The PRESIDENT. It would not be in order now.

Mr. KENT. Then I will read it:

"That any State Bank which may be established in this State shall give the same security as the free banks, and be mutually responsible for the bills they issue as money."

Mr. HAMILTON. The free banks ought to deposit stocks, because they are not mutually liable. Then, on the other hand, the State Bank ought not to deposit stocks, because they are mutually liable.

Mr. KENT. This is the position taken by the gentleman who spoke just before I rose; it is not my proposition.

The question being upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Posey,

The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, were taken, and resulted—yeas 115, nays 24—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hugin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—115.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Foster, Frisbie, Hall, Hawkins, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, March, Moore, Nave, Prather, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Tague, Walpole, and Mr. President—24.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. DOBSON. I offer the following amendment—

Mr. READ of Clark. I move that the Convention adjourn.

SEVERAL VOICES. Let us hear it read.

The amendment was then read. It is as follows:

“The Legislature shall have power to contract loans for the purpose of establishing a State Bank.”

A VOICE. No sir-ee. [Laughter.]

The question being upon the motion to adjourn,

It was decided in the affirmative, and then The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. MARCH moved to amend the section by striking out all after the word “responsible,” and inserting:

“The branches of any bank that may be established with branches shall be mutually liable for all the notes, debts, or engagements created in the business of banking by each other.”

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Delaware, that it is not in order to move to strike out what the Convention has adopted. The motion of the gentleman is to strike out what was adopted by the Convention, before they adjourned this morning.

Mr. MARCH. The section, as it now stands, simply relates to the establishment of a State Bank with branches. Now I want all the branches to be responsible for all the engagements of each other. That is a feature of the State Bank which has saved it thus far, and I think it would be better for the community that we should have all the restrictions that we can have, thrown around any system of banking that may be adopted, without so far cramping the banks in their legitimate operations, as to prevent them from doing business. If the amendment I have offered be out of order on the ground that it proposes to strike out what has already been adopted by the Convention, I will withdraw it and propose to amend the section by adding, after the word “responsible,” the words “for all the debts, notes, and engagements of each other.”

Mr. HAMILTON. If you establish a new State Bank with branches, you must hold out some inducements for the investment of capital in that bank. The great object in granting bank charters, is to enable the people of the country to do the business of the country, by giving them a circulating medium. Now we have already decided that the State shall not be a partner in any bank. and I am opposed to throwing such restrictions around any banking system as will be likely to prevent men of capital from taking stock in it. If that should be done you will have no banks whatever, and those who have capital to invest, will seek for more safe and more profitable modes of investment. By the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, you would make each bank responsible for all the deposits which might be made in any other of the branches. This I hold to be wrong. When the depositor takes his money to a bank, he takes it there for safety, or perhaps with the view of obtaining a little interest. It is a mere matter of contract between him and the banker. The public are in no way concerned in it. The banker has to run the risk of the redemption of the currency deposited with him, and the depositor takes the risk of the banker refunding the deposit when called for. There is no general principle involved here. It is just the same as if I leave my umbrella in a neighbor's shop, not wishing the trouble of carrying it, I taking the risk of his returning it to me when called for. It is, as I have already said, a mere matter of contract.

Now, I do hope that gentlemen will come to this question in a spirit of compromise—that those taking the extremes on this question will be disposed to meet each other half way. I think we ought to leave it with the Legislature to establish a State Bank, if they think proper, when the charter of the present bank expires. On the other hand, let me say that I trust gentlemen who are so much in favor of a State Bank will make some concessions, and meet the gentlemen who are favorable to a system of free banking. If you adopt this amendment, I say unequivocally and beyond the fear of contradiction, that you will not be able to have any bank with branches that shall be mutually liable to the depositor. I do trust the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BORDEN. I had designed, before the question was finally disposed of, to have given my views in regard to the subject of banking; but under the present feelings of the Convention, I am not willing to trespass upon their time. I will merely say, that in voting for the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) in opposition to that of the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) I did so for the purpose of effecting a compromise. I was disposed in the first instance to the vote with each party to defeat the plan of the other, but finding that some banking system must be adopted. I am now disposed to vote with each in good faith to endeavor to make as good a system as possible. Although I voted in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Posey, I shall be compelled to vote against it, when the question is taken on its final passage.

I would observe here, that both the advocates of a State Bank and the free banking system have, in debating the respective merits of their plans, occupied much of the time of this Convention, while those who are opposed to all banks of issue have not been heard at all. Not a single speech on that side of the question has been made on this floor—the gentlemen taking other views of the question have been heard with much patience and attention. I shall, however, embrace the earliest opportunity of giving my views in opposition to all banks whatever, if the occasion be presented.

One other remark, while I am up. This morning I took occasion to ask the gentleman from Putnam, why State Banks, as well as free banks, should not be required to deposit securities for the redemption of their paper. Sir, I see no reason why a State Bank should not be under as much obligation to deposit securities for the redemption of its issues, as a free bank. Sir, the Bank of England, which is, perhaps, the safest bank in the world, has one provision in its charter to prevent its issuing notes beyond its specie or other securities to redeem them; and I see no reason why a State Bank, established in Indiana, should not be restricted in its issues, to the amount of specie or State Bonds which it may have on hand to redeem them. I believe that the security required by those who advocate the free bank system would be better than that offered by those who advocate the State bank system. Here you have a State bank, with a circulation of near four millions of dollars and only one million of specie at the back of it; and if that bank, like the Bank of England, were required to give security for her issues, you would then pretty near approach to the free banking system. This is all I have to say at present, except that I shall endeavor, in good faith, to assist each party to perfect their systems, reserving to myself the right to vote against them all.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Allen asks me why a State Bank should not be compelled to give the same kind of security for its issues, as is proposed by the advocates of free banking? I gave one reason this morning. I stated that the branches of a State Bank were made mutually liable for the issues of each other, while the free banks were released from this kind of liability. This is one reason. For the purpose of making State Banks safe, they were required to deposit dollar for dollar, in State or United States stocks; and to make up for this, they were released from the mutual liability principle. If you make all the branches of a State Bank mutually liable for the issues of each other, and compel them to deposit securities besides, you place it in an unfair position in comparison with other banks, thus making them give a double security.

Mr. MARCH. The gentleman from Allen (Mr. Hamilton) misunderstands the force of this amendment. It is to apply to a State Bank with branches. I have not, myself, any great degree of confidence in any system of banking, established for the purpose of furnishing a circulating medium, on the principles by which banks are at present regulated; but the constituency which I represent, are in favor of a well-regulated and well-guarded State Bank with branches, as the safest and best system, all things considered; and I expect, in good faith, to vote to carry out that measure. The old State Bank and its branches were made mutually responsible. Here is the section. [Mr. M. read the section.]

"That no new branch could be established or located without the consent of every one of the branches now in existence—and not that the stockholders are not individually liable for all the debts of each branch.

Mr. MARCH [continuing]. The most dangerous of all banks would be a mother bank which was not responsible for the engagements of its branches. If they are partners they should be mutually responsible for every engagement—every debt of every kind created in the business of banking.

A MEMBER called for the reading of the section, as proposed to be amended.

The section was accordingly read by the Secretary.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware.

MR. MARCH. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. HENDRICKS. I desire to give one or two reasons why I think this amendment ought not to be adopted. So far as the circulation of the branches is concerned, a board of directors composed of representatives from all the branches can regulate the business of each, except so far as discounts are concerned. Beyond the issue therefore, I think they should not be made responsible. I have an amendment which I shall offer when it is in order, to the effect that each stockholder in each branch shall be responsible for the issues of each branch in the same proportion as his stock bears to the whole stock of the bank.

MR. OWEN. I desire to say in regard to this matter that I should like to vote as the friends of the State Bank desire we should vote. I do not wish to vote for anything which would have a tendency to destroy the State Bank, because by and by when we come to offer our restrictions I hope gentlemen will vote for them.

MR. FOSTER. I move to amend by striking out "the branches of any bank that may be established with branches." It appears to me that this is wholly unnecessary—mere surplusage. I wonder how it would read in our Constitution even after it had gone through the hands of the smoothing-iron committee.

THE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Monroe, that his motion would not be in order.

MR. FOSTER. I presume it will be in order for me to make some remarks before I offer my motion whatever it may be.

THE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

MR. FOSTER. The gentleman from Delaware wants to make branches of banks responsible for all the liability of each other. Now this it appears to me, is entirely out of the question. That they should be liable for the issues of each other I have no objection to, because this is a matter a board composed of representatives from each branch can control; but to say that each branch shall be liable for all the engagements of the other, appears to me preposterous. Why, sir, any one branch might go into speculation of the most ruinous character, and that too entirely without the knowledge or consent of any or of all the other branches. Over matters of this kind no system of control can be had, and it is entirely out of the question in such case to think of making the branches responsible. I am opposed to the whole of these amendments and cannot but regard them as an insidious attempt to undo what has already been done. If the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware were adopted, the result would be that it would strike out the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley, which is fair and correct, and I cannot but repeat that this is an insidious attempt, and not the first one either that has been made, to destroy the vantage ground which we have got, and the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) knows it. [Applause.] If the gentleman will, let him withdraw his amendment, and we will establish it as we please. He tells you that we may do what we please, and yet he attempts to thrust this amendment down our throats. [Laughter and applause.] I trust that the friends of the State Bank will stand firm. [Applause.] We have got the vantage ground now, and we ought to keep it. [Renewed applause.] We have already passed a section, and I am perfectly willing that not a single thing in regard to banks should be inserted in the Constitution beyond what has passed this day. There are very evidently gentlemen who would throw sand in the eyes of others to prevent them from seeing the truth. But I hope the friends of the State Bank will not allow sand to be thrown in their eyes, but hold fast to what they have got. I hope that the Convention will adopt this amendment, and that they will then vote down both it, and that of the gentleman from Posey.

MR. DUNN of Jefferson. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. March,) it appears to me places a very unnecessary restriction upon a State Bank. I think it is quite sufficient to make the branches responsible for the issues of each other without adding to that a responsibility for transactions over which there can be no mutual control. If a man chooses to deposit his money in any particular branch of a bank, that branch must be responsible, and, not all the branches, because it is impossible for them to know what deposits are made. To save the time of the Convention, therefore, I will move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware on the table.

MR. MARCH. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows—yeas 71, nays 41:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beeson, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cola, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks,

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. BERRY. I propose to amend the section by adding the following:

“And such banks shall be compelled to accept of as many partners or branches as shall offer to comply with the provisions of this Constitution.”

The question being taken upon the proposed amendment it was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is upon the adoption of the section as amended.

A MEMBER. What is the amendment Mr. President?

The amendment was read by the Secretary as follows:

“Branches of any bank that may be established with branches, shall be mutually responsible for each other's liabilities, upon bills or notes issued as money.”

The question was then taken on adopting the section as amended, and it was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. WALPOLE. Before the question is taken on the engrossment, Mr. President, I have an amendment which I wish to offer. It is as follows:

“The General Assembly may provide by law for the renewal of the present loan invested in State bank stock, or may provide for or negotiate separate loans of money, to be applied to stock, on behalf of the State, in any bank hereafter incorporated.”

Mr. MILROY. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE. I ask the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Allen, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermilion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Harbott, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of White, Logan, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—91.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Hall, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—52.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I shall move the following amendment, and when I have offered it, I shall move the previous question. [Cries of “No, no, no!”]

Mr. PETTIT. Most certainly I shall. The amendment I offer is as follows:

“The State shall not be a stockholder in any bank, after the expiration of the present bank charter.”

I call for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was not sustained.

Mr. PRATHER. I offer the following amendment:

“There shall not be incorporated in the State any bank or banking company, for the purpose of issuing bills of credit, or bills payable to order or bearer.”

Mr. KELSO. I desire to say a word or two in regard to the first amendment. The proposition is that the State of Indiana shall not be a partner in a State bank, or hold any stock therein. The very gentleman who takes occasion to make this proposition, and to force its passage under the lash of the previous question, is the very gentleman who, the other day, denounced all men who would ask for exclusive privileges, and all men who would submit to them—the one class as a set of thieves and robbers, and the other as a set of cowards and traitors. Now the only chance on earth by which all the people can reap a little benefit from this system of banking, is to allow the State to be the owner of stock; and if the bank can make money by its operations, why not permit the people to share the profits of whatever stock the State may have in it.

Now I wish to know if the gentleman from Tippecanoe comes within his own rule? He denies to all, except those who have money and are able to purchase stock, the privilege of banking. Every man who has not money, is cut short of participating in the profits, in any way whatever; whereas, if the State is permitted to take an equal share with an individual in the stock, then every single citizen of the State would be entitled to an equal share of the profits. I say, sir, that such a proposition, to come from that gentleman, comes with a bad grace. If we are to have a State bank at all, I hope we will have it on the same principles as the present State bank. There should be, it is true, some additional restrictions which do not now exist, but I maintain that the State ought to have the privilege of taking stock, if it be found to be necessary or advantageous.

Mr. PETTIT. So far from the proposition I have offered having violated any general principle I have laid down to-day, or at any other time, it is directly and strictly in accordance with every one of them. It directly says, in fact, that no man shall be compelled to take stock or to have an interest in any bank whatever—that the State shall not compel any man, or all men, to take stock. This is nothing more nor less than the proposition of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Hamilton,) following the one we have now under consideration. In report No. 25 we have the following:

"The State shall not be a stock-holder in any bank, after the expiration of the charter of the present State bank."

I have only transposed the words in offering the amendment which I have submitted to the Convention. It was said here, a day or two ago, that it was universally conceded that the State was not to be a holder of stock in any banking institution. And is it now, for the first time, pretended by any gentleman on this floor that the State is to take stock in any bank?

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIT. The gentleman from Hancock says, "yes sir;" that is, that the State may take stock, in order that every man may derive a profit from banking. I illustrated that proposition very clearly and satisfactorily, I think, by the story of the boys swapping jackets.

Sir, what is the advantage of the State taking any such stock? The gentleman says that it has been taken heretofore without loss. I see by the Auditor's report that the State has taken, at various times, stock to the amount of two millions, four hundred and thirteen thousand, dollars; while the report from the bank tells you that the capital of the State in the bank is only one million and six thousand dollars, thus making a dead loss of one million four hundred and seven thousand dollars, already lost to the State by taking stock in your State bank; for the report of that institution tells you, that out of the $2,413,000, you have now placed to the credit of the State only $1,006,000. But, sir, get round that statement as you please, the State of Indiana has pledged the people, the farms, and all the property of the State, that the people may have an interest in banking. The State bank says that we have got for all these bonds $1,006,000, and that we have made no loss. But, sir, let me ask, is this establishment wound up yet? Look at the debts which have been incurred. The report speaks of other resources. Why, sir, what are they? They are just so much "wildcat" or "blue dog"—nothing more than broken bank paper, to re-imburse the State for the $1,407,000. That is the history of it precisely.

Now, sir, I offer this amendment upon the broad principle that no man shall be compelled to be a banker; that bankers may choose for themselves, as men in all other business do. Nor do I hold to the doctrine that bankers ought to be responsible for each other's obligations further than as they become partners with each other. Sir, I would just as soon say that all farmers and all merchants in Indiana, or all shoemakers, or tailors, should be responsible for the debts and liabilities of each other. There would be just as much reason in the one proposition as in the other. Just as soon would I say this, as to establish a State Bank upon the faith of the State, in order that a profit may be made out of the people. Just as soon would I establish a State dry goods store, or a State grocery, or a State farm, or a State slaughter house, or a State pork packing establishment, and thus have the State monopolize every species of business of every kind. Tell me that there is no difference in principle, that the State should draw all the bills of exchange and issue all the currency? Why, sir, you might just as well tell me that the State should do all the farming and shoemaking, and tailoring, and every other sort of thing, and then carry its produce and its wares to market.

Sir, this is none of the legitimate business of the State. Protection to life and property and character, is all that is asked or required of the State. This is a proposition which coming as it does, from the bank committee itself, I had thought would meet with no opposition from the supporters of a State Bank. It simply says that the State shall not force the citizens of Indiana to become bankers, simply leaving them to bank or not to bank, as they please.

Mr. KELSO. Now, it would have been very easy to have told the whole story while the gentleman was at it. There have been issued $2,413,000 of bonds, but I suppose the Auditor is liable to be mistaken like all other men. The loss that has been sustained—if any loss there has been—is not the fault of the State or of the bank in any way whatever.

The gentlemen from Tippecanoe, says that by the proposition, he has offered her provides that no man need become a banker unless he pleases. Now, if the State is to take stock, it is to be taken for the people, and she does it upon the authority of the representatives of the people; and if my representative decides that I, as an individual of the State, shall take stock in a bank, it is done with my consent, for I send that man to the Legislature to do business for me; and if he votes for a charter providing that the State shall take so much stock in a State Bank, then it is done with my approbation.

The loss then, whatever it may have been, cannot be chargeable to the bank, nor shall I stop now to inquire further about it. As I understand it, however, the State sent a man to the east to sell her bonds, in order to raise cash to put into the coffers of the bank. That man sold the bonds on credit, and we had the misfortune to lose $800,000. He, no doubt, believed that the money would be realized in due time; but it was not so realized; and these are misfortunes to which all men and all countries are liable.

Now, if banks are profitable at all, there is only one fair way in which this profit can be realized and divided, and that is, that all should be put upon an equality—rich and poor, alike; and that is that the State should take capital stock. We will have men in the General Assembly, as honest, as wise, as well instructed, and as ready to do the business of the people as we are, and they will take stock for the people, or decline to do so, just as the people may direct them. I think we should leave that question open, and not tie up the hands of the people in every corner. We have already said that the State should be prohibited from borrowing money for any purpose, except to repel invasion. That is not simply tying up the hands of the Legislature—it is going a point beyond that and tying up the hands of the people. We, the servants of the people, undertake to compel them to act within certain limits, whereas, we should leave them to act freely by themselves. I maintain that it is improvident and imprudent for us to introduce any such restriction into the Constitution, as will thus tie up the hands of the people.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to lay the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I call for a division of the question.

The question was then taken on laying the amendment to the amendment, on the table, and a division being asked for, there were for the motion—yeas 67, nays not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid upon the table.

The question being upon laying the amendment on the table,

Mr. PETTIT. I ask for the yeas and nays, sir, upon this resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 62, nays 82—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Marchi, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Zenor, and Mr. President—62.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warlick, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—82.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN. It is evident that the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, is not broad enough. It is perfectly clear that if it be wrong to loan the credit of the State in aid of a bank, it is equally wrong to loan it in aid of any individual, corporation or association. I move to amend the amendment, by adding these words:

“Nor shall the credit of the State ever be given or loaned in aid of any person, association or corporation; nor shall the State hereafter become a stockholder in any corporation or association.”

Mr. KILGORE moved that the section and pending amendments be laid upon the table.

The question being on laying the section and pending amendment upon the table,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and having been ordered were taken, and resulted—yeas 53, nays 92—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Nave, Newman, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—90.

So the section and amendment were not laid upon the table.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Posey to the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

MR. GOOTEE demanded the previous question.

The call for the previous question was decided in the affirmative—ayes 51, noes 47.

The question being, Shall the main question be now put?

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question being first upon the amendment presented by the gentleman from Posey, the yeas and nays were ordered and taken with the following result—yeas 87, nays 57—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—87.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—57.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

MR. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays; and the same being ordered, were taken, and resulted—yeas 89, nays 56:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—89.

NAYS.—Messrs. So the amendment as amended was adopted.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

The question was decided in the affirmative, yeas 78, noes not counted.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. WALPOLE offered the following as an additional section:

"No person being a citizen of a foreign government shall be a stockholder in any bank, banking company, or association; nor shall such person subscribe for stock in any bank, banking company, or association, in the name of any citizen of the United States. Nor shall stock be subscribed in such bank, banking company, or association, for the use of any foreign citizen or corporation. All stock subscribed for in contravention of this section, will revert to the State for the use of common schools."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to amend so that bank notes or bills shall not be issued on State stocks, or on stocks of any of the United States, or stocks of other States of the Union.

Mr. SHOUP. I move to lay both propositions on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE. I call for a division of the question.

The question being upon laying the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 78, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Hardin, Hovey, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—78.

NAYS.—Messrs. So the amendment was laid upon the table.

The question then turned upon laying Mr. Walpole's amendment upon the table, and the yeas and nays being ordered and taken resulted—yeas 68, nays 75, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hamilton, Helm, Hovey, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—69.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Davis of Madison, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foste, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbelt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolf, Zenor, and Mr. President—75.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the original section offered by the gentleman from Hancock.

Mr. PETTIT. I have no great predilection for Banking, at all. But it seems to me, that if there be any advantage in having banks in the State, there can be no objection to those who live abroad sending their capital here and having the banks carried on upon it. The gentleman from Allen says there is not capital enough in the State. Now, however, it is attempted to prevent capital from coming in here. I do not see any propriety in this proposition. For my part, if a man in England, France, Italy, or in Brazil, will send his money here and get men to circulate it for him, I do not think it is going to do the country any hurt.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I am going to propose an amendment to which I think no gentleman can object. This is what I propose: "Every bank established under the provisions of this Constitution, declaring six per cent. profit upon the stock paid in, shall pay over to the State for the use of common schools, one-half per cent; and every bank dividing ten per cent. shall pay over to the State one per cent. for the use of common schools, as prescribed by law." I would ask gentlemen if they be not willing to charge these foreign stockholders one half or one per cent. upon their most extravagant profits?

Mr. WALPOLE. My object is not to exclude foreign capital as a bank basis. It is well known to every one that the principal part of the bonds for the internal improvements were held by three bankers in Europe—the Rothschilds, Sir Harsley Palmer, and the Barings. The question is, shall they realize all the profit? That gentleman (to Mr. Pettit) knows that half a million of these bonds are held by Lenier, of Madison, in trust for these people. My object, sir, is to force these men to disgorge these bonds, and sell them to the people, and let them become the bankers. If you bank upon bonds, let them be sent into the hands of the people.

I would here remark, that the reason I voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley was because he excluded assistance from other States. My proposition refers only to foreign capitalists; that is the difference.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. If any gentleman had proposed to this Convention that we should bank simply upon the bonds of this State, the bonds of other States, or the bonds of the United States, there might be some plausibility in the arguments of the gentleman from Hancock. But no person has presented or advocated so ridiculous a proposition. Banks that give security for the redemption of their issues, will be required to keep on hand just so much specie as is necessary for the prompt redemption of their circulation.

Mr. WALPOLE (interposing). How much will that be?

Mr. DUNN. The amount will of course depend in a great degree upon the confidence the community may have in the solvency and good management of the banks. Now, sir, if our bondholders residing abroad, think proper to send their bonds here and deposit them as the security for the issue of bills, and accompanying those bonds with whatever amount of specie is necessary for the redemption of the bills, I do not think we shall be greatly injured by the operation. We need more capital in this State, more means for active trade. My greatest fear in regard to the free bank system is that it will not hold out sufficient inducements for the investment of capital. It must be remembered that the market is now glutted with stocks which are offered to capitalists at very low rates. These stocks, such as railroad bonds, will yield I think, a greater profit to the purchasers, than they could make by engaging in free banking.

As to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) in regard to the bonus to be charged for the privilege of banking, I think that is a matter that properly belongs to legislation. When the privilege of banking is asked for, the Legislature may require such bonus as under all the circumstances may be deemed proper. If the bonus be fixed in the Constitution it may be so large as to operate as a prohibition of banking, or it may be a less amount than would be willingly paid. I have listened with pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Hamilton,) the chairman of the committee on banking. He has long been actively engaged in business, and I think we will find the suggestions of that gentleman on this subject always worthy of our attentive consideration.

Mr. WALPOLE. The free bank men are very sensitive when a proposition of this kind is introduced, and so is the gentleman from Jefferson. When a proposition is made to restrict their system, their cry is, "it is within the province of the Legislature to do it." Well, the Legislature, when incorporating a bank might say, there shall be no suspension of specie payments authorized by their charter. But they are not content with that—they must have it in the Constitution. Now, I want this thing to work like a two-edged sword. I want to have a general restriction thrown around the circulation.

Mr. KELSO. I rise merely to make an inquiry. I wish to know what has become of the old Jacksonian theory, that foreign capital should be kept out of the country. We used to hear, in Jackson's messages, that it was dangerous to invite foreign capital into the country. If that were democratic doctrine in Jackson's time, why is it not democratic doctrine now-a-days? Here is a proposition to prevent foreign capitalists from coming in to bank in our State, and I think it is a good safe-guard for the people, if the old Jacksonian doctrine were correct, which I think was, and is still. I think we ought to adopt this very section. I should like to see the vote taken: those who lectured us on Jackson's messages, I hope, will vote for the proposition.

Mr. SHOUP. There is a great difference between the old United States Bank, and the bank we are now speaking of. [Laughter.] That, I understand to have been a monopoly, instituted by the country. We propose to establish a general system of banking; we should, therefore, by no means, prevent the investment of foreign capital among us. Let them come with their capital and their labor; we can use both to advantage in this State. If the investment of this capital referred to, were a monopoly, I would vote to exclude the whole of it. But it is not; it induces competition, and competition is what we want.

Mr. DOBSON expressed himself as being in favor of the proposition before the Convention. Foreigners would derive all the benefit resulting from the banking operations of the State, by reason of the capital they had invested through the medium of their agents. By means of their capital they would wield an influence in the State, which no men should possess: it was too strong a power to have established in our midst. He thought there should be no opposition to inserting this clause.

Mr. COLFAX. The echoes have scarcely died away, of speeches of devotion to foreigners, made by members on recent occasions, and this Convention have, by an overwhelming vote, adopted a section, extending to foreigners the right to vote, after they have resided in the United States one year. Now, as I understand this proposition, it says, "no citizen of a foreign country shall have the right to subscribe stock in a bank in this State." Natives of Great Britain, France, Germany, &c., are still, though they may have the right to vote here, citizens of foreign governments, until they are naturalized, after five years residence, and swear allegiance to our institutions and laws, and yet gentlemen speak of their interests, and of our devotion to them, and say, "you may vote, but you shall not bank with us!"

Mr. RARIDEN (in his seat). You are mistaken in this.

A VOICE. No he is not.

Mr. COLFAX. Foreigners are not citizens of this country until they are naturalized: even England, after we naturalize them, claims them still—she says they cannot renounce the allegiance they once owed to her.

Now, sir, as we have gone so far, I desire to go farther, and say they shall have the privilege of banking, the same as our other citizens. If it is a profitable business, why shut out from it any who are voters with us, because they first saw the light of day in some foreign clime.

Mr. NILES. It is with difficulty that I have persuaded myself to believe that the Convention is soberly proposing to adopt this section. If this is all in jest, or if it is a mere scheme by one party in this Convention, to wear out the patience of others, it does seem that the matter has been carried far enough. Is it possible, I would ask, that gentlemen are really unwilling to permit foreign capital to come into the State? How could the richest man in Europe endanger our liberties, by sending his capital to Madison, to be managed by our citizens, or by coming here with it himself? Are men to be presumed to be outlaws, and the common enemies of the human race, because they happened to be born east of the Atlantic, and because they are not beggars? Instead of excluding, I would invite foreign capital, and would permit the foreigner equally with our own citizens, to invest his capital in manufactures, agriculture, banking, or any other lawful business. He would assist in paying our taxes, and contribute to the general prosperity of the State, no less than if he had been born here.

I trust this subject will be treated seriously. There seemed to be a prospect, this morning, that we could settle this question of banking in a spirit of candor. Let that spirit be shown on both sides, and we can agree in two hours. But if such propositions as this are constantly to be forced upon us, we never can agree while the world stands.

Mr. WOLFE. Sir, it seems strange to me that gentlemen should change their notions so soon on a matter of so much importance as the one under discussion. The doctrine contended for the other day was, that, as banking is profitable, we had better provide for banks at home, and let our citizens reap the benefit in preference to those of Ohio, Kentucky, and other States. But now these gentlemen contend that not only citizens of Ohio, Kentucky, and other States, may come in, or send in their funds or stocks upon which to bank, but that the door shall be thrown open for England and the whole world, and give to others what properly belongs to ourselves. If that doctrine then was right, this now is wrong. Certainly gentlemen should not be so forgetful of what they say, or inconsistent in what they do. I have been an attentive listener here during this discussion; I have not said one word on the bank proposition, except on re-committing one section with instructions, which I opposed for fear of delay; nor do I now propose to discuss the merits or demerits of the Bank. But, sir, is there not great danger, if we do what is asked and desired to be done, of bringing on ourselves the same train of evils or state of things that occurred in 1837, which was brought on by improvident legislation, the effects of which we will feel for an hundred years yet to come. The same causes will produce the same effects. Sir, I regard it as a very doubtful policy whether we should open the door of free banking or general banking to our citizens; and certainly the policy becomes more doubtful to induce foreigners to bring in or send in our bonds, and make them the basis of our circulating medium. I am fearful that the remedy or cure sought will aggravate the disease rather than cure it. It would be very desirable for us to get hold of our bonds in a legitimate way, but not by producing distress and ruin throughout the State. I have yet to learn how an individual or a State can create a good, sound currency on their indebtedness as a basis. A great deal has been said by gentlemen about banks. If banks be such monsters as they are represented to be, I am satisfied that we should go against all banks. For, according to the argument used, all banks are certainly the most fraudulent and corrupt things that have ever been created in any country. Our constituents, after reading our debates on this question, will be astonished that we made any provision in our amended Constitution for banks. Much has been said by some gentlemen about exchanges, and that we could not get along without bills of exchange. Here permit me to remark that our corn in sacks, wheat, flour, pork, beef, and in fact the whole surplus productions of our State, put up in portable shape, shipped South or East, act and serve as bills of exchange. In the former direction, the balance of trade is decidedly in our favor, and will soon balance in the latter. I have no desire to detain the Convention; but, at the proper time, if I can get the floor, I will move to lay the whole subject on the table for the present.

On motion of Mr. DUNN of Perry,
The Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, JAN. 14, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to amendment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. FARROW, a delegate from Putnam county.

SPECIAL ORDER.

The special order of the day, being the fourth section of article twenty, was taken up for consideration.

The pending question being the motion to amend offered by the gentleman from Crawford,

Mr. OWEN. I move to postpone the consideration of the special order, until Monday next at ten o'clock. [Cries of "No! no!" and "Consent!"]

Mr. PETTIT. I really hope the motion of the gentleman from Posey will prevail. We have just got in the centre of the bank question, and I think we had better get through with it, before proceeding with any further business. Let us postpone the special order.

The question was put, and, upon a division—ayes 59, noes not counted—it was decided in the affirmative.

IMMIGRATION OF PEOPLE OF COLOR.

Mr. BROOKBANK. I hold in my hand a petition, signed by ninety-one persons, residents of Union county, asking the Convention not to prohibit the immigration of people of color into the State, or to preclude them from giving testimony in courts of justice. Being personally acquainted with most of the signers of the petition, I know them to be some of the most respectable citizens of the county; and that their sentiments in this petition are a fair index of the common sentiment in the county. I know no better disposition of it than to lay it on the table, and have it taken up with the report of the committee on the subject, when that comes before us for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT. The first thing in order is the section, on its third reading, declaring that the branches of any bank with branches shall be mutually responsible for each other's circulation, and that the State shall not be a partner in, nor loan her credit to any bank or corporation.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to lay the section upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT moved a call of the Convention; but the call was not sustained.

The question being upon laying the section upon the table,

It was decided in the negative—ayes 58, noes 78.

So the section was not laid upon the table.

The question recurred upon the motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. RARIDEN. I think the last vote is indicative that it will not be postponed. On yesterday it was my understanding, without particularly saying who it was, or having any understanding with any one, of the purpose of this Convention, viz.: that the members of this body who were in favor of a State Bank, should organize it, and build it up according to their own notions of propriety. There was nothing, to be sure, offensive in it. Then, the gentlemen who were in favor of a free bank, it was understood, were to adjust them and make them stand together; that was unquestionably the understanding of this House. The moment that the prospect of a State Bank, organized as the present State Bank, came up—and here let me say I do not at all desire that the State should hold stock in a bank, but would like the matter left open so that the State could enter the field at any time, in order to restore the currency—I found then that the advocates of the free bank system did not wish to organize their banks until the State was bound hand and foot. They are not willing to invest their money in the free banks unless the State is forever tied down. That is the object of the latter clause of this section; it is to protect the free banks, if we should have any, against any assault of the State. I take it that those men who are in favor of a State Bank do not consider it a matter of any importance whether the State has stock in the Bank or not. But they wish to keep the action of the institution under the control, to some extent, of the State. They want to put it in the power of the State, and keep it there in case the bank should travel out of its proper sphere, to act upon the subject, under a constitutional enactment. Now, gentlemen who are in favor of free banks, do not appear desirous of embarking in them until the State is tied down; that is the manifest object of the latter portion of the section. Gentlemen may tell me "that these banks will never do wrong." Well, it may be that the projectors of the system seriously entertain that idea. But what did we see on yesterday? Look at them and their actions. When my friend from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) proposed that stock should not be held by foreigners, were they not raised up at once? And when I make the proposition which I will hereafter make, "that no foreign stockholders shall be permitted to vote for the directors of such bank," you will find them, to a man, voting against the proposition. Well, sir, do we not know, offensive as the old United States bank was, that foreign stockholders were not allowed to vote for directors in that institution? Now, gentlemen have no fears about it, and you find them voting against the prohibition prohibiting foreigners holding stock in this State. I have heard it said on this floor, not upon any certain data of knowledge I admit, that it is proposed to bring in foreigners, whose capital is to constitute our banking basis. If so, they must control the currency of the country. Where does this ceaseless free bank cry come from? From the very points at which the agencies of these foreign stockholders will be established. These men are deeply interested as far as the stock is concerned; they want to get rid of it—to dispose of it for free banking or any other object, so that they can get it off their hands advantageously.

I heard of this thing of foreign influence for twenty years, and I heard it until it produced an effect. The dangerous and fatal effects of putting the circulating medium of the country under foreign influence is too vivid a remembrance to be easily effaced. I admit again that I, nor perhaps any man, want to have State money in a State Bank; but we want the State power protection and authority to direct, in their proper sphere, whatever other banking institutions that may grow up.

What do gentlemen mean when they wage this ceaseless kind of war upon the State? Is it proper to take every weapon out of the hands of the State. But not content with embarking their money in this enterprise they needs must take every weapon, offensive and defensive, from the people, that they may have a fair chance to operate upon their necessities, and the wants of the country. It is not that we want the State money to be hazarded in any bank, but to have the power of the State controlling whatever institution for banking purposes that may grow up hereafter. The other side want to cripple it, for is it not virtually crippling the power of the State when they say the State shall have no interest in the bank? Certainly it is.

Mr. PETTIT. If I had not been a very close observer I do not know whether I would be able to discriminate as to which section the gentleman had been debating. I understand the question is upon the indefinite postponement of the section which we have just now refused to lay upon the table. Yet I would have been led to conclude that the gentleman from Wayne was debating the section introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole,) prohibiting foreigners from holding stock in this State.

Now sir, I will not at this time undertake to answer again the objections to allowing foreigners to bring their stock here, but for my life I cannot see any danger or difficulty in it. It has been alleged by all the bankers in the house, that there is not sufficient stock or capital in the State to create the necessary circulation. Then why, sir, is there an objection to allowing the Frenchman, the Irishman, the Englishman or the Brazilian to bring his capital here and put it under the protection and restriction of your laws and go into banking?

Mr. RARIDEN. The proposition was not to prevent his coming here, but to prevent his sending his money here.

Mr. PETTIT. It is the money of the foreigner we want. That was your argument during the times of your internal improvements. Is there, sir, any such thing as consistency? Men forget, from day to day, their own actions. What, I ask, are you now banking on, but foreign capital? You sent out your bonds and sold them for money—one-half of it came here—the other is sunk or lost. You are now, I say, banking on foreign capital. Was the cry of "foreign influence" put forward when you wanted the capital of the foreigner to dig your canals and build your McAdamized roads? Does the farmer care, if he have a drove of horses or hogs to sell, and wants money, whether it comes from a Briton or an American? It is a mere bagatelle, that does not deserve liberal consideration.

Now a word in reference to the indefinite postponement of the section. The gentleman (Mr. Rariden) undertakes to get around the question. He says that all he wants is to have the power left with the State to control banks. There is not a line in the section, sir, that can be understood to divest the State of that power. That is not the bone of contention with that gentleman; it is because the section prohibits the State from borrowing two millions, and ultimately lending the money to the bankers. It is this withdrawal of power to borrow money and invest it, by the State, that draws the life-blood from the State Bank. I say that virtually, preventing the State from taking stock, prevents a set of men going together and issuing the credit and money of the State for their own exclusive advantage. To do that, is to have a State Bank—not to do it, is not to have a State Bank. Where is there a line in the section, that says the State shall not have any control over the banks which may be hereafter established? It says the State shall not be a stockholder in any corporation or association whatever. She has a control; she goes on and charters banks with that provision, and by her State officers, will superintend their operations. That, sir, is not the bone of contention. The true bone of contention is, just because the State credit will no longer be squandered for the benefit of a few bankers. And I charge all who desire it, to dis sever the bonds of matrimony, for they were wrong in the beginning—they were incestuous and adulterous when they were joined together.

Mr. WALPOLE [interposing]. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. PETTIT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALPOLE. Did you not vote to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the bank, and were not the bonds lost under the very act you voted for?

Mr. PETTIT. I think not, sir.

Mr. WALPOLE. I merely desire to refresh your recollection of the occurrence.

Mr. PETTIT. Do so, if you can. I do not suppose I ever did such a thing, sir. When a member of the Legislature, in 1838-9, I was more than one-half of the time sick and confined to my room. Whether I did or did not vote in that way, I do not recollect; I only say, that if I did, I committed a grievous error, for which I ask the country's pardon. [Applause.]

I now say to all those in this House, of whatever color of politics or whatever face they may be, here is a plain, broad question—there is no skulking it; I do not want to do so. The question is—do you want to divorce the State from these banks?—do you want to say the State shall not take stock in any banking company or association? If you do, you will vote against the postponement, and for the section. I have declared the bands incestuous and adulterous; they ought to be dissolved, and I trust in God they will be.

Mr. FOSTER here withdrew his motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved to re-commit, with instructions to strike out the latter part of the section, which prohibits the State from being a partner in any bank, or banking association, &c., &c., leaving that portion of it which makes the branches of every bank that may be established mutually responsible.

Mr. M. said: I make this motion, in order that gentlemen who desire to vote for a portion of the section, and not for the whole of it, may have an opportunity of doing so.

I explained the other day to this Convention, that the loss to which the gentleman (Mr. Pettit) referred so earnestly on yesterday, and to which he has adverted this morning also, was occasioned by the action of the Legislature. The gentleman was not then in his seat, and I will therefore briefly advert to it again. The loan was created under an act passed in 1839, for the purpose of aiding to pay the interest on the cost of the internal improvements, then in a course of construction. The gentleman has not controverted the positions assumed by me, but still attributes the loss to the bank. I had occasion, the other day, to examine the journals of the Legislature, to ascertain something of the history of the act authorising the loan referred to, and I find that the bill was engrossed in the House of Representatives, by a vote of 77 to 7. It passed the Senate by a vote of 38 to 7. The gentleman, as I am just now informed, was at that time a member of the House of Representatives, but I do not know whether he voted for the bill or not.

Mr. PETTIT [in his seat]. Are the yeas and nays there? You will see by them whether I voted for the bill or not.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I am not now in possession of the journals. I examined the vote only for the purpose of ascertaining the number voting for and against it. If he did, I have no fault to find with him for it. I doubt not that those who voted for the bill did it from the best of motives. The result proved unfortunate, as did many other similar measures about the same time in this and other States. The error consisted principally in permitting the bonds to be sold on credit to the New York bankers, many of whom failed to meet their obligations. I ask then if this unfortunate transaction, with which, as far as I can learn, the bank had nothing to do, furnishes sufficient proof that the present banking system should be discontinued, or that those who are in favor of it are "swindlers" and "robbers."

I do not stand here to defend banks, nor any of their transactions, further than justice and truth require. The gentleman from Tippecanoe says that the officers report that the State has a million of capital in the bank, and that all the rest is lost. Sir, I have no information other than that which is furnished by the President and Cashier of the bank, to which every member has had access. From these reports, the bank is unquestionably in a sound and healthy condition.

[Mr. M. then took up the reports made by the bank, and analyzed them, item by item, for the purpose of showing the condition of the bank.]

Sir, the gentleman could have ascertained all these facts if he had taken the trouble to examine the reports, and had not been disposed to regard all connected with banks as swindlers. Sir, I believe an honest man will be an honest man any where, and a dishonest man will be dishonest, place him where you may. I do not believe that a man is necessarily a swindler because he is an officer of a bank, nor is he necessarily honest because he is pursuing any other avocation. I believe that there is such a thing as intrinsic honesty, and that such a principle will stand the test of any scrutiny to which it may be subjected.

Mr. President, as I said at the commencement, I made the motion to re-commit the section under consideration with instructions to amend, so that I and others may be enabled to vote for the first part of it, of which we approve, without having it encumbered with a proposition of a different character, to which we are opposed.

The question being upon re-committing with instructions,

Mr. HALL moved to amend the instructions so as to provide that the Legislature may authorize the establishment of a State Bank with a suitable number of branches, to go into operation after the expiration of the charter of the present State Bank, the branches to be mutually responsible—and that the State should not be a partner with the exception that trust funds may be invested as a loan, to be secured by preference in payment over other stockholders in case of insolvency.

Mr. H. said: I have but little confidence that anything definite is going to be done by this Convention in relation to the question now before us. I am clearly convinced by every step we take, that we must come to some kind of a compromise, and that the only way by which we can come to a compromise, is by re-committing. But as the Convention seems determined not to do so, I have only to offer such amendments as I think it my duty to offer.

The question being upon the amendment to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Marion, (Mr. Maguire,)

Mr. STEVENSON. I was anxious yesterday morning to compromise this question. I for one, am not willing to trust the whole banking interest of the State in the hands of the free bankers, but am willing to place it in the hands of a well regulated State Bank, and a free bank. I have no objection to take the two together. The State Bank has been experienced—the State has flourished under the system—and it has been satisfactory in its operations. Then, sir, I am not willing to strike down that institution to-day, and take up another to its exclusion.

It has been admitted to me by gentlemen in favor of free banking, that they cannot compete with the State Bank system, and the State of Ohio was brought up as an evidence that they could not. I think, sir, that the opposition to a State Bank has grown, in a great measure, out of the fact that the free banks cannot compete with the State Bank. What is the reason they cannot make an equal amount of money with the State Bank? Because they have to pay out too much. If they cannot make the same profits by banking that the State Bank does, they can compete with the State Bank only by controlling the commerce of the country. They establish their free banks in Madison, Lafayette, Evansville, and adopt the Illinois plan. You go to one of these free bankers—whose only object is to make money—and present him your note. He says he is not acquainted with your endorser; but if you have produce and bring it here and put it in my storehouse, I will keep it and sell it, and that will be a sufficient security for me." On these terms he will cash your note. Thus they control the resources, the business, and commerce of the country. Should we, I ask, place the commerce of the country in the hands of a set of sharpers and brokers? I say we should not do such a thing. I am not willing for one; but am willing to make some compromise. Yet gentlemen tell us there is no danger in the subjects of foreign governments coming here and controlling the business and resources of the country by banking. I say we have much to fear. Are we to allow foreigners to come here and pay them six per cent. on the bonds which they hold on the State, and authorize them in addition, to issue and loan at six per cent. an amount of paper currency equal to the amount of bonds.

Gentlemen see no danger in this! I say there is danger in putting the control of the business or the country into the hands of individuals, but much more in putting it into the hands of foreigners. I am not willing to go for any system of free banking, if not connected with a State Bank; the one has been tried, the other has not, and could not be sustained without controlling the commerce of the country. I will fight this system to the end. But I am willing, and have been from the commencement, to take a fair system of well regulated State Banks, and a similar system of free banks. Let them go together, and if one attempt to control the commerce of the country, the other will correct it. There is no danger from either, if we meet upon a fair ground of compromise without crippling the one or the other. I know we have the power to cripple down the free banks, so with the State Bank. But nothing will enable us to act fairly upon the subject, unless we enter into a compromise imbued with some liberality of feeling. For my part I would leave the question with the legislature; and if the people, through their representatives, are willing to take a State Bank and branches, or free banks, or both, I say, "amen." There are things, in my opinion, that can be as well done outside of the Convention as in it. I say, establish general principles on the subject, and we then shall have about what is right, and need not remain here quarrelling eternally about this question. As long as we want to fix the details of either system, we cannot get along. I hope the matter will be re-committed. I see no danger in leaving the question an open one for the Legislature, that they may take such action in relation to it as in their judgment will seem best.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I voted yesterday against the section as engrossed. There are some principles in it, however, that I am in favor of. The mutual liability of the banks with branches, that may hereafter be established, I cordially approve of. But when gentlemen get up and say the State shall not be a stockholder in any bank, I think they go too far. I would go for allowing the State to take stock to the amount of the trust funds.

In what way can we better invest the trust funds than in bank stock? Are we merely to loan these funds to the bank, as suggested by some gentlemen? Well, the bank would pay you but 6 per cent., while it made 10 per cent. upon your money. Should not this fund increase so as to benefit the State, and not the stockholders of the banks to whom you loan it? You might just as well loan the money to the farmers throughout the State, as to loan it to the bank.

I ask, is it not as safe to invest these funds in bank stock as to loan it to the bank?

Mr. PETTIT. I would not put one dollar of trust funds in any bank on the face of the earth. But I would loan it out to farmers of the State, if they desire it.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Nine times out of ten such a policy has been, and will be, an injury to the individual who has borrowed it.

Now, sir, I know this discussion has wandered from the true question before the Convention; but I trust the Convention will indulge me in following the course which the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) has taken upon the question, that will come up after this, upon the proposition introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole). Sir, it was astonishing to me to see that gentlemen diverge from the straight democratic path. Was it not a strong feature in Jackson's celebrated veto message upon the United States Bank, that foreigners holding stock, constantly drained the country of specie? I suppose the gentleman has preached that doctrine when stumping his Congressional district, and perhaps all over the country. He says now, "who would object to a foreigner bringing his money here to buy your horses or hogs?" But when a foreigner comes here to purchase the surplus products of the country, does he go into banking? No, sir, he merely buys our products and leaves his money with the producer. Does he pursue the same course when he goes into banking? No, sir. He will deposit our State bonds with some State officer, upon which he will issue an equal amount of paper, countersigned by the Auditor. By this operation he gets from the State five per cent. interest upon the bonds, and at least eight per cent. from our citizens upon the paper he issues by authority of the State—so that upon the bonds that we now pay five per cent. we will have to pay thirteen per cent., which will create a continual drain upon the precious metals of this State to an amount of nearly half a million annually, the greater part of which will go to Europe.

It is said that with your free banking "every man has equal privileges." That remark of the gentleman from Tippecanoe reminds me of a man with a large family of children of various sizes; he goes out into the vineyard and takes a beautiful bunch of grapes, which he brings home and places in a position that the taller can reach, but the smaller cannot avail themselves of the delicious fruit. He then says to them, come, dear children, take and eat, they are free for you all," at the same time fully convinced that the smaller could not reach them.

This is the beautiful doctrine that is being preached by the free bank men. Say they, "banking is a monopoly in the end, one way or another, so let all enjoy the use of this swindling machine," when they know that all men cannot avail themselves of it.

In relation to the bonds held by foreigners, I wish to ask the gentleman from Tippecanoe a question. If we suffer these foreign bond holders to come here and bank with the bonds on which we pay them 5 per cent., and allow them to issue a dollar of paper for every dollar in bonds then with the exchange, which every bank is permitted to charge, will you not allow them to draw 14 per cent., the greater part of which is sent to Europe? Yet, gentlemen say, bring in all the foreign capital you can—let them have the control of the currency, and continually drain the country in the shape of interest. Is that democracy? It is strange indeed, if it be.

One word to the gentleman from Monroe, (Mr. Read,) who is so fond of quoting Jackson's messages, and which his colleague the other day moved should be engrossed for a third reading [laughter]. I ask him, is not one of the main features of the veto message a recommendation that foreign capital should not be encouraged to be invested in this country in the shape of bank stock? I am certain the gentleman will answer in the affirmative. I ask my democratic friends now, when it is just before day, and the darkest hour of the night, not to desert the Old Ship?

Mr. WALPOLE. I am somewhat surprised at the course pursued by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit). There was a proposition reported by the committee on the public debt, guaranteeing the establishment of a sinking fund by constitutional provisions; but the gentleman proposed to strike it out, thus preventing the Legislature from taking steps to pay off our debt, or reduce taxation when our necessities demanded, so that these foreign bondholders might be guaranteed in the enjoyment of the Wabash canal, and our other works of improvement. He says it is our business to encourage the investment of foreign capital here. Is it that we want foreigners to come here and support our government? It has never been the policy of the government of the U. S. or of any of the States, to erect a great moneyed influence within its borders, a sort of imperium in imperio. Every republican has ever been opposed to the idea. But it is left to the gentleman from Tippecanoe to controvert the position that has been taken by our American statesmen upon this subject. The simple question is, are you to have the whole currency of the country in the hands of a few foreign capitalists, that they may contract or expand it at their will? Yet, sir, that will most undoubtedly be the effect, if we permit them to come here and bank upon our bonds. You want these Rothschilds, and Palmers, and Barings, to have the whole thing in their own hands. To-day they may have in circulation three millions—in three months there may be but fifty thousand dollars. I, for one, most solemnly protest against such a measure. Sir, that gentleman (Mr. Pettit) made a long speech to the effect that the State lost by the State bank over a million of dollars. He knew better than that, for he was a member of the Legislature at the time the bill was passed authorizing the negotiation of the million and half loan. Was his name recorded upon the passage of that bill? No, sir, he was absent. When the question of the State paying its public debt came up before the Legislature, it was a matter of such indifference to him that he does not now know whether or not he was present at the time of the passage of the million and a half bill.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). I was sick at the time.

Mr. WALPOLE. I have noticed the gentleman's course, and I am glad to see that his Democratic friends have taken alarm at it. But it is entirely consistent with the course he has taken in reference to the southwestern part of the State, when he proposed that, no matter what might be the condition of this people, yet the Legislature was still to go on to tax them; he was not willing to leave it to the Legislature. No, sir, nothing is to be left to the legislature.

Sir, if the advocates of free banking want to force their system upon us, then I stand here, and will vote against all banking; and I hope all men in favor of the present institution, or something like it, will stand together, and shift the responsibility upon the free bankers.

The gentleman from Tippecanoe made a very plausible argument yesterday upon the mutual liability of banks. He said you might as well have all the farmers, merchants, shoemakers &c., in the State, liable for each other's debts. There can be no parallel run in the case at all. You, sir, and I, and every man, who follows an occupation in life, pursues it as a common law right. But every man has not the right to bank. When you take from the masses this common law right, and confer it upon a few who realize great advantages therefrom, they should stand together, mutually bound, responsible for each other's liabilities. You allow them to issue notes and trade in bills of exchange, and, in fact, have the whole currency of the country under their control; are you to say, then, that they shall not be held mutually liable? If we are to have foreigners banking in Indiana, not on the mutual liability principle, I should then like to have a Board of Control, so that we may know, every three months, what these foreigners are doing. I want to know a few days in advance, before the bankruptcy comes upon us, when it is going to take place.

If you establish free banks, then paper will be subject to discount in commercial points; a bank located, for instance, at Danville, would have its bills subjected to one or two per cent. discount at Madison. Mutual liability would make the Madison branch endeavor to keep up the credit of its sister branches, and receive their notes at par; and then if one branch got into doubtful circumstances, and a rush should be made upon it, the other branches could assist and keep it up. Without such mutual liability, the paper of such a bank would depreciate, and the bill-holder would be the loser. As there should be a mutual union of interest and purpose, so also should there be a mutual liability to the people of the country. But, sir, let gentlemen speak of their independent free banks as they please, I shall go against them.

The example of the Kentucky banks, which lost to the people several hundred thousand dollars, admonishes me of my duty. I want no such losses to accrue to the people of this State. I stand upon the experience of thirty years' banking in Indiana, and that experience will guide my vote.

Mr. RITCHIE. I regret the lengthy discussion which we have had upon this question, and feel a little sorry that I have any disposition to prolong it; but since so many gentlemen have spoken, I may be pardoned for making a few remarks. I am in favor of the passage of the section now under consideration. I shall vote for it just as it is, though I am not certain whether the two parts into which it is divided hang very well together or not. I believe in both of the propositions contained in the section—in the provision providing for mutual liability, if we have a State bank and branches, as well as the one declaring that the State shall not be a partner in any bank. I am willing to dissolve all connection between the State and banks. But, sir, I understand that a number of the friends of the State bank, if I can understand the course suggested by the gentleman from Dubois, (Mr. Edmonston,) if they cannot obtain permission to borrow money on the part of the State, to bank upon, they propose to go out among the counties of the State of Indiana, and withdraw the trust funds from the people of the State, in order to bank upon them—

Mr. WALPOLE (interposing). Those are not my sentiments.

Mr. RITCHIE (resuming). Neither State bank men nor the free bank men can agree among themselves.

Mr. EDMONSTON (interposing). The gentleman from Johnson mistakes my position. I do not propose drawing out the trust funds of the different counties, until the winding up of the present banks. They must be vested somehow, and I know of no better plan than in bank stock.

Mr. RITCHIE. I see but very little difference between the gentleman's explanation and my statement. The trust funds of the State of Indiana are loaned out to the people of the several counties of the State, and those loans secured by ample security upon real estate.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The trust fund is not all loaned out. There is a large portion in the treasury vested in five per cent. scrip, and paying interest that is not in the hands of the people at all.

Mr. RITCHIE. I had the honor of a seat in the Legislature in the year 1840, when this same proposition came up for consideration, and the Legislature actually passed a bill calling in the surplus revenue and all the trust funds belonging to the State, to furnish capital to bank upon. So odious was this proposition, that the universal sentiment of the people demanded and secured its repeal at the very next session. If you call in the money now loaned out to the people of Indiana, among the honest farmers and mechanics of the country, to put it into banks to be loaned out to their friends and favorites, you will hear the indignant voice of the people of Indiana, denouncing the policy and demanding the immediate extirpation of the banks. The people prefer the present system; that these funds should be loaned out on mortgaged security to honest farmers and mechanics in the country, to pay off their indebtedness, and enable them to carry on their business operations.

On the other hand we find that the free bankers have no other idea in their heads, than to authorize banking upon State bonds, and they are willing to ransack the whole earth in search of our State bonds, and out of our very indebtedness, create free banking capital!

In the language of the gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup,) they say let foreign capital come—we want more money—more capital. I am not certain whether this is correct or not; but the gentleman, (who spoke in favor of it on yesterday,) put me in mind of a conversation which I had in 1837, soon after the adoption of the system of internal improvements, with a gentleman of my own county, as to the propriety of adopting the system at that time. I argued that it was folly to borrow ten millions of dollars for the purpose of constructing roads and canals in every part of the State. It was not known that these works would be profitable, or that any good could result from their construction. Towards the close of the controversy, he remarked that he did "not care a damn whether the works would be profitable or not, so that we get the money to spend among us!"

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Name him.

Mr. RITCHIE. He was a gentleman who had had the honor of a seat in the Legislature from Johnson county. And this appears to be the cry now, with some of the free bankers—they do not care "a damn," so that they get more money! I am one of those who believe that the real interest of the people of Indiana is in her agricultural and mechanical productions. The only good realized from banking, is that it furnishes facilities for the transfer of the produce of our country to market. But, sir, these facilities are greatly overrated. Our produce would find a market, though there was not a State Bank or a bank of any kind in existence. The whole world is open to our commerce and the money would return in exchange for our production, whether there be banks or not. I am not for any system that will create a flood of paper or any other kind of money.

This overflow of money—a redundancy of currency—is always hazardous to the real interests of the country. Experience proves that a flush of money is always followed by commercial distress and general individual embarrassment. Sir, it is because banks have the power, at their own pleasure, to increase or diminish the amount of the circulating medium, that I feel so much opposed to them. I am opposed to banks of all kinds, and regard them as all belonging to the same species, and therefore, have but little preference for one kind or the other. I am happy in the belief that there is a glorious day approaching, when all banks will be swept away by the force of public sentiment. A few years since, the Bank of the United States, was regarded as the great, if not the only institution of the country! Now, who dare do her reverence? Since that, the State Bank was considered as the basis of our prosperity—as an institution, without which all our resources would remain dormant and undeveloped. Now, she too, has fallen in public estimation, as is clearly evinced by repeated votes in this Convention. Sir, I regard the effort to establish a system of free banking as the last experiment to be tried in banking in the country. Like its predecessors, it is, in my opinion, doomed to fail. And when it fails, the last of the tribe will have been exploded, and a sound public sentiment will have forever forbidden the creation of banks of any kind. I believe, sir, that such a day is coming, and in its approach I apprehend no danger to the country—although, I have no doubt, the cry of ruin will be sounded long and loud.

A great deal has been said, sir, although I think it out of place, against the proposition of the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole) prohibiting foreign capitalists from having a hand in the banking affairs of this State. I agree with him, and shall vote for his proposition. I have always held to the doctrine contended for by Gen. Jackson, in his veto message of the United States Bank, that we should guard against foreigners exerting an influence over the monetary affairs of this country.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. PRESIDENT: I am amazed at the degree of excitement prevailing in this Convention, and which has given rise to the proposition to strike out that which was inserted on my motion yesterday.

The section, as it has been adopted, is, in truth, not originally mine. It did not first come from any free banker. It was reported by my excellent friend from Gibson, (Mr. Hall,) chairman of the committee on State debt and public works.

What is the proposition? The credit of the State shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person or corporation. I am amazed at the argument advanced by the gentleman from Owen, that this is but a covert proposition to protect free banks. Did not a gentleman, known to be in favor of a State Bank and Branches, commence the war against the principle that the State should be a bank stockholder? Then, I think the opposition to that principle comes from strange quarters.

With the gentleman from Switzerland, I can say that I remember something of Jackson democracy. I remember well that Andrew Jackson was the great and the successful advocate of the doctrine that, as there was no union in this country between Church and State, so, also, should there be none between Bank and State. The great contest then commenced and carried on concerning that principle is even now in progress; and the question, at this very hour under consideration, is the same which agitated the country in 1832. Now as then, it is the question: Shall state and bank be connected, or shall they not? That they shall not be connected, is the true Jackson doctrine. The doctrine which passed yesterday by a vote of twenty majority embodies the true Jackson doctrine.

The principle has been sought to be introduced here, and indeed has for the time prevailed, that no foreigner shall be allowed to subscribe stock to any bank in this State. A proposal so false in principle and so mischievous in practice as this, must be ultimately defeated. There is not the least chance, when the sober second thought of the Convention is brought to bear upon it, that it should stand the test. Its sole effect will be, like that of a kindred proposition coming from the same quarter, to waste our time in useless voting and profitless debate. Like the former proposal by the gentleman from Hancock, (Mr. Walpole,) to prevent all Presidents and Directors of banks and railroad companies from being elected to the Legislature, it never can become a part of our new Constitution.

The true doctrine is this: No occupation should be tolerated in this country in which every man may not safely be allowed to engage. Is banking an occupation of a character so peculiar, and so dangerous to our liberties, that foreigners ought to be precluded from investing their capital in it? Prove that to me, and I will vote against all banking, now and forevermore. Or is the objection only that it is a profitable business, and that its profits ought to be exclusively secured to our citizens, and competition from abroad shut out altogether? The old doctrine, sir—the old exploded doctrine—of a protective tariff, in a new garb! And, to be consistent, whither are the advocates of the doctrine led? If it be proper to shut out foreigners from one occupation, because it is deemed lucrative, why not from another? Why should not the gentleman's section be so amended, that foreigners shall be forbidden to become stockholders in any corporation whatever within our State, whether for banking, manufacturing, or any other purpose? Will the gentleman assent to such a doctrine as that?

Mr. WALPOLE. Certainly. Will the gentleman from Posey go for this proposition if I accept of his amendment?

Mr. OWEN. If I supported it at all, it should be in that form. I am opposed to it in every form. But the gentleman's proposition is, in truth, perfectly nugatory. It is not only wrong in principle, but powerless in practice. It provides that no foreigner shall take stock; but it contains no prohibition of a transfer of stock to a foreigner.

Mr. WALPOLE. My proposition reads—
"Shall not hold in trust for a foreigner."

Mr. OWEN. The section, as I understand it, does not forbid a transfer to an alien. But suppose it does. Is the doctrine to be recognized, that when a man takes stock, in a private business, recognized and incorporated by law, he is prohibited from selling that stock to whomsoever offers him the best price for it? That is a restriction on our own citizens quite as much as on foreigners.

Pass such a restriction for Indiana, and our neighbor States, all around us, will rejoice at the deed. They will rejoice to see us reject, by a constitutional provision, that capital from abroad which they desire, and which they invite. We, all of us, in these Western States, require such capital. In proportion as it flows in upon us, our resources are developed, and our labor finds profitable occupation. If we shut the door, it will go elsewhere. The loss of Indiana will be the gain of Illinois, of Michigan, of Wisconsin.

I said this proposal was in the nature of a protective tariff; I might almost have said, of a prohibitory one. Free banks do not, on the average, divide over eight per cent. We propose to shut out foreigners from a business yielding such a profit. And then, simultaneously, we propose to establish a State Bank, in which the stockholders, our own citizens, shall divide over twelve per cent. Is not this a tariff and of the most odious character? Does it not virtually prohibit us from borrowing of foreigners at eight per cent., and compel us to borrow of our own citizens at twelve? The thing is utterly untenable in principle, and would be fatal to the interests of the State in practice.

In the State of New York, where the entire banking capital is some forty millions of dollars, eleven millions only of that sum are invested in free banks. The great difficulty there is, to find capitalists enough who will employ their money in a business of which the profits are so moderate. That difficulty will be even greater here. Most of us, who are engaged in any business, can make more than eight per cent. on the capital we employ. So long as we can do so, we shall not invest that capital in free banks. And shall we prevent foreign capitalists from engaging, if they see fit, in an occupation, of which the profits are too small to tempt ourselves? This proposition, then, to exclude foreign capital, is as mischievous as it is unjust.

MR. KELSO. I believe I must take leave to differ with the learned teacher of democracy.

MR. OWEN. Not a learned teacher at all.

[MR. KELSO here proceeded to make some remarks, which will be published hereafter.]

MR. BRACKEN called for the previous question, and the call was seconded by the Convention.

THE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the main question be now put?

It was so ordered by consent.

THE PRESIDENT. The main question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Gibson, to the pending instructions of the gentleman from Marion.

Upon this question, the yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result:

THE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the passage of the section.

The yeas and nays on this question were demanded, and ordered, and the Secretary reported the following result—yeas 89, nays 63:

So the section passed.

On motion of MR. EDMONSTON,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MR. HOLMAN. I rise, Mr. President, to ask for a suspension of the order of business, in order that I may be enabled to introduce a resolution. [Cries of "read, read, read."] For the information of the Convention, I will read it. It is as follows:

Resolved, That a further discussion of the questions of currency and banking is not required, either by the importance of the subject, the want of correct information, or the wishes of our constituents; and that, therefore, all such questions shall hereafter be acted on without debate.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the order of business, and there were for the motion, yeas 51, noes 31.

So the order of business was not suspended—the rules requiring a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

THE PRESIDENT. The first business in the order of the day, is, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ripley, (Mr. Smith,) to the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole).

The amendment was read as follows:

"Every bank established under the authority of this Constitution, shall pay one-quarter of one per cent. per annum, bonus on the capital stock, to the State, for common school purposes, and each bank dividing ten per cent., or over, profit, on the capital stock, established as aforesaid, shall in like manner, pay over to the State, for the use of common schools the half of one per cent., on the capital stock of each branch."

MR. PETTIT. I hope that proposition will not be adopted. I would tax bank capital just as I would tax any other property in the State—simply enough to guarantee its protection. I would just as soon say that the farmer who makes ten per cent. on his farm, shall pay over to the State, one per cent. No one doubts the desirableness of having an educational fund; but I contend that that fund ought to be raised by a direct tax on property, as all are able to bear it. That is the only way in which justice or fairness can be done. If a man goes into the business of banking, his bank property is protected by the laws of the State, and for that protection let him pay as others pay, and no more. There is no necessity, that I can see, for making an invidious distinction. On the present, as on all other occasions—in this matter, as in all others—I ask that all the citizens of the State shall have an equality of rights—that equal justice shall be done to all; and that all shall be equally taxed, according to their property.

MR. SMITH. I would just remark that this is precisely the provision existing in the present bank charter—that you should pay one-quarter of one per cent. on each share of one hundred dollars; and that when the stockholders divide a profit of ten per cent., they shall pay to the State, for educational purposes, the half of one per cent. I think no proposition could be adopted that would give more popularity to a currency than this. It is said that banking is demoralizing in its tendency; but if this proposition be adopted, its effect will be quite the opposite.

MR. MCFARLAND. By reference to the present Constitution, you will see that this is all the tax which is assessed upon bank property, and that the bank has paid less on the amount of capital employed in its business than any individual employed in any other business in the State. The proposition of my colleague is undoubtedly correct—that without attempting to control men in the kind of investments they shall make, it is wrong to impose a special tax on any given kind of property for any purpose whatever. We ought, beyond all question, to suffer the citizen to invest his money as he pleases; but whatever or wherever it may be, let it be subject to such tax as is necessary for its protection. By a reference to the 15th section of the charter of the bank, you will find that twelve and a-half cents on each share of stock, is "in lieu of all other taxes and assessments on the stock in said bank." Thus, instead of the bank being actually charged a bo-nas for the privilege of banking, the provision secures the bank against taxation, except to that amount. It is true, sir, that, upon the happening of certain contingencies, this tax might be increased, but only to a limited extent.

I would say of banking, as of anything else, if it be wrong, prohibit it entirely—if right, impose no onerous burdens upon it—do not sell an indulgence to do wrong, in this or anything else. Under the pretext that the bank had to pay a bonus for its privileges, all the real estate held by it was exempted from taxation, and the amount held by the bank, if I am not mistaken, is over a quarter of a million of dollars. These special taxes are mere cheats, sir; they, for the most part, secure and cancel, as in this case, a special privilege, which would not be tolerated if left fully exposed.

MR. KENT. As an illustration of what has just fallen from the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. McFarland,) I will state that the branch bank of the city of New Albany has never paid one solitary farthing of tax for city purposes.

MR. OWEN. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment to an amendment already pending.

MR. OWEN. Then with the permission of the Convention, I will read what I would propose as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley. I think it will be more satisfactory to a majority of the Convention:

"Bank stock shall be taxed as all other property is taxed, and the proceeds shall be applied to the support of common schools."

I have one word to say in regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Ripley. If he is familiar with the history of corporations, he must know that when their taxes are paid upon their dividends, nothing is more easy than to avoid taxation thus levied. They can put down their dividends to a certain rate, and thus avoid the first tax; or, if they must go above that rate, they can still avoid the tax, by making up the balance into so much surplus stock. I think, therefore, that it is safer and better to tax the stock rather than the dividends.

MR. SMITH. The gentleman from Posey has mistaken the purport of my proposition. It is, in the first place, to tax the stock a quarter of one per cent.; and when the dividends exceed ten per cent., to further tax that stock the half of one per cent.

MR. CRUMBACKER. I move to lay the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment on the table.

MR. WALPOLE. I call for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley on the table.

MR. SMITH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Borden, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of J., Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hendricks, Hovey, Kent, Kendall of White, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shoup, Sims, Smith of Scott, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Yocum—56.

NAYS.—Messrs. So the amendment to the amendment was not laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Hancock on the table.

MR. WALPOLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Bryant, Chapman, Chenoweth, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of P., Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hovey, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kendall of White, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Nofsinger, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—58.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ripley.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I feel it to be my duty to reply very briefly to the remarks of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. McFarland) in relation to the taxation of stock owned by individuals in the State Bank.

That gentleman read from the 15th section of the Bank charter to show that the tax of twelve and one-half cents on each share of fifty dollars was in lieu of all other taxes on the stock in said Bank, and contended zealously that that was all the tax to which Bank stock is or ever was subject.

Now, Mr. President, I stated in my remarks a few days ago, that, individual stock in the several Branches, in addition to this tax for school purposes, was taxed as other property in the counties in which the Branches are respectively located. This statement having been called in question by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, I deem it due to myself to sustain my assertion by proof. I read therefore from the same section from which the gentleman read, as follows:

“And, in case of an ad valorem system of taxation being adopted during this charter, the said stock shall be subject to the same ratio of taxation as other capital, not exceeding one per cent. including the aforesaid tax.”

Now, sir, the ad valorem system of taxation commenced very soon after the Bank went into existence, and the stock has been, ever since the commencement of that system, subject to the same tax imposed upon other property in addition to the tax to which the gentleman alludes.

I read further, sir, from an act of the Legislature approved February 6, 1841, the following section:

“That hereafter the capital stock of the said Bank shall be taxable, in addition to the tax of twelve and one-half cents on each share for education, only for State purposes; which tax shall be a per centum in amount each year equal to the amount of State tax and to the amount of county tax in the county in which the respective Branch may be situated for the year; and shall be paid over by the Cashier of each Branch to the Treasurer of State, and by such Cashier shall be charged to the stockholders and deducted from the dividends.”

This is the law under which the stock is now taxed, and by inquiry of the State officers any gentleman may ascertain that the tax has been regularly paid according to the provisions of the law.

Mr. STEVENSON. I trust this amendment will not be adopted, not because I am opposed to taxing bank property, but because I think it belongs to the Legislature to fix the tax when they fix the charter of the bank.

A VOICE. That is right.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think we ought to adopt some general principle and leave the details to the Legislature. For that reason I shall vote against the proposition.

Mr. BASCOM. If I understood the gentleman from Marion correctly, I understood him to say that the State Bank had paid a State and county tax. Now, sir, if that was what he said, either he or the Auditor of State is mistaken. At an early period of the session of this Convention I proposed a resolution of inquiry in regard to the amount of State, county, road, and school tax had been paid by the stockholders of the State bank; and in answer to that resolution it was stated that they had paid $5,000 State tax, and $2,000 school tax, but no county or road taxes. Now you may go to any county in which there is a branch of the State Bank and you will find that not a single cent has been paid for county or road purposes by the stockholders. The property in this bank is not taxed as other property is taxed; and I ask any man who will take the trouble to examine and find out whether the stock held by individuals is taken for these purposes. Gentlemen need not in this Convention attempt to make the people of the State believe that bank property pays taxes as other property is taxed. This is not the fact, for no evidence of it can be found. On the contrary, the Treasurer of State says positively that the stockholders pay no road or county tax. The law provides that they shall pay a certain amount of tax, but it goes for State purposes alone. This is the reason why I offered the resolution on the subject. Besides this, this bank owns a considerable amount of land, not one acre of which is taxed for road or county purposes. Now, sir, either the gentleman from Marion or the Treasurer of State is laboring under a great mistake. I contend that they pay no road or county tax, and that is the reason why I wish them to be taxed to the fullest extent.

Mr. KELSO. Will the gentleman allow me to read what is the law on this subject?

Mr. BASCOM. Certainly.

Mr. KELSO. Here it is;

“That hereafter the capital stock of the said bank shall be taxable, in addition to the tax of twelve and one-half cents on each share for education, only for State purposes; which tax shall be a per centum in amount each year equal to the amount of State tax, and to the amount of county tax in the county in which the respective branch may be situated for the year; and shall be paid over by the cashier of each branch to the treasurer of State, and by each cashier shall be charged to the stockholders and deducted from the dividends."

Mr. BASCOM. Yes, but that tax all goes to the State except what is provided in regard to schools. There is no county or road tax provided for.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have no anxiety as to the fate of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ripley, and do not rise to say anything upon that subject. I felt it to be my duty to correct the mistake into which the gentleman from Tippecanoe had fallen, especially as his remarks went to question the verity of a statement made by me a few days ago on this subject. The gentleman from Wells, if I heard him correctly, still disputes the correctness of my position, and says he has authority from the State Treasurer to sustain him. Now, Mr. President, the law on this subject has been read over and over again, and I do not see how it can be misunderstood by any one who is not wilfully blind. The facts are all familiar to me for the reason that it was my duty as Auditor of State to assess the tax and attend to its collection. The process is this: the officers of each Branch Bank are required by law on or before the first Monday in November annually, to transmit to the Auditor of State a full and correct statement of the amount of stock owned by individuals in the respective Branches. Immediately on receiving which the Auditor is required to assess upon each Branch the amount of taxes due therefrom according to the laws in force on the subject. The amount assessed by the Auditor of State upon each Branch is the precise amount which is assessed upon personal property in the county in which the Branch is located for State, county, and road purposes, unless, including the school tax, it exceed one per cent., in which case it can only go to one per cent. The whole of this tax goes into the State Treasury in pursuance of the law which has been read. Now, if the gentleman from Wells has any authority which contravenes this statement, I can only say that his authority contradicts the law and the practice under it.

As to the real estate held by the Bank, to which the gentleman has several times referred, I will state that that property is held as part of the capital stock, and is taxed as stock and not as real estate. The Supreme Court has decided that it constitutes a part of the capital stock, and cannot be taxed otherwise than as stock.

Mr. BADGER. It appears to me that debate on this question has gone far enough, and I therefore move the previous question.

The previous question was sustained, and the main question being ordered to be now put, the question was first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith).

The yeas and nays having been ordered, they were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Ballingali, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Prather, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Clements, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbaker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hendricks, Hovey, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Yocum—61.

So the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon adopting the section as amended.

Mr. WALPOLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, were taken, and resulted—yeas 76, nays 58—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingali, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Davis of Madison, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—76.

YAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Biddle, Bourne, Bright, Bryant, Chapman, Chenowith, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hovey, Howe, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—58.

So the section as amended, was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading.

Cries of "consent," "consent," and "no!" "no!"

A division being called for, there were ayes 80, noes 55.

So the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in the order of the day is the following section:

"SEC. 2. No bank shall receive directly or indirectly, any more interest than shall be allowed by law to be received by persons loaning individual money."

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. OWEN. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "any more interest," and inserting the words "a greater rate of interest."

The question being taken on the amendment it was agreed to.

Mr. MATHER moved further to amend the section so as to provide that the specie basis of all banks shall be in such proportion to the circulation as the Legislature may determine; in addition to which there shall be ample collateral security filed with some State officer sufficient to ensure the redemption of the entire circulation.

Mr. WALPOLE moved so amend the amendment so that "no issue, discount, or exchange shall ever be authorized or permitted, on any security other than the gold and silver of the Bank."

Mr. PETTIT. The provision which the gentlemen from Hancock has just now offered provides that there shall be no such thing as exchange except upon gold and silver. The utter absurdity of such a proposition ought to be apparent on the first blush. You do not draw bills of exchange upon gold or silver, but upon produce and other merchandize. The produce dealer ships his produce to New York or New Orleans, and the banker draws upon that, or the avails of it, and not upon gold and silver.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). That is your side of the question.

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, and resulted—yeas 86, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Beach, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bright, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hamilton, Helmer, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Moate, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Bahingall, Bascom, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Brookbank, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Davis of Madison, Edmouston, Farrow, Foster, Frispie, Gootee, Hall, Hawkins, Hendricks, Holman, Huff, Jones, Kilgore, Logan, March, May, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Nave, Prather, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stenson, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—41.

So the amendment to the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. COLFAX. I do not know but that all hopes of a compromise upon this question are now gone. The growing excitement exhibited upon both sides—the increased pertinacity with which members cling to their individual opinions—the apparent determination to make no concession—all seem to forbid the hope that an amicable adjustment of this question can be agreed to.

It is, or ought to be, however, apparent to every one, that the conflicting sentiments expressed and advocated here can be settled only by compromise. But all attempts, thus far, to adopt any such settlement, have failed. Each section of this Convention distrusts the other. And vote after vote has shown us, as it has shown the people of the State at large, that the no bank party, small though they are in numbers, are the controllers of every decision that has thus far been made. So closely divided are the free bank and State Bank parties, that the no bankers have upon every vote the balance of power, and they use it very impartially to cut the throats of both systems. First, they unite with the State Bankers to load down the free bank system with restrictions that make it unacceptable to its own friends; and in turn, they unite with the free bankers, when they, in a retaliatory vote, seek to impose countervailing restrictions upon the rival system. The no bankers thus are the real victors, and if this plan of operations is continued, you may as well adopt at once a provision prohibiting all banks in the State—look to your neighboring States for your currency—and send your business men there to seek facilities to enable them to purchase and ship the produce of the farmers of Indiana.

If the friends of either system desire to continue this destroying of both by piece-meal, well and good. They will answer of course to their constituents for the result. But, believing there should be—nay, that there must be—moderate men enough of both sections to adopt a fair and honorable compromise—end this long and exciting debate—and stop the suicidal course that both parties have been practising. I have drawn up a section which I now move as a substitute for that offered by my friend from Elkhart, (Mr. Mather,) and which I desire to read, and briefly comment on in my place before sending it to the Secretary's desk:

"The Legislature shall not have power to authorize any system of banking except under a general law based upon the principles of ample security for the redemption of the bills in specie, to be filed with some State officer, registry of notes, preference of payment to the bill holders in case of insolvency, and the individual liability of stockholders to an amount equal to their stock:

"Provided, however, That the Legislature may also have power to charter a bank and branches without collateral security as described above, which branches shall be mutually responsible for the circulation of each other, the stockholders of which shall be individually liable to an equal amount with their stock, and in which the State shall not be a partner. But this shall not be construed to prohibit the investment of the Trust Funds, their security to be suitably guaranteed."

[Cries of "Consent."]

A few words of explanation, When I reflect that the extreme members of both sections—those who are in favor of their favorite system being exclusive—with the anti-bank men, will of course vote against the proposition I offer, and that its success must depend upon its being supported by a majority of both the State Bank and free bank parties, I confess that it does look venturesome to propose it. But candidly believing that it presents the only feasible grounds of compromise, and that its rejection will seal the last hope of an amicable adjustment of this exciting and difficult question, I desire before resuming my seat, to say a few words in regard to its details.

This compromise is framed, in the first place, so as not to run athwart the votes of those gentlemen who say that they cannot incorporate in positive language, any banking privileges in the Constitution—that they cannot make it obligatory upon the Legislature, to establish banks—that they deem that the Constitution should only define provisions and restrictions, and then leave the General Assembly to authorize banks under such provisions if the people desire them. The section does not compel the Legislature to authorize any banks; but it says, if they do authorize them, it shall be under the provisions therein stated.

In the general banking portion of it, it requires "ample security," but it leaves the Legislature to define from time to time what that security shall be. It is almost universally conceded that, at first, no other securities but Government and State bonds would be received; but if twenty years hence there should be no such bonds in existence, it does not prevent the Legislature from then saying that other securities may be taken—for instance, preferred railroad bonds whose interest is guaranteed, by prepayment in dividends, &c.

In all banks of either system, it provides that, besides all other securities, there shall be individual liability of stockholders to an amount equal with their stock. It recognizes that principle, but does not carry it to excess. It does not create an unlimited individual liability. It does not aim to repress capital from being invested in banks by saying to a rich man who would be willing to bring in capital from abroad to increase the business facilities of the State—"If you send money here for one thousand dollars' worth of stock—your whole fortune, one hundred thousand dollars or more or less, shall be liable, if our own citizens here, of more limited means, who hold small sums, but in all a majority of the stock, should mis-manage the institution." But it says, besides all the other safeguards, that if you, sir, subscribe for one thousand dollars' worth of stock, and pay it in, you shall be liable for one thousand dollars more—if you subscribe for fifty thousand, for fifty thousand more—or if you subscribe for but one hundred, for one hundred more. This is just, equitable, and unexceptionable.

The Convention, by a very large majority, have decided that the State should not be a partner—a stockholder—in any bank. That point is settled, and it is recognized and affirmed in the section. But many of those who voted for that prohibition—and a number of State Bank men, as is well known, voted for it—are willing, and some of them desirous, that the trust funds of the State—not the county trust funds, but those now managed by the State Bank—might be invested as stock, or as a loan, in a new State Bank. They hold that the interest upon these trust funds might be much increased by such an investment, and also that they might thus be made conducive to the increase of the business facilities of the State—While their security could be suitably and safely guarantied by a preference in payment over all other stockholders if the bank should wind up; or the State might, in addition thereto, reserve sufficient control over the bank if chartered, as she does now, to insure their being well guarded. They should be sacredly guarded, if they were so invested. This section, therefore, while it does not require them to be so invested, declares that it shall not be construed to prevent it, if the people through the Legislature, desire it—but that, if thus invested, they must be abundantly secured.

Besides these provisions there is a mutuality of compromise between the two systems as respects the security of their circulation. The free banks are to deposit ample security for their bills and have them registered, but no one bank is to be responsible for another; no stockholder in a bank at Logansport is to be responsible for the circulation of another bank at Rushville. Each Independent Bank will file securities for itself, manage for itself, be responsible for its own debts, and not be governed or controlled by any other bank. But the bank with branches, which I call for convenience the State Bank, while exempted from the filing of security, is to secure the bill holder by the mutual liability of each branch for all its associates. The stockholder in the branch at Indianapolis is to be responsible not only for the redemption of its circulation, but for the redemption of the paper of the branches at Madison, Lafayette, &c. He cannot, therefore, be as independent as the stockholder in the free bank of his own town, for this mutual endorsement renders it necessary that there should be, as now, a Board of Control to supervise the affairs of all the branches, to restrict them, and if necessary for the security of the whole, even to forbid the declaring of dividends.

Thus evenly are the two systems balanced, and the most approved features of both grouped in the compromise that I have had the temerity to offer. To the friends of a general banking law, I say, that if it can be adopted it will secure a distinct recognition of our favorite system, which, thus far, it is idle to deny that we have failed to obtain. I do sincerely believe that it can be obtained in no other way but this. To the State Bank men I say, that, though they seem flushed now with an apparent triumph, won by the aid of the anti-bankers, they must know that that same party will combine with us if we should make the proposition to vote down their system altogether. To both, I say, that this compromise will give either of you all the advantages you could have procured if you had succeeded in authorizing your favorite system in the Constitution, unaccompanied by a positive exclusion of its rival. If the State Bank had been authorized, the Legislature could also, unless positively prohibited, establish a free bank system in addition. And if free banks had been authorized, the Legislature could still organize a bank and branches besides, if the Constitution did not directly forbid it. Nay, more than this, we avoid the hazarding of the adoption of the whole Constitution, which might result if either system was exclusively authorized in it.

This compromise has been offered, also, because my position is such that I could present it without being liable to any charge of inconsistency. As I have heretofore stated, my position at home was clearly defined. I declared myself opposed to the monopoly existing under the old Constitution in favor of the State Bank, and was unqualifiedly hostile to the continuance of that exclusion in the new Constitution. But every voter of St. Joseph county knows, also, that while earnestly and warmly in favor of authorizing a general banking system in the instrument we are framing, I distinctly stated to them that I did not wish, and would not advocate one exclusive of other systems. And, though I dislike to quote from circulars, I may be pardoned in confirmation of this declaration, for quoting from an address to the people who elected me to represent them, dated June, 1850.

"I am opposed to a continuance of the exclusive privilege of banking in favor of the State Bank. I should be in favor of authorizing the Legislature, if they deemed it expedient, to adopt a free banking system, with any additional improvements in the way of salutary checks, such as personal responsibility of the stockholders for the redemption of the circulation, but I would not be in favor of making a monopoly in favor of that system more than any other."

Without any sacrifice, therefore, of previously conceived opinions or expressed pledges, I happen to be in the proper position to propose this compromise, which it may be hoped may prove successful.

It is best, Mr. President, to speak plainly, without any concealment. The State Bankers have, but a few minutes since, applauded over a victory won over the free bankers by the aid of the anti-bank delegates. It may be, therefore, that they will now spurn this, or any other compromise. Without the least unkind feeling to them, it might as well be known first as last, that if we are driven to the wall—if there is to be a monopoly hereafter as heretofore, of all the banking privileges of this great State by a single institution, we are determined to make the bill holder under such system safe beyond all peradventure. We will secure this at all hazards. And they know right well that in such efforts, we shall have the votes of their late allies, the bank haters, to assist in the imposition of the restrictions. If our favorite system is thrust out of this body, its friends put down, and a fair compromise rejected, they cannot complain of this.

The pathway is now clear. My friend at my side, the delegate from Elkhart, (Mr. Mather,) is like myself, in favor of compromise. But to prepare the way for the section that I have offered, he proposed his amendment. This compromise is now proposed as an amendment to that amendment, where it cannot be loaded down with additional provisions or emasculated by striking out any of its parts. It must be voted on by our rules, just as it is. And if it is rejected, it may as well be understood that we have determined to fall back upon the next thing to be voted upon—the amendment offered by the gentleman from Elkhart, and declare, in order that the bill holder shall be absolutely safe, that the specie basis of the bank shall be in such proportion to its circulation as the Legislature may determine; but that in addition thereto, ample security shall be filed with some State officer for the redemption of the entire circulation.

But I appeal to moderate men on all sides. Let us end this difficulty which has caused so much warm debate here—which has cost nearly $10,000 to the people of the State, which even threatens the defeat of the instrument we are framing, by meeting together on this platform of concession, adopting this section which, though it may not in all things agree with each one's personal preferences, is a basis on which the whole controversy can be amicably and honorably adjusted.

Mr. President, I move the section which I have read as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart.

Mr. PETTIT. There it is again, the same old song—flesh of one and fowl of another. That section allows one set of men to bank upon one set of principles and special rights, and another set of men upon other principles and other rights. One set of men shall give ample security for their circulation, but the other set shall not be required to give any security at all. Now sir, I protest, in the name of justice, in the name of reason, and in the name of every principle of right and fairness known in the civilized world, against the passage of any such provisions. Sir, if men are to go into banking, I say again, put them all upon a par; let them all bank upon the same principle; put down your general restrictions upon all, and with them I will go as far as any man in this Convention. But I never will go for giving one man a right to go into banking, or any thing else, on one principle, and another man a right to go into it on a different and perhaps more favorable principle. I protest against it; I want equality for all.

Mr. COLFAX (interposing). There is a part of the proposition which the gentleman from Tippecanoe seems to overlook, the mutual responsibility of the branches of a State Bank for the issues of each other. This is a setoff against the security required under the free banking system.

Mr. PETTIT (resuming). I do not regard it at all. In the first place that section is objectionable because it authorizes the trading in paper without responsibility for debts. I insist that if you trade in paper you ought to trade in it just as you would trade in horses, that the contractors, whether there be a dozen or only one, should all be responsible for every debt of every kind which they may contract as partners. Here, then, you say that those who bank independently of the State Bank and its branches, shall deposit ample security for the redemption of their paper, while those who bank under the other system shall not deposit any security at all. It is making a direct distribution which I trust will never be adopted here.

Mr. LOCKHART. Mr. President, I for one am rejoiced at the introduction of this section. I think it must be apparent to every gentleman upon this floor, that before any thing can be done, there must be a compromise. I regard this proposition as a fair one, and coming as it does from the free banking side of the House, I think that the friends of the State Bank ought to accept it. I, as one of the advocates of the State bank system, if the free bankers will stand up to this proposition will ground arms and support it; and permit me, sir, to express the hope that the section may at once be engrossed.

Mr. PRATHER. I merely wish to say that I should be glad to learn from my friend from St. Joseph, what security he proposes. If the security he proposes should satisfy me, in all probability I will vote for his proposition. The kind of security I prefer is the cash paid in, and not State stocks.

Mr. COLFAX. If the gentleman from Jennings votes against the compromise because all the details are not entered into, he will vote against all compromise on this question, for it will be impossible to draft any plan to which some one will not have objection to this or that detail.

Mr. PRATHER. That may be all very true but I have a constituency to represent, who are satisfied with the present State Bank with some modifications, and I feel bound to represent their wishes, and in representing their wishes I vote my own sentiment on that subject. By voting for a State Bank, I am sure I vote the sentiment of nine-tenths of my people. My action thus far I believe on this subject voted on in this Convention, will be approved by them; and if a compromise is made, and the security satisfies me, I will vote for it, as I am convinced we cannot all get every thing we may desire; and if it does not satisfy me, I will vote against it. I hope we may bring this mat-1st to a close, as we have already spent time enough.

Mr. COOKERLY. I stated here before, that I was willing to compromise this matter, but I do not conceive that the proposition offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph is any compromise at all. It is just a proposition of that kind which I never can and never will vote for, so long as I have a seat on this floor. Now I am willing to compromise the question on fair grounds, but if you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from St. Joseph, you adopt every thing the State bank men want. You give up your general system of free banking; and I ask the gentleman from St. Joseph, if he is prepared to give up that measure, for which he has contended here with so much ability and perseverance, for the last two weeks? I trust he is not. As I have already said, I am willing to compromise the matter on fair grounds. I stated last Friday, that I am willing to compromise; but in order to have a compromise, the concessions must be mutual. Now the State bank men must not suppose that we who go in favor of a general banking system will compromise everything and let them have it all their own way. If I can get the following amendment attached to the amendment of the gentleman from St. Joseph, I will go for it:

"The General Assembly shall, after the adoption of this Constitution, provide by law for a general system of banking."

[Loud cries of "no, no, no, no," and "consent, consent."]

Mr. STEVENSON. It is not to be expected from the nature of things, that any proposition of compromise can be presented here that will be satisfactory; but I think that there are moderate men here enough to be satisfied that no State Bank can be established alone, and that neither can any free bank system be established alone. I know that there are gentlemen who are willing to take either the one or the other, but not to take them both together. But are there not men enough here who are willing to take a fair compromise? I have made a proposition, as broad as any free bank man can wish. I think that it gives to the free bank men all that they can ask for, and all that any State bank man can expect. Now if we do anything, we have to adopt this compromise. There is no other that can be adopted, in my opinion. The question simply is, shall we accept it, or go on fighting here, as we have been doing for nearly two weeks, and accomplish nothing at last?

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio. If I viewed this proposition in the light in which my friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) views it, I certainly could have no thought of voting for it. I could not vote for granting authority even to the Legislature to authorize any company, association, or individual to establish any banking or monied corporation the like of which may not be established for the benefit of another corporation, association, or individual. I will not vote for any such proposition; nor will I vote for putting any proposition in the Constitution requiring the Legislature to make any bank. But I am willing to vote for a proposition like the present one, leaving it in the power of the Legislature, when the people and their representatives shall think proper, to establish banks under a general law that shall give no special privilege to any company or association. I do not view this proposition in that light. I may not have heard it very correctly, but it does not appear to me, so far as I was able to understand it, to confine the use of the security to either system of banking. I think it is a proposition that I can go for. I would not go for requiring the Legislature to pass any such law; but if the people want banks, let them authorize the Legislature to establish them.

Mr. SHOUP. I may not understand this question, but it strikes me that if the amendment is adopted as proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph, the free bank men will accomplish nothing. It is evident that those who desire to go into banking will adopt that system which they believe to be most profitable, because they can realize larger dividends, and free banks will never be established. I have no hesitation in saying, that if that section is adopted, there will never be a law authorizing the establishment of independent banks. Never, sir! never! If it should be adopted, the free banks never can exist, because the State Bank with its influence, would inevitably break them down. The capitalists of the State will go into that system which is most profitable; and where they can issue two and a half or three dollars in paper for every dollar in specie, they are sure to do so.

Now I believe that it is the object of the free bank men on this floor, not to create shin-plasters, but to give security for the redemption of the notes, and just as rapidly as the business of the State increases, so will your currency increase. Now, sir, I must say again, I do not look upon this proposition as any compromise. There is not the first principle in it which favors free banking.

Mr. MAY. I have looked over the amendment offered by the gentleman from St. Joseph, and I think I understand the meaning of the language there used. One thing is very certain, that I do not understand it as I imagine he understands it. I am not, however, disposed to argue the question at the present time. He appears upon this floor as a friend of the free banking system, and is of course satisfied with his own proposition. I think the friends of the State Bank are also well satisfied with that proposition, as in my opinion they may very well be. I am here, not the friend of either system—and certainly not the friend of both; and as a friend to no banks, I will make a motion which I very seldom do, and that is, that the amendment of the gentleman from St. Joseph be laid upon the table.

Mr. COLFAX. I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Chapman, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Graham of Miami, Holman, Jones, Kendall of White, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Taylor, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Yocum—43.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gooatee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—90.

So the amendment was not laid upon the table.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I have a very slight amendment which I wish to propose.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that it is not in order, let it be ever so slight. The question is on striking out the amendment of the gentleman from Elkhart, after the word "the."

Mr. OWEN. I hope, sir, that the amendment will be engrossed. I am not prepared at this moment to say that I will go for its passage, nor that I will not; but if there should be some things which we desire to amend, we can amend them when it comes up on its passage, by a motion to re-commit. I think it comes as near the thing as we can get. The gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shoup) seems to suppose that the State Bank should be declared to cease. I think not; and if we are prepared to say that the people may make their election, they will perhaps choose free banks, and there may never be a State Bank at all. The only thing is, that we leave it to the people to decide whether there shall be a free bank or a State Bank.

Mr. READ: Is it in the power of the gentleman from St. Joseph to accept of an amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is not now in his power.

Mr. NILES. It is well known, that I am a decided friend of free banking. I believe it to be the true policy of the State; but at the same time I am satisfied that we must make some compromise. Now this amendment is not what I desire; but from my present impressions I shall go for it solely on the ground that if a system of free banking is adopted as it might be by the Legislature, before the expiration of the present charter, that system would become the only system that would be tolerated in the State. I am really at the present moment willing to run that risk and take my chance, and trust to the good sense of the people and the intelligence of the Legislature, in regard to this system of free banking, requiring good security. I go for it, if at all, solely on that ground, and because we cannot obtain all that we wish. [Cries of "question, question."]

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment, and they resulted as follows—yeas 86, nays 52:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gooatee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kingley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—86.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Nofsinger, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Taylor, Thornton, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolf, and Yocum—52.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now on adopting the amendment as amended.

Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to postpone the further consideration of this section until tomorrow week. I have been a silent listener to the debate on this subject, and not being in feeling or at heart in favor of any banks, I have not been disposed to participate in the discussion of this subject. But having an eye to the great interests of the people—those who are most deeply interested in a safe and sound circulating medium—I do desire that if we go into a system of banking, we should go into such a system as will be amply sufficient to secure the bill holders against loss, and indeed all the parties interested, against the depreciation of that paper. The gentlemen who are the advocates of the free banking policy seem to be strangely circumstanced. I have cast my eyes over the country from which the gentlemen hail. We find them commencing on the Madison and Indianapolis Railroad and extending along the Wabash and Erie Canal, and then we find them upon the Northern Railroad for which the celebrated agent is now concerned with the Legislature of the State, endeavoring to secure rights and privileges for that Company. Sir, I cannot but believe that these bonds are to be the basis of the free banking system. The State bonds are to be the basis on which the paper is to be predicated and—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Delaware is not in order. If he will refer to the 28th rule, he will find that all questions in relation to the priority of business are not debatable.

Mr. KILGORE. Then I will withdraw my motion and proceed with my argument. I suppose that will be in order.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. As I was remarking, the only security which the bill holder is to have is the bonds of the State. I cannot be mistaken in this, when I see the location from which the free bank party hail. That is to be the security. And what security is that for the paper with which the State is to be flooded. The State is to be indemnified, and that may be ample security so far as the State is concerned; but I ask you—if it will be any indemnity or security to the bill holder? This paper has gone into all the interests and business operations of the country; and when the bill holder applies at the counter for the redemption of the bills, is he to be met with a thousand dollar bond of the State? If the specie is not there what is to be the effect? Why, sir, the depreciation of this paper, and the scenes which we have witnessed in gone-by days in Indiana are again to be encountered, and the country is to be flooded with depreciated bank paper from one end to the other. And, sir, the burden does not fall upon the banker, but upon the individuals who hold the paper—the farming and laboring interests of the country, who are the first to feel the shock. They hold the paper, and it is depreciated in their hands. They then become subject to the operations of the banker and the shaver. They are to sustain the loss.

Now if we are to go into a system of banking, I want the character of the State to be pledged for every dollar, and that she will not be driven to the necessity of suspending specie payments; but that she will at all times be ready to meet the bill holder and redeem her liabilities. Now suppose that we go into free banking, and that State bonds are to be the basis. What condition will we be placed in? Gentlemen come here with a million of State bonds pledged with an officer of State, and on that security is issued a million of paper. Suppose also that he has a million of specie, and that he asks the State to be allowed to issue two millions of paper—one on his million of specie and the other on his million of State bonds which we are not able to pay. They go on and issue the money and get the specie for it; they pocket the funds and leave the country, and Indiana has the bonds which she issued years ago, and on which she is unable to pay the interest—she has these bonds with which to meet the bill holder. This is the system proposed on which to base your banks, and assuredly the result which I have indicated will follow.

We have been told again and again that none but knaves would advocate the doctrine advocated by the State bank party. Sir, on the other hand, I say that no man but a knave would advocate the flooding of the country with such a paper as that which must issue from the free banks founded on the basis which has been here suggested. None but a knave would seek to bring about such a state of things; and none but a craven coward would submit to such a state of things. A State Bank is proposed as a compromise. And what kind of a State Bank? Not such a one as I can support. As a State Bank man in preference to the free banking system, I shall oppose the proposition now before the Convention. It says that the State shall not be a stockholder but that she may deposit her funds in the bank when proper security is given for the same. She loans her funds here; and suppose you give her the preference over all other creditors, what is the effect of such an arrangement? Why, sir, it can have no other effect than to depreciate the character of the paper on which the bills are issued. [Applause and thumping on the benches.] I dislike to speak amid so much applause and perhaps I have said enough. [A pause, during which Mr. K. took his seat.]

I now move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until Monday next.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Todd) has the floor. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Delaware had finished when he took his seat.

Mr. TODD. I move the previous question.

The motion for the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on adopting the amendment as amended.

Mr. BORDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

A MEMBER. I move that the Convention adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment as amended, and there were yeas 79, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Had-don, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Moon-ey, Morgan, Mower, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Steven-son, Thomas, Todd, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—79.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Graham of Miami, Gra-ham of Warrick, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Mor-ri-son of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Nofsinger, Pettit, Ristine, Ritchey, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Wal-pole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Yocum—57.

So the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; after which,

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1851.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and was opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. STEELE.

FREE BANKING.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson presented the petition of J. S. Weyer and others, citizens of the county of Jefferson, and remarked that the peti-tion had been circulated and signed some month or six weeks since, but that it had not been received here until yesterday. The peti-tioners express themselves in favor of free banking as an exclusive system. Among the subscribers I find the names of many of our most enterprising business men, for whose opinions on the subject of banking I entertain the highest respect. From conversation with some of the petitioners, I believe they will be satisfied if the business of banking is left open to wholesome competition, and, sir, I confidently believe that all the petitioners will be satisfied with the compromise course pursued by their delegates upon this floor, when all the circum-stances with which we are surrounded come to be considered. As the subject of banking is now before this Convention, I shall not ask the reference of the petition, but move that it be read and laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hold in my hand, sir, a petition of a somewhat different character, signed by about one hundred ladies of the county which I, in part, have the honor of representing; and I hope the Convention will permit me to say, that while the signers of this petition dis-claim any intention of emerging beyond those bounds within which their sex generally moves, and in which their charms and virtues can most happily produce beneficial results, they still claim, upon a subject in which they are deeply interested, the right of being heard. I have the honor of being acquainted with a large portion of the fair petitioners, and I must say that in all their developments, socially as wives, daughters, and mothers, they are worthy of the highest admiration, as the embodiments of all the peculiar virtues pertaining to womankind. The petitioners pray for a provision in the Con-stitution giving married women the right of holding real and personal property separate from their husbands, at the same time disclaiming any intention of asking improper political rights. They appeal to the Convention, in strong terms, as husbands, fathers, and brothers, for justice in the premises.

The petition was referred to the committee on rights and privileges.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The section, as amended on yesterday, by Mr. Colfax, providing for a mixed system of banking, was read a third time; when

Mr. HOWE moved to re-committ with instruc-tions to add—“but such charter shall not extend beyond the period of eight years from the expi-ration of the charter of the present State bank, and its capital stock or profits shall in all cases be subject to the same rate of taxation with other banks."

Mr. HOWE remarked that he offered the proposition as one of compromise between the two parties, the one in favor of State and the other of free banks. He had conversed with the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Taylor) on the subject—a gentleman who was thoroughly conversant with the subject, and his (Mr. T.'s) views on the present scheme of compromise he (Mr. H.) had, upon reflection, with some modification, adopted as his own.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the instructions by striking out, and inserting a provision, that "the General Assembly shall, at the first session under the new Constitution, pass a law for a system of free banking, on good and sufficient securities, and shall continue the present State bank until the year 1862, and after that time there shall be no other banks than those existing under general laws—the State not to be a stockholder under said general system; stockholders to be individually liable to amount of stock; and no law to be passed authorizing a suspension of specie payments."

[Mr. T. spoke at some length in support of this proposition; his remarks will be published hereafter.]

Mr. OWEN. I am well aware that it is useless to say more than a few words, at this stage of the progress in the debate. Every man here knows that I am in favor of a general system of banking—that I believe the securities are better under that system than under the State system. Every man here knows that if I consulted my own opinions alone, I should vote against the State bank system; but every delegate here must, by this time, have become convinced that he cannot obtain exactly what he desires. Each must cede a portion of his opinions.

My judgment is, that if we are about to compromise this matter, we had better pass, just as it stands, the section which was presented yesterday by the gentleman from St. Joseph. As to the proposition of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, it will never do. In the first place, it declares that there shall be free banking, and in the next place it declares that there shall be a State bank. In both cases the provision is imperative. But a proposition, to pass here, must be that which does not impose either the one or the other system on the people of the State.

In regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, individually I am in favor of it, but I believe, if inserted, it may defeat the Constitution, seeing that there is a large portion of the people of the State, at this moment, in favor of a State bank. I do not agree with them, but I know such to be the feeling, and it is proper that we should shape our course accordingly. We must not put anything in the Constitution that will be in opposition to the opinions, or, if you please, the prejudices, of a large portion of our people. If you do, you will endanger the safety of the whole work in which we have been so long engaged.

Now, sir, I should like to see these words inserted, "readily convertible security." I hold it to be not enough that we use the words "ample security" alone. But still, I shall vote against re-committing the section, with any instructions, trusting, in subsequent sections or amendments, to throw such restrictions around the system as may be omitted here. In the meantime, if we desire to do something, I hope the section, just as it stands, will be adopted.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I think this matter has been debated long enough. I therefore move the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being first on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Laporte, (Mr. Taylor,) to the instructions moved by the gentleman from Lagrange.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 17, nays 117—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bryant, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Gregg, Howe, McClelland, Shoup, Taylor, and Thornton—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—117.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The question then being on the re-commitment of the section, with the instructions moved by the gentleman from Lagrange, it was decided in the negative.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken under the rule, and resulted—yeas 81, nays 56—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Borden, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogan, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—81.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kinley, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Pettit, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Yocum—56.

So the section was passed, and was referred to the committee on revision.

The section which provides that no person being a citizen of a foreign government, shall be a stockholder in any bank, &c., was taken upon its third reading.

Mr. STEVENSON said that the compromise section which had been adopted, was perhaps as good as any that could be adopted; he would move, therefore, that this section be laid upon the table.

Mr. WALPOLE demanded the yeas and nays and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 80, nays 53—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Hovey, Howe, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton

Todd, Wallace, Wiley, Work, and Wunderlich—80.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Bowers, Butler, Carter, Cole, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foster, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Logan, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Rariden, Ritchey, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Wolfe, Watts, Wheeler, Yocum, and Zenor—53.

So the section was laid upon the table.

The section which provides that the security shall be in State stocks, &c., was read a second time.

Mr. OWEN moved to strike out the section and insert a provision, that should a general banking law be adopted, the notes put in circulation shall be registered, and ample security given to redeem the same, in specie, dollar for dollar; but for the first twelve years, United States or Indiana stocks shall alone be taken as security.

Mr. NILES. It seems to me that enough has been already adopted on this subject. ["Consent."] We should trust something to the Legislature. The proposition already adopted is as stringent as the provision in the old N. Y. Constitution, under which there has been established the safest system of banking that was ever established on earth. I hope there will be no disposition to tie up the Legislature, or to embarrass or encumber this matter farther. I, therefore, move that the section and the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. OWEN. Will the gentleman give me an opportunity to say a word, by withdrawing that motion.

Mr. NILES. Certainly, sir, withdraw it.

Mr. OWEN. A single word, sir. I am not in favor of all the details of the present New York system of free banking for our State.

A VOICE. It is the best in the world.

Mr. OWEN. Yes, but it has one feature which I think we had better not copy; that of mortgages on real estate, as part of its collateral security. It was expressly for the purpose of cutting that off, that I moved my amendment.

Whether such mortgages may be convertible in New York or not, they are not readily convertible here. I hope the amendment will be adopted, so as to give additional security.

Mr. BORDEN. If that be the motive of the gentleman from Posey, why did he move to strike out the third section reported by the committee, and insert his long proposition. It appears to me that the original section, being short and to the point, would answer the purpose quite as well.

A VOICE. It does not apply.

I do not know why it does not apply. I do not know why security should not be required of the State Bank, as well as of any other.

Mr. BORDEN. I renew the motion of the gentleman from Laporte, to lay on the table.

The question being on laying the section and the amendment on the table,

Mr. PETTIT asked for a division of the question.

The question being first on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Posey on the table, it was, on a division—yeas 66, nays not counted—decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on laying the section on the table,

Mr. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 94, nays 36 :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Colé, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—94.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Biddle, Borden, Bryant, Chapman, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Duзан, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Pettit, Ritchey, Shoup, Smiley, Steele, Tannehill, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Yocum—36.

So the section was laid on the table.

Mr. READ of Monroe offered an additional section, providing that the trust funds of the State, if loaned to a bank, shall have priority of payment over stock and all other debts whatever.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the section will not be adopted. I hope, sir, that if the State ever puts one dollar of the public funds, whether it be the mortgage fund, or the university fund, or the common school fund, or any other trust fund, in a banking institution, it will be annihilated. The State has no trust fund to put into a new bank. It has already been put into the old bank and it will never be paid back. I hope if the State ever dabbles in banking institutions, she will lose everything she puts in of her own and of every body else.

Mr. WALPOLE. I hope this amendment will not be incorporated in the Constitution. I want the Legislature to see the impropriety of lending the credit of the State.

I am satisfied that gentlemen who proposed to lend these funds, are not aware to what extent they are going. I never will consent to withdraw over a million of dollars of the public funds now loaned on mortgage, and place them in a State Bank. If it were not for the consideration of the distress which such withdrawal would certainly produce the security of the fund itself should be a consideration.

Mr. READ. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WALPOLE. Certainly.

Mr. READ. By the proposition of the gentleman from St. Joseph, it will be seen that power is given to loan these funds to the bank.

It is not because I advocated the principle, but in case it is adopted, the security proposed in the section which I have offered should be required. I wish to give no opinion as to whether they should be put into the bank, but if so, there should be security.

Mr. WALPOLE. The Legislature may change the security in the possession of the State Bank. I want to give no such power. I want to confer no power on the Legislature of the State to bring about compromises such as never should be entered into. Gentlemen have declared themselves hostile to the doctrine, and to-day you see those very men striking hands upon this question. So will it be in the General Assembly. They will meet together and rob the State of these trust funds, for the purpose of compromising, to bring about the free banking and State bank policy. Yes, sir; and this is a compromise. Some gentlemen seem to suppose that the meaning of the section is, that the amount is to come out of the sinking fund. But, sir, it comprehends all other kinds; everything may be brought together and made servicable to the bank, while the State is to have no profits. I trust it will not be done; for if it be, it will be made an inducement for corrupt legislative action.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved to amend the section proposed by the gentleman from Monroe, by adding, "That the charter of the present State Bank shall not be renewed or extended." ["Consent"—"that is the doctrine."]

Mr. PEPPER. I think that gentlemen are by this time prepared to vote, and I therefore call the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio,

The yeas and nays were demanded and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 66 nays 63—as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Logan, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, Milligan, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—63.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then being on the section as amended,

Mr. KELSO. The previous question, I believe, is exhausted.

Mr. COOKERLY. No, sir, it goes a little further.

THE PRESIDENT. The previous question extends to—

Mr. KELSO. No, sir, it does not.

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman is somewhat hasty.

Mr. KELSO. I was replying, sir, to a very meddlesome gentleman on the floor.

THE PRESIDENT referred to and read the rule in relation to the effect of the previous question, as follows: "And its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, and bring the Convention to a direct vote upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon pending amendments, and then on the main question."

Mr. KELSO. That is true; but I supposed— if the Chair, will indulge me; for it may be that others, as well as myself, may be mistaken—that when I move an amendment, and call the previous question, the previous question, if seconded, would apply only to my amendment.

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman will see that, according to the rule which has just been read, it would apply to the section to which the amendment is proposed to be made.

The question being on the adoption of the section as amended,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 64, nays 66:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Bicknell, Borden, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Logan, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—64.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Wallace, Walpole Watts, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—66.

So the section was not adopted.

Mr. SMILEY proposed an additional section, that mortgages on real estate shall not be taken as a basis of issue for any bank or banking association.

Mr. READ of Clark moved that the amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson proposed an additional section, providing that no bank charter shall be granted to continue in force more than twenty years.

Mr. DUNN. I have introduced this section for the purpose of preventing the Legislature from granting a charter extending for a long period of years, as they do now from fifty to an hundred. I wish to have it so provided, that, if any objection should arise to the charter that may be granted, the people, after a certain time, may withdraw the charter. And all the favor that I ask of the Convention is, that no incongruous amendment may be tacked upon it, but that a fair vote shall be taken. We have seen the difficulty that arises from proposing amendments which have no connection with the original proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN proposed to amend so that all companies chartered for banking purposes shall be compelled to close up their business in twenty years.

The only argument, said Mr. H., that I shall offer in favor of the proposition as against the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson is, that it covers both cases of banking; it applies to both special charters and general banking. A general law may be passed for the formation of banking associations.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well, sir; then I will not detain the Convention with any further remarks.

Mr. WALPOLE offered the following amendment:

"And the law authorizing banking shall be subject to be repealed by the General Assembly."

The amendment having been read,

Mr. WALPOLE. At the request of some of our friends, I will withdraw my amendment for the present, and offer it as a distinct section.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion proposed to amend so that no privileges, franchise, or immunity shall be granted for banking that may not be repealed.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I have sat still for eight or nine days listening to the debate on this subject, and have not except on one occasion said a word in relation to it. I have seen this body go through with a number of sections which I think are very incongruous, as well as restrictive to such an extent that I think it will be very difficult at any time, to organize banks under them. This being the case, I think it will be right that there should be a power left with the people to supply the defect. It is a republican principle that there should be no right withheld from the people longer than they are willing that it shall be withheld. I desire that the people shall be enabled to change all laws whenever they shall be found to operate to their disadvantage. In all the other States whenever a proposition of this sort has been presented they have adopted provisions of the broadest character. I see no reason why Indiana should be behind them in this respect.

Mr. BADGER. I have sat still and heard debates upon this subject quite as long as the gentleman from Marion, and I have not opened my mouth. There seems to be a disposition to restrict the Legislature so that in reality they can do nothing. Every proposition that is moved is restrictive in its character. For one, I am tired of the discussion, and I believe that a great many others are also tired of it, I therefore move to lay the section and the amendment on the table.

Mr. CHAPMAN asked for a division of the question.

The question being first on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Marion on the table, the yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and being taken were—yeas 68, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogan, Holman Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Kelso, Lockhart, March, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Prather, Robinson, Shannon, Sims, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Watts, and Mr. President—68.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Borden, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hardin, Hendricks, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolf, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—58.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

The question was taken on laying the section proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson on the table, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. HOVEY moved to amend, so that the Legislature every twenty years after the passage of any law authorizing banking, may repeal the same.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMBACKER moved to amend by striking out "twenty," and inserting "ten."

Mr. FOSTER. Oh! for the Lord's sake have done. We have had amendments enough.

Mr. CRUMBACKER. A single word, sir. I am utterly opposed to giving any monied power so long a period for the transaction of their business without holding them to an accountability. I should like to see them compelled to wind up their affairs as often, at least, as once in ten years.

Mr. BASCOM moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Lake, to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten," it was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the section proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the section was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. FOSTER,
The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. BASCOM. Is it in order now to offer a new section?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. BASCOM. Then I offer the following:

"All bank stock and bank property real and personal, shall be taxed at the same rate as other property in this State is taxed."

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I hope the Convention will adopt some general provision on the subject, with the view of taxing all property alike. That will include bank stock and other bank property. I therefore move to lay the section on the table.

Mr. BASCOM. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the question being taken, the section was laid upon the table.

Mr. BORDEN. I propose the following additional section:

"No note shall be issued or put into circulation of a less denomination than five dollars; and, after the year 1860, less than ten dollars. And the Legislature shall reserve the right, after the year 1870, to prohibit the issuing of any note or bill, of a less denomination than twenty dollars."

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the section on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELSO. I would ask the gentleman from Allen whether he means bank notes or promissory notes?

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman from Switzerland could not mistake the purport of the section. It is on the subject of banking and bank notes that we are treating, and not on that of promissory notes.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 78, nays 42—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Robinson, Schoonover, Sherrod, Sims, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—78.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Borden, Butler, Chapman, Coats, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foster, Graham of Miami, Hendricks, Holman, Johnson, Jones, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Trimby, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Wunderlich—42.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. EDMONSTON. I offer the following as an additional section:

"In all cases where the General Assembly shall grant any bank charter, or create any corporation with power to issue bills of credit, or bills payable to order or bearer, they shall require at least one-half per cent. per annum, on the capital for the benefit of common schools."

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the section on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELSO. I wish to inquire for information, whether we did not pass a section the other day requiring a quarter of one per cent. on such stock, and then in certain cases, the addition of the half of one per cent. on this capital?

The PRESIDENT. That section was not passed.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the section on the table, there were yeas 68, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Beach, Blythe, Bourne, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dick, Duzan of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Garvin, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Kent, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Milroy, Mooney, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Mr. President—68.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Bowers, Bracken, Borden, Butler, Conduit, Davis of Parke, Dunn of P., Duzan, Edmonston, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hendricks, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Maguire, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Owen, Prather, Ritchey, Robinson, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, and Zenor—51.

So the proposed section was laid on the table.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I ask the Convention to suspend the order of business for a few moments, in order to give me an opportunity of offering a resolution.

Mr. COOKERLY. What is the purport of it? Read it. Let us know what it is.

Mr. DUNN. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the Convention suspend the further consideration of the bank question, until Tuesday next."

Mr. COOKERLY. What is your object in offering this resolution? State your reason.

Mr. DUNN. I offer this resolution with the view that we may have time to reflect upon what we have already done, so that we may know where we are.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the order of business, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. SHOUP offered an additional section, to the effect that the Legislature should have the right to alter or amend any law authorizing or incorporating any banks, and that no bank having branches should have the power to prevent the establishment of additional branches.

Mr. HAMILTON moved to lay the proposed section on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE offered the following, as an additional section:

"Any bank or branches established under this Constitution, shall never be permitted to issue more than two dollars for every one of specie which they have in their vaults."

Mr. KELSO. From the very first start of our coming here, I believed that we were assembled for the purpose of making a Constitution for the State of Indiana, and not a bank charter. But we appear now to have got far beyond that point, and in order that we may now stop and certainly have nothing further than a bank charter, I will move to lay that amendment upon the table.

The question being taken, the motion to lay the amendment upon the table, was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN offered the following as an additional section:

"No special act of incorporation or general law authorizing the issuing of bills, or notes to circulate as money, shall ever take effect until the same is submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received the approval of a majority of the voters voting at such election.

Mr. MATHER moved to lay the section on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Bicknell, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Butler, Carr, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Robinson, Schoonover, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Wiley, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—76.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Bascom, Beeson, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Carter, Cookerly, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Pepper of Ohio, Prather, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—52.

So the proposed section was laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT offered the following as an additional section:

"All the members of the political State of Indiana, shall have the same rights, privileges, and immunities."

Mr. P. said, he did not wish to debate the question at all. He only asked that he might have the yeas and nays on its adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to lay the proposed section on the table.

Mr. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays being ordered and taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Hell, Hamilton, Harbott, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Lockhart, Logan, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Spann, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—55.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hardin, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, March, Marher, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Trimble, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, and Yocum—75.

So the proposed section was not laid upon the table.

Mr. BRACKEN. I move to amend the section by adding at the end of it, these words:

"Because one man is as good as another, if not a little better." [Laughter.]

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to make a suggestion to the Convention. It is evident we have got weary of this business, and I propose that we pass on for the present, and go to other business. For myself, I cannot tell what has been done upon this subject. I cannot tell what amendment I ought to vote for and what I ought to oppose; nor do I believe that any gentleman can vote intelligibly, until the subject, as it is now situated, is fairly before him. I trust that we shall lay the whole subject on the table, and proceed to the consideration of something else. [Loud cries of "No, no, no."]

The PRESIDENT. Does the gentleman from Allen move to lay the whole article on the table?

Mr. BORDEN. I do.

Mr. PETTIT. A vote has just been taken on laying the section on the table, and the Convention refused to do so. I think, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Allen is out of order.

The PRESIDENT. The question of laying a single section, and that of laying the whole article on the table, are two very different questions.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Borden, it was decided in the negative.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rush.

Mr. PETTIT. I have only one word to say in reference to that amendment. If the gentleman supposes that it includes negroes and mulattoes, or if there be any desire on the part of the Convention to insert words particularly including them, I have no objection to vote for the insertion of such words. Let me remind gentlemen of the language of the section which I have offered. It is that "all the members of the political State of Indiana shall have the same rights, privileges, and immunities—"

Mr. ROBINSON (in his seat). In banking,

Mr. PETTIT. Yes, and in everything else. It may be well to say who are members of the political State of Indiana. You intend, undoubtedly, to exclude the negro. We all admit that negroes are not members of the political State. You and I are members of the political State; but they are not. It must be understood, too, that this section relates to a particular class. Children cannot enjoy these rights; but all men of the age of 21 years, enjoy them. All children, simply as children, and all women have certain political rights; but they are not of the kind contemplated by this section. The Indians are not members of the political State, nor is the negro; but this is simply saying that all the members of the political State shall have the same political rights. I hope that the amendment will not be adopted, and that the amendment will be passed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to re-commit the section and pending amendment to the committee on rights and privileges. [Cries of "consent, consent."]

Mr. PETTIT. I am quite willing that it should go there. I have no objection whatever.

The question being taken on the motion to re-commit, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I move to suspend the order of business, for the purpose of offering a resolution. It is as follows:

"Resolved, That no more new sections shall be offered to article twenty-four."

A MEMBER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered and the question being taken,

The motion to suspend the order of business was not agreed to.

Mr. MILROY offered the following as an additional section:

"No bank hereafter established in this State shall be allowed to issue or pay out any bill or note, to circulate as money, of a less denomination than five dollars."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Carrol, that such a section is out of order; the Convention having voted down that proposition already.

PREFERENCE TO BILL HOLDERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is the following section on its third reading:

"The bill holders shall be entitled to preference of payment, over all other creditors, in case of insolvency."

Mr. COLFAX. There appears to be an impression upon the minds of the Convention, that this is embraced in the compromise section. It is the free bank part of it, but is not in the State bank, and should certainly be passed now; so that it will operate on both systems.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section was ordered to be engrossed by consent.

LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day, is section 5, on its second reading.

The section was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"The stockholders shall be individually responsible to an amount equal to that of their respective shares of stock, for all the debts or liabilities of every kind."

Mr. PETTIT. I offer the following amendment to that section: Strike out the words "to an amount equal to that of their respective shares of stock;" and then the section will read:

"The stockholders shall be individually responsible for all the debts or liabilities of every kind."

That will make the stockholders in any bank liable for all the debts and liabilities of every kind that may be incurred. That is what I want.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to lay the section and pending amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Sims, Spann, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, and Mr. President—58.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Conduit, Crawford, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Logan, March, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Trimbly, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—75.

So the section and amendment were not laid upon the table.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. PETTIT.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clark, Robinson, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—76.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Harbolt, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Logan, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Pepper of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, and Yocum—55.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. KELSO. I have a motion now that I desire to make, but I will preface it with a few remarks. The section now pending, since the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe has been laid upon the table, is simply to make the stockholders liable for all the debts of a bank, to an amount equal to their stock in such bank.

Mr. COOKERLY. That provision has been adopted already.

Mr. KELSO. Now permit me to state briefly the true condition of this matter. In the first place, I put this to the bank men, whether every man here—no matter whether he be in favor of a State Bank or a free bank—will dare to declare himself in favor of any institution other than a safe and sound one? Then if we so arrange it that all the banks hereafter in Indiana shall be safe and sound institutions, I do desire gentlemen to tell me where is the danger or objection to asking a banker to stand behind it and give security to its issues? I go further than that; I would make them give security for their deposits. Here, for instance, is a poor man with a hundred dollars, or a poor widow with a like amount, perhaps the last remnant of her husband's estate, which she deposits with the banker for safe keeping, or perhaps with the view of increasing it by obtaining a little interest in order that she may, by and bye, use it for the education and bringing up of her children; and in case of failure she is to lose this little pittance—little in itself, though all to her—while the rich man who has perhaps ten thousand dollars in the paper of this bank, must first have every dollar redeemed at its full amount before the widow can obtain one cent. I ask if that is having equal rights in banking?

But I go further and say, that there is but one method by which you can put the banker on an equality with the people. If you hold him responsible in no greater amount than that of his stock, you hold out to him an inducement to break with the public. Then while he is living in luxury and riding in his carriage and four, you cannot, even with a hundred dollars of his worthless paper money, buy a single pound of butter.

If, then, Mr. President, the object is to furnish a safe and sound medium, let us compel the banker to stand at the back of his bank and back it up with his property as long as he has a single dollar to back it with. Now, for the purpose of giving gentlemen a fair opportunity to consider this matter, which I believe to be one of very great importance, I will move to lay the section on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Switzerland that the Convention has just refused to lay the section on the table.

Mr. KELSO. I beg pardon, but it appears to me that that was a very different question. The motion was to lay the section and amendment on the table, and the Convention refused to accede to it. A motion was then made to lay the amendment on the table, which was agreed to. And certainly, according to my notions of parliamentary rules, if the motion to lay an amendment on the table, after the Convention had refused to do so when made in connection with laying the section on the table, was in order, a motion to lay the section on the table must also be in order. I cannot understand why the section should be protected more than the amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman from Switzerland, it appears to me, does injustice to the section. He says that the stockholders are only liable to the amount of their stock for the redemption of their bills.

Mr. KELSO. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. COLFAX. That was the way I understood the gentleman, and so did other members around me. Now the reason why I prefer the section in its present form is this: The object in authorizing banks at all is to increase the business facilities of the country, and we should, while we made them safe by all healthy restrictions, not incorporate provisions which will actually discourage and prevent the investment in them of capital from abroad. What man worth fifty thousand dollars will invest a thousand dollars in a bank, if he knows that, while the management of the bank will be in other hands, he would, in case of its failure, be liable to lose all the remainder of his property? Is it not the fairer rule to provide, as we have distinctly in the compromise section that has been passed, that he who subscribes a thousand dollars in stock, shall be liable to a thousand dollars more, and he who invests ten thousand for ten thousand more? Then the responsibility is graduated by the amount of interest the stockholder possesses in the bank, and he who pockets dividends and profits on a large amount is responsible for a large amount, while he who has but a small amount of dividends is made responsible in proportion. This certainly is the fairest and most equitable rule, and I trust no more stringent one will be adopted.

Mr. PETTIT. It is only the same rule that is applied to men who join together in trading in goods; precisely the same; and I see no reason why the man who trades in paper which in itself is of no value, should not be subjected to the same laws which govern partnerships in other business. That is equality. To make the paper traders an exception, is to give them privileges over and above what are given to other citizens; and it is to that that I object, and shall continue to object.

Mr. NILES. In order to avoid any ambiguity or misunderstanding, I move the following amendment to the section: Insert at the end of the fifth line the words, "over and above their stock."

The section as I propose to amend it will then read as follows:

"The stockholders shall be individually responsible to an amount, over and above their stock, equal to that of their respective shares of stock for all the debts or liabilities of every kind."

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman from St. Joseph supposes a case of two persons going into banking together—the one being worth, say, three thousand dollars, and the other say, a hundred thousand dollars. The one puts in one thousand, and the other ten thousand. Now I ask whether such a provision would not constitute an inducement to men of wealth to inveigle men of small capital to join them, and perhaps to risk their all, they knowing that in case of failure they are only liable for the obligations of the bank to the amount of stock they may hold; and thus, while they lead hundreds of small capitalists to ruin, they themselves are not only safe, but perhaps fattening on the alleged profits of the establishment—profits too often made by dividing as dividends the actual stock or capital advanced by the less wealthy class of stockholders. Sir, from the year 1834 to the year 1842, this system was carried on in England to a most alarming extent, involving thousands in the most absolute ruin. If, then, gentlemen of wealth and integrity chose to go into banking, and to take rogues into partnership with them, let them stand the brunt of it. I do think that this principle ought to prevail. In regard to depositors, I have no objection to the section as reported by the committee. But whenever you come to the issue, I think they ought to be responsible to the full amount of their property.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark to gentlemen that the very same thing is passed in another section which we have adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following amendment: Strike out the whole section and insert as follows:

"Every stockholder or incorporation issuing bills to circulate as money shall be individually liable—"

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the gentleman from Dearborn that there is an amendment pending which has preference.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a motion made to amend the original section. Will not the motion to strike out and insert be in order?

The PRESIDENT. Most certainly not. The question will be upon the pending amendment first; because the friends of the section have a right to perfect it before any motion can be made to strike out. And, in addition to that, the pending amendment was first offered.

Mr. OWEN. I hope, sir, that the amendment of the gentleman from Laporte (Mr. Niles) will be adopted. I know very well, as you yourself have said, that this provision is in the compromise section, and that it applies both to free and to State Banks. But there is, perhaps, something equivocal about it. As the few words proposed as an amendment by the gentleman from Laporte will make the matter absolutely certain, I hope that amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish only to say a single word. It is clear that we never can have any system of banking until the Legislature passes a charter; and, when they do so, they can impose just such restrictions as they please from time to time. Sir, there is not a Constitution in any State in the Union which has gone so far in regard to placing restrictions on banking, as we have gone. We are acting here as if we were making a bank out and out. Now, Mr. President, the result of this will probably be, that the State will have to call another Convention within ten years, unless we leave something for the Legislature to do when they incorporate a bank system; and there is no doubt that, whatever is left for them to do, they will do it right. Unless, when you adopt some very general principle, and leave the details to be settled by the Legislature, you may depend upon it that there will be continual demands for the holding of Conventions to revise the Constitution in this respect. I trust, sir, that neither the section nor the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COOKERLY. What would be the effect of a motion to indefinitely postpone the section?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Vigo until we have a vote upon the proposition.

Mr. COOKERLY. I would certainly like to see the matter disposed of in some way. I see that a great many gentlemen are determined to offer amendments; and it appears to me as if they would make a revised code of our Constitution.

Mr. BASCOM. I move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained, and the main question being ordered to be now put, the question was first taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Niles, and it was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BRACKEN moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was decided in the negative.

SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the order of the day is section No. 6.

The section was read as follows:

"No authority shall be given sanctioning, in any manner, the suspension of specie payments."

Mr. KELSO. I have some objections to offer to that section, and if the Convention will bear with me, I promise gentlemen that I will not detain them more than five minutes. Now, sir, it is urged that, unless we ourselves bank, the State of Ohio, and other adjacent States having banks, we shall be compelled to receive their notes, and even to pay them a premium for the use of them. We then create a system of banking in self-defense, in order that we may provide our own citizens with a circulating medium, that whatever may be made by it may be kept at home. Now, if we put a clause in our Constitution providing that the Legislature of Indiana shall never have power to sustain the banks in case of a pressure and a suspension of specie payments by the banks of other States, the Legislature will of course be bound by that clause. Suppose now, that every bank in the adjoining States should suspend specie payments, and that it would be their direct object and interest to run upon us for every dollar of silver and gold they could get out of the Bank; while they are sustaining themselves under this suspension rule, and reap all the benefit, we are subjecting ourselves to be destroyed, simply because we have given up the privilege of defending ourselves as they defend themselves. Nothing is more certain than that, if specie payments had not been suspended in 1838, the State would have been ruined and the Bank broken. There is no certainty whatever that a similar crisis may not again occur. Now, sir, we talk largely about State stock and General Government securities. In times of suspension of specie payments by banks, or any difficulty of this kind, we all know that stocks are worth less, and sales can with difficulty be effected. All our securities become depreciated, and if the Legislature might sustain a suspension of specie payments for a short time, until the stocks could be profitably disposed of, so that they might not be forced into market when the market was depressed, then, perhaps, each branch might be able to sustain itself. I say it certainly is folly to throw that barrier in the way of the action of the Legislature, by supposing that that body will not have the confidence of the people and honesty enough to do right when a crisis may come. Sir, we are tying up the hands of the Legislature in every corner, and not allowing the people to act. It seems to me that we are going far beyond our province—far beyond any object for which we were sent here. It is my candid opinion that we should leave this matter open to the Legislature. It is for them and the people to settle, if a difficulty of that kind should come upon them. I hope, therefore, that the Convention will not pass this section.

The question being then taken, the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and,

On motion,

The Convention then adjourned.

~~~~~
THURSDAY, JAN. 16th, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. CRESSY.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. RITCHEY moved to postpone the special order for the purpose of enabling him to make a report from a select committee.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE SPECIAL ORDER.

The section in relation to hail in criminal cases, on its final passage, having been made the special order for this day, was taken up.

The question being on a motion to re-commit, with instructions to abolish capital punishment, with an amendment to said instructions, excepting for the crime of wilful and deliberate murder,

Mr. KELSO. It seems to me that we might with all propriety, as very few gentlemen, I apprehend, are prepared to meet this question at this moment, inasmuch as we have been engaged with the banking question from day to day for some time past, defer this subject for the present. I therefore move that its further consideration be postponed until this day week.

The motion was, upon a division—ayes 36, noes not counted—rejected.

The question being on the amendment to the instructions,

Mr. READ of Clark demanded the previous question.

The previous question was—by ayes 61, noes 37—seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being first on the amendment to the instructions, it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman from Carroll to re-commit the section with instructions, and it was rejected.

The question then being, "Shall the section pass?"

The yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 128, nays 0:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Braeken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Conduit, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of Wabash, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Rariden, Read of Clarke, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spans, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—128

NAYS.—0.

Mr. OWEN, from the committee on rights and privileges, to whom was referred the memorial from the ladies of Lawrenceburgh, reported the following section:

"SEC. —. The real and personal property of married women, and a liberal provision for widows, shall be and remain secured to them, respectively under equitable conditions, by law."

The section was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RITCHEY, from the committee on future amendments to the Constitution, reported two sections, providing that "whenever two-thirds of all the members elected to each branch of the General Assembly shall think it necessary, a vote for or against a Convention may be ordered, and if the people decide in favor of a Convention, then a Convention may be called for the purpose of revising, altering, or amending the Constitution. Amendments may be proposed to the Constitution in either branch of the General Assembly, and if agreed to by two-thirds of all the members elected to each of the two Houses, then the amendment or amendments shall be referred to the next regular session of the Legislature, and shall be published three months before the time of electing members of the House, and if, at the next regular session, a majority of all the members elected in each branch shall agree to such amendment or amendments, then it shall be their duty to submit the same to the people, at the next general election, for their adoption or rejection; and if the people shall vote for such amendment or amendments, the same shall become a part of the Constitution. If more than one amendment is submitted, the vote shall be taken separately," &c.

The sections were read a first time and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson, from the committee on that subject, reported back an amended section, in relation to reprieves, and the remission of fines and forfeitures by the Governor, requiring him to submit the same to the Legislature, and giving the Legislature power, if deemed necessary, to appoint the officers of State to act as counsel to the Governor in granting reprieves.

The report of the committee was concurred in.

The question being on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. KELSO proposed to amend by adding the words "or remittances."

This, said Mr. K., is the most important, or at least an equally important branch of the Governor's duty. When a man commits an offense against the criminal law of the State, if after having given security, he absconds from the country, there is a forfeiture incurred, and it becomes a part of the educational fund of the State. By this section the Governor is left at full liberty to remit all these forfeitures at his pleasure, whereas, he cannot grant a pardon without the advice of his council.

Now, I maintain that he should have the advice of the council as well in relation to the remittance of fines and forfeitures, as in relation to the granting of pardons.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. The committee thought that another provision contained in the section would probably be a sufficient restraint upon the Governor in regard to the granting of pardons and the remission of fines and forfeitures.

That is the provision which requires that he shall report to the Legislature at each session, all cases of the remission of fines and forfeitures, and the amount so remitted. We supposed, sir, that this would be a sufficient check. The only alteration made in the original section is this: It now gives the General Assembly power to provide a council for the Governor, to advise with him in relation to the granting of pardons, if the General Assembly should see proper so to do. It is not obligatory; it is merely a power which they may exercise or not, as they shall see proper. The proposition for providing a council for the Governor in relation to the remitting of fines and forfeitures was before the committee, and it was thought that great difficulty might arise out of it. I think, myself, it is sufficient as it now stands. But I have no great objection that the whole matter should be left in the hands of the Legislature.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Switzerland, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. WATTS moved to amend by adding the following:

"And that said remittances and pardons shall in no case be granted unless recommended by the court before which the party is tried and convicted."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THE BANK QUESTION.

The section providing that the bill holders shall have the preference in case of insolvency, was read a third time and passed.

The section providing that stockholders shall be individually responsible to the amount of their stock, over and above the amount of such stock, was read a third time.

Mr. BORDEN moved to recommit with instructions to insert:

"The stockholders in every corporation or association for banking purposes issuing bank notes or any kind of paper credit to circulate as money, shall be individually responsible for all the notes or bills issued or put in circulation by said corporation or association."

Mr. BORDEN said, he would ask the attention of the Convention but a few minutes. He said it was his intention on yesterday to have occupied their attention for a short time in discussing this proposition. But he saw at the time that the Convention was impatient of the debate. But now having submitted his proposition he hoped they would excuse him if he should briefly attempt to point out his reasons for it. He believed that the stockholders should not only be individually liable in the whole amount of their estates for all the bills which they should put in circulation as money; but, also, for all money deposited with them, as well as for bills of exchange, which they may have drawn; indeed, sir, for all contracts of every name and description, the same as private citizens. But, sir, I think I see a disposition on part of the Convention not to go as far as I do in this matter. Therefore all that I propose now is that they shall be individually responsible for the bills or notes which they may issue and put in circulation as money. Sir, thousands who may know nothing of the management of the bank or the responsibility of those who we authorized to go into banking will be compelled to take their paper. I say compelled to take it, for every business man is forced by public opinion to receive such currency as is in circulation or quit business. As to those who choose to transact business with the banks by depositing with them, as they generally live in the same neighborhood with the institution, or who may purchase bills of exchange of them. I have no objections to their doing so at their own risk; but, sir, I trust this Convention is prepared to go far enough to secure the bill holders, the farmers and mechanics of the country, far away from the institution, and who are necessitated to receive the notes of these institutions. And, sir, for the purpose of seeing who will and who will not stand by the interest of this State, I will demand the yeas and noes upon my proposition.

Mr. WOLFE demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being upon re-committing with instructions,

Mr. BORDEN asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 61, nays 69—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cole, Cookerly, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foster, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Logan, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Taylor, Walpole, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—61.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Brookbank, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of

The question then being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 95, nays 10—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Schoonover, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—95.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Bascom, Borden, Dunn of Perry, Garvin, Howe, McFarland, Pettit, Ristine, Ritchey, and Sherrod—10.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision.

THE SUPPLEMENT TO THE COMPROMISE.

The section which provides that no suspension of specie payments shall be sanctioned, was read a third time.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to make a motion to re-commit the section, and I shall preface it with a very few words. A true navigator never puts out with a small skiff on a stormy sea, and therefore I did not present this proposition yesterday, because I knew the excitement that prevailed in this House. It is a very simple proposition which the friends of the free banking system desire should be adopted, and to which, I am sure, the friends of the State Bank can have no objection. I have shown my proposition to the gentleman from St. Joseph, and he has assented to it. It proposes to introduce the words "readily convertible security," so that the security may not only be ultimately good, but readily convertible into specie. I propose to re-commit this section with instructions to insert these words: "all collateral security required under the general banking law shall be readily convertible."

Mr. PETTIT moved to amend the instructions by adding the following: "All charters shall be repealable by the Legislature."

Mr. KENT demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe,

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Bryant, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hardin, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Kinley, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Owen, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, and Yocum—57.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Stevenson, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Zenor, and Mr. President—70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question being on re-committing the section, with the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Posey,

Mr. OWEN demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. Will it be possible, by unanimous consent, to add a word or two to the instructions?

The PRESIDENT. The subject is under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. PETTIT. It requires the addition of the word "specie," otherwise it appears to me it means nothing.

Mr. OWEN. The word "specie" is in the compromise section, and it is not necessary to repeat it. Mr. President, may I be permitted a single word of explanation?

The PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were then taken, with the following result—yeas 70, nays 51—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of, Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Smiley, Steele, Tannehill, Trimble, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—70.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Beard, Bourne, Brookbank, Butler, Carr, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Gibson, Gootee, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Kelso, Logan, Mather, McClelland, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Pettit, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Wallace, Walpole, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—51.

The section which provides that banks shall close up their business at the end of twenty years, from their organization, was read a third time.

Mr. CARTER moved to re-commit the section with instructions to amend so as to give power to the Legislature, whenever they may deem that the public good requires it, to repeal all laws in relation to banking and bank charters.

Mr. COLFAX rose to a question of order. His point of order was, that the proposition contained in the instructions had been decided over and over again by the Convention.

Mr. CARTER. No, sir, it is not the same proposition. This has reference to banking corporations exclusively. I hope the section will be re-committed with these instructions. It is said by gentlemen, that a private corporation is a matter of private concern. I believe that heretofore all charters have been considered in the light of contracts, and that the Legislature have no right to revoke or repeal them. If we establish a provision of this kind, we destroy this construction of the law, and place the whole matter in the hands of the Legislature, so that whenever they deem the public good requiring it, they can repeal and revoke the law or charter under which the corporation acts. The Legislature should not give to any set of men powers and privileges greater than those enjoyed by his fellow citizens, which they cannot withdraw when they please. My instructions embody what has been recognized in Ohio. It is the present law in New York. If it is right on Ohio soil and on New York soil—if it be right that it should be ingrafted in the free banking laws of other States, I cannot see why it is not equally applicable to a law for free banking, or any other kind of banking, in Indiana.

Sir, when a corporation is once established, without some such restriction as this, it will have an almost unlimited power. It will be beyond the control of law, unless it violates the charter under which it acts, which thus renders what is called the contract void.

Sir, is a banking charter a contract? The Legislature grants to the corporation powers that the rest of the State do not possess. Is there a "value received," on the part of the people? Sir, the mere title means nothing. The word corporation gives nothing in itself. It is the privileges that you give to the corporation, that make it formidable. You may call a man lord, king, or tyrant, but unless you give him the power of a lord, king, or tyrant, he is harmless. So with corporations. They have power, and it is to protect the people, and defend their rights, that I wish to see this section re-committed, with these instructions.

A law of incorporation is not a contract, and let us so declare it, and then, whenever the people think that a corporation is not discharging its duties or accomplishing the ends they desire, they may have the power to revoke, repeal, or amend, the charter or law under which the corporation exists.

Mr. GORDON demanded the previous question.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark in regard to the motion of the gentleman from Montgomery, that it is not in order, inasmuch as a similar proposition has been offered by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and rejected by the Convention.

Mr. PETTIT. My proposition applied to all charters.

Mr. CARTER. Mine applies to laws relating to banking and to bank charters.

The PRESIDENT. The instructions of the gentleman from Tippecanoe related to charters of all kinds and they were negatived. That of the gentlemen from Montgomery relates to bank charters only. As the major includes the minor, therefore it is not in order to entertain the motion of the gentleman from Montgomery on the same day and at the same stage of the bill.

Mr. RITCHEY. I voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe merely on the ground that it embraced all charters, but I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery.

Mr. CARTER appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The appeal was debated by Messrs. Pettit, Carter, Ritchey, Smith of Scott, and Kelso; and after some remarks by the President.

The question was taken on the appeal by yeas and nays, with the following result—yeas 68, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hovey, Huff, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, McClelland, Mooney, Morgan, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Schoonover, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, and Zenor—68.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Carter, Chapman, Cookerly, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Garvin, Gordon, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, March, Mather, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Newman, Pettit, Read of Clark, Ristine, Ritchey, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Walpole, Wheeler, and Wiley—43.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained by the Convention.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

Mr. STEVENSON moved the previous question, which was seconded and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was taken on the passage of the section and decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 8—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogan, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—107.

YAYS.—Messrs. Clark of Hamilton, Hovey, Howe, Pettit, Ristine, Shoup, Walpole, and Wiley—8.

So the section passed and was referred to the committee on revision.

Mr. READ of Clark remarked, that the newly-elected United States Senator (Mr. Bright) was anxious to meet his fellow citizens this evening in this Hall, and it would require several hours to make the necessary preparations. He therefore moved that the Convention adjourn until to-morrow morning, at nine o'clock.

Upon this motion the question was taken by yeas and nays, with the following result—yeas 36, nays 56—as follows:

YEA.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Berry, Bryant, Butler, Carr, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warwick, Gregg, Hall, Harbolt, Hawkins, Jones, Kendall of White, Logan, Maguire, Milroy, Mooney, Niles, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, and Mr. President—36.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Blythe, Bracken, Brookbank, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hardin, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson, Kent, Kinley, March, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Todd, Triamble, Watts, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—56.

So the Convention refused to adjourn until to-morrow morning.

On motion, the Convention then took the usual recess until two o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention having been called to order,

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

REMARKS OF MR. NILES,

On Banking and Currency, in Convention, January 4, 1851.

Mr. NILES. It will be admitted by all, that we should be careful to adopt as constitutional provisions, none but wholesome general principles and rules, and that we should equally avoid unsound principles which must from their nature, at some time and in some way, operate badly, and mere legislative details which may after a series of years lead to great inconvenience. From the intimate connection of currency and banking with all the commercial and pecuniary interests of society, the importance of this rule, as applicable to the subject now before the Convention becomes apparent. In legislation a lesser evil may sometimes be substituted for a greater; but no such policy should prevail in settling the principles of banking. I desire to bring the various proposed plans to the test of this doctrine, and to discuss the subject as briefly as possible with that view.

In the first place, I may be permitted to remark that in reference to this question there are four parties among us, as, perhaps, also among the people. One party stands opposed to all banks and banking, as unsound in principle and pernicious in practice. Another is in favor of the present State Bank, or some other institution organized upon similar principles to succeed it. Then we have another party who are in favor of what is called "Free Banking," though the name, which seems to be odious to some, is far from expressing the true idea. And we have others who are in favor of combining the two systems, or of authorizing both or either. In this arrangement of parties, I find myself among those know as free bankers.

I desire to submit a few remarks in reference to the questions presented by each of these parties. And first as to the question of bank or no bank. I hold, sir, that banks and banking in the present condition of the commercial world are not an evil in themselves, and necessarily, but only in their abuse. The abuses of banking are full of evils, destroying confidence, giving fictitious and fluctuating values to commodities, and deranging credit and commerce.

Commerce gives life to society and sound credit is the life of commerce. The operations of commerce have for centuries been carried on by means of bills of exchange and other commercial paper. Bank notes may accomplish in a limited sphere, the same objects which are subserved on a wider scale, by bills of exchange. But in order that bills of exchange or bank notes should answer a useful purpose, they must have a substantial basis, and be the real representatives of value. The precious metals in the form of coin, are of no value except as a standard, and an instrument of commerce. It is evident that nothing is added to the wealth of the country by the transfer of the precious metals from point to point, and that the transfer of commodities by means of an actual representative of value is equally useful, and generally far more convenient than the direct exchange of bulky articles. It is equally consistent with my own and the public interest, that I have ten dollars of bank notes to meet my current expenses as that I should be compelled to carry in my pocket ten dollars of silver, provided that the bank notes have a substantial basis, and be convertible at any moment into specie, and it is far more convenient for myself and others. It would be a retrograde movement to dispense with paper as a representative of value, even in the limited commerce of a single State. In its way, it would be like dispensing with labor saving machinery. We might as well think of returning to the Spartan currency of iron as to the sole use of the precious metals. Some safe and legalized system of banking seems peculiarly necessary in a new country like ours where individual capital and credit are limited, and even in an old and wealthy community, I see no reason why associated wealth may not be permitted to compete with capital accumulated in the hands of individuals.

We all know that sound banks do not only furnish a most convenient circulating medium, but that by occasional and temporary loans they aid the commercial, agricultural, manufacturing, and all other industrial interests.

But sir, even if we would, we are wholly unable to exclude the use of Bank paper by the people of the State. It will circulate among us, and by prohibiting banks which would be subject to our own laws, we would only flood the country with less reliable bank paper of other States. There is "a higher law" upon this subject than constitutions—the convenience and necessities of the people. Illinois has refused to permit banks, and yet in the city of Chicago, a private individual, acting under the charter of a Marine and Fire Insurance Company, granted by the Legislature of Wisconsin, which has been long since repealed, has issued and put in circulation a million or upwards of dollars in bank paper, which passes throughout that country as gold and silver. And what has Illinois gained by her prohibition? Nothing but to compel her citizens to pay exorbitant rates of interest on loans from private bankers or shavers. If the private banker, or broker, or money lender can be tolerated, why may not banking be made useful when regulated by law?

But I apprehend, sir, that the anti-bank party can never secure a majority of this Convention, and that some system of banking will be authorized, unless, unfortunately, the whole policy should be defeated by dissensions among its friends.

A word, sir, to those who favor the State Bank, or one organized on similar principles. I am opposed to such a Bank, as being strictly a monopoly, though I would not use that word in its odious sense, or for the purpose of arraying prejudice. The State Bank is the only Bank which can exist in the State under our present Constitution. It has the sole privilege of issuing bank paper under the authority of law; it may issue the amount of twice and a half its capital, and has, at the present moment, about three dollars of bills in circulation for every dollar of specie in its vaults; and it is authorized to loan its bills at the same rate of interest at which a private individual can loan gold or silver. These rights belong to the present owners of the stock, and to their heirs and assignees, to the exclusion of all other citizens of the State. Now, sir, suppose that the stock of the Bank is at this moment owned by one hundred or one thousand men; what would be the difference, in effect, if these privileges were conferred exclusively upon those men by name, and upon the persons whom they should by contract appoint as their successors, or upon them and their eldest male descendants? In that form, such a law could not be tolerated; and yet every exclusive bank charter, upon the principles of our present Bank, is of precisely such a character. It does give to a few citizens exclusive privileges which are denied to all others. Such monopolies should be created only on the ground of absolute necessity, for they are inconsistent with the doctrine of equal rights. And if it can be shown that another system may combine the principle of free competition and equality of rights with safety and usefulness, that circumstance alone will be a strong argument in its favor.

Again, sir: the continued solvency of the State Bank depends almost entirely upon the integrity and good conduct of the men who manage it. It has been our good fortune to have cautious and honorable men connected with the Bank; and it is said that the experiment of State Banking, under an exclusive charter, has been proven to be successful, and ought to be continued. But, sir, though successful here thus far, the system has failed in nearly all the other States which have tried it. Let the State Bank be perpetuated, and we have no guarantee for the future in its past history. Accidental circumstances can never be relied upon as elements of permanent security. In a series of years, the present managers of the Bank will disappear, and their heirs may not possess their prudence. They may sell their stock to reckless speculators, in or out of the State; and then what will have become of your security?

A large portion of the people are friendly to the present State Bank, simply because its bills have been good. And I have been surprised to learn the extent to which the idea has prevailed, that the faith of the State is pledged for their redemption. The State, of course, is not liable for the bills, or any of the debts of the Bank. Who, I might ask, would be willing to commit the custody of the faith of the State to any one set of men and their heirs, or whoever should offer to them the largest price for the privilege of becoming its keepers? And yet the bankers are in effect the guardians of the State's credit to the amount of her capital in the institution.

It is also said that State Banking ought to be encouraged because part of the profits of the Bank are applied to purposes of education. A Bank report was submitted to this Convention, showing a profit to the State for the use of schools of near a million of dollars. That report has been published in many of the newspapers of the State, and has had its influence upon the public mind. But, sir admitting the Bank to be now solvent—a fact of which I have no doubt—and what has the State made by meddling in the banking business? If she has made a million of dollars, she has lost a million; and on balancing the account, the profit will be found wanting. It will be remembered by all, that when the State proposed to increase its capital in the Bank, and authorized a loan for that purpose, bonds to the amount of a million of dollars were sold to the Morris Canal and Banking Company, which proved an almost total loss. That million of dollars is to-day an incumbrance upon the property of the State. What assurance have we that a time of wild speculation may not come upon the country—that the control of the Bank may not pass into the hands of wild speculators, and its whole capital be lost as effectually as if sunk in the middle of the sea?

Mr. HAMILTON. I would take the liberty to correct the gentleman in one statement which I think he made inadvertently, or perhaps without correct information upon the subject. It is this: The Bank had nothing to do with the Morris Canal and Banking Company, and did not desire thus to have an increase of bank stock. The President of the State Bank was appointed by a law of the General Assembly to act in connection with the Fund Commissioners, and not by any action of the State Bank. I was in the State of New York when they were negotiating that loan, and opposed both it and the surrender of the bonds. Three of the Commissioners were present, and, so far as I could perceive, appeared to favor the negotiation, and they at least had as much to do with it as the President of the Bank, who was acting with them in pursuance of a law conferring that trust upon him. The Legislature seemed to determine to increase the State stock in the Bank without consultation with the branches. How the Banks could be accountable for money they never received, I cannot imagine.

Mr. NILES [continuing]. I am gratified to hear the explanation. It was an act of justice due to a man for whom I have always entertained the highest respect. The principle, however, is the same, no matter what man or men were engaged in the negotiation. The money was lost in connection with the scheme of State banking, and on account of that scheme.

But in justice to the present bank, I must admit, that it does possess one principle of safety—in the common supervision and mutual liability of the branches. It is made the interest of all to guard against the failure of any one branch. At the same time, the institution is more obnoxious to the charge of monopoly for this feature. The branches, distributed throughout the State, holding the key to all bank accommodations, and acting through one head, have great power for evil, no less than for good.

Now, sir, in opposition to this system, I desire to see one established which shall combine the principles of free competition and of security to the bill-holder. Unless these two principles can be combined, all legalized banking must, at no distant day, go out of date. Bills issued to circulate as money should be always, and under all circumstances, redeemable in gold and silver. Such is the design under the old system of special charters. But while that system is wholly incompatible with free competition, it has not possessed the merit of security. Unless banks are made amply secure, the amount of bank capital must be limited by special legislation. In all the common affairs of trade and commerce, men are permitted to pursue their own interests in their own way. The business of issuing paper to circulate as money is of a widely different character, and must be governed by stringent rules. But mere arbitrary rules which may be suited to the condition of a people at one time, may operate badly at another. Under special and exclusive charters you may have too much or not enough bank capital. Permit men to establish banks on the old plan, at their pleasure, and the country will be flooded with paper money, and in time the whole system must fail. But make the system secure, so that every bill issued must certainly be paid to the bill-holder, without any contingency even remotely probable, and even with free competition, the business will not generally be extended beyond the wants of the country. The exigencies of commerce will regulate the demand for money, and the demand will regulate the supply. The free competition of capital and enterprise under equal laws, is a kind of self-regulating principle. It may be made to operate somewhat like a self-regulating power in machinery. When the steam engine learned to open and close its own valves, and to control its own action, a great advance was made towards its present improved condition.

Now, sir, as an indispensable pre-requisite to free competition, the system must be made secure. And how shall this object be attained? Not by merely requiring the bank to keep on hand, in specie, one-third or more of the amount of its issues. The specie in the vaults of the bank is not under the control of the State, or of the bill-holders. It comes and goes at the bidding of the bankers. Not merely by making the persons engaged in banking individually liable for the debts of the bank, for their solvency or insolvency is only accidental, and such a security may fail, when most needed. Not even by trusting to the obligations of oaths and official bonds. They are proverbially worthless, as checks upon the spirit of cupidity and speculation. Checks and safeguards of this description may be very well so far as they are worth any thing. But they are not sufficient to insure stability and uniformity and entire safety in the business of banking.

We propose, in addition to all reasonable checks and safeguards of this description, to require the bankers to deposit with the Treasurer of State collateral securities amply sufficient for the prompt redemption of all the bills issued, and that all bills shall be countersigned and registered by some public officer.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman from Laporte pardon me for interrupting him; but I would much like to know what kind of securities he would offer.

Mr. NILES. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I will say, that doubtless the stocks of the United States, and of this State, and of other solvent interest paying States, would be the most suitable description of security at the present time. They have an ascertained market value, and are always convertible into specie at that value. They will be subject to very little depreciation. Repudiation will soon be an obsolete idea. There seem to be two sufficient reasons why mortgages upon real estate should never be received as such security—one that real estate in the west, has no fixed market value, and of course is not readily convertible; the other that a government should never hold out inducements to a people to incur their farms with mortgages. At the same time, I would not limit the securities to public stocks, but would trust the details to legislation. The principle that the billholder should be protected beyond contingency, will remain sound through centuries, but the condition of the country may greatly change. Government and State stocks can be procured abundantly in the market at present, but within a quarter of a century, it is to be hoped, that the debts of the General Government and of the States will be largely reduced. These stocks will be used in connection with banking in our large commercial cities, and in most of the older States. Why, then, should we impose a restriction which in ten or twenty years may amount to the prohibition of all banking? Were all the public stocks in the world exhausted, the importance of collateral securities in banking would be no less apparent. And when the exigency arises, it will be for the wisdom of the Legislature to specify the description of securities to be used.

The stocks or collateral securities of whatever description, it will be understood, are not intended as a basis for bank issues, like specie in the vaults of the bank, but merely as a superadded protection to the billholder, and as a means of regulating and restraining the business within proper limits.

The system which we propose is not an untried experiment. It has been tested in New York, and we are assured by official reports of the highest authority, that it works well. The free banking law of that State was not sufficiently guarded at first. It went into operation at an unfavorable time, and in connection with severe pecuniary revulsions, which affected the commerce and credit of the whole country, some of the banks failed and some losses were incurred by billholders. But for a series of years past, and under the system as matured by experience, a loss to the billholder seems to have become nearly impossible.

It would be a needless tax upon the patience of Convention to speak of the details of this system. They will of course be left to the wisdom of the Legislature. We establish the two principles of security and of free competition, and in doing that we discharge our whole duty.

I desire to see the plan of free banking exclusively adopted, and should fear that were the two systems combined a State Bank with the extraordinary privileges secured by the present charter, might prove a too formidable rival to the independent banks. But should free banking be authorized by the Legislature at its first session under the new Constitution, the system could be tested before the year fifty-seven, when the charter of the present bank will expire, and under such circumstances I should have little fear of the creation of another great monopoly.

But it may be asked if I am an enemy to the present State Bank. I answer, no. With my present views, I would not renew its charter. But I would do no injury to the stockholders, and should regret to see its capital withdrawn from its present channels. At an early day in this State, the necessary bank capital could not be supplied by individuals. There was then a reason for the State to engage in banking which no longer exists. A government should attempt nothing which can be accomplished with equal benefit to the public, by individuals. At this day, I can see no more necessity for the State to be engaged in banking than in purchasing produce, or in any other commercial or industrial pursuit. I should regard it as the true policy for the State to sell out her share of the bank stock and apply the proceeds towards the payment of her indebtedness. The amount would then be placed beyond contingencies. The stock of the various branches of the bank would then be owned by individuals. They would have their banking houses and other facilities for continuing the business, and could re-organize under the general law. Most of the branches would take that course, as the old banks of New York have done, on the expiration of their special charter. In this manner the State would become separated from a business which is not necessarily connected with the purposes of government, and the one system of banking would blend imperceptibly into the other without loss to the stockholders or injury to the public interests.

FRIDAY, JAN. 17, 1850.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LONG.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

There being no reports made by committees, The Convention proceeded to the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The first thing in order being the section in relation to reprieves and pardons,

That section was taken up on its third reading.

Mr. PRATHER moved that the section be re-committed, with instructions to strike out the entire section, and insert a provision to the effect that the whole subject be left to the Legislature.

It seems to me, said Mr. Prather, that this is all that is necessary. I am willing to leave the matter to the Legislature.

Mr. READ of Monroe. I would like to be informed whether, under the proposition of the gentleman from Jennings, the Governor would not be permitted to pardon before conviction?

The Secretary read the instructions.

The question being taken on the motion of the gentleman from Jennings to re-commit with instructions, it was decided in the negative.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

On motion by Mr. Pepper of Crawford,

The rule which requires the yeas and nays on the final passage of a section, was dispensed with, and

The section was passed and referred to the committee on revision.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is the twenty-sixth article, reported from the select committee on the subject of home-stead exemption, on its second reading. Shall the sections be considered separately or collectively?

The Convention determined that the vote be taken upon the sections collectively.

Mr. STEVENSON moved that the article be laid upon the table.

Mr. McCLELLAND demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 79, nays 38—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Berry, Blythe, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Logan, March, Mathis, McLean, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Schoonover, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Taylor, Thornton, Todd, Trimble, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Youm, Zenor, and Mr. President—79.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Chapman, Colfax, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Gregg, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Howe, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Niles, Pettit, Shoup, Smiley, Thomas, Wallace, Wheeler, and Wiley—38.

So the article was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order is article 27, on its second reading.

The first section was read. It provides that all prosecutions shall be carried on in the name of the State, &c.

Mr. HAWKINS moved to amend by inserting the word "criminal," so that it would read, all criminal prosecutions shall be carried on in the name of the State.

The amendment was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that no county shall subscribe for stock in any incorporated company, unless paid for at the time, nor shall any county loan her credit to, or borrow money for the purpose of taking stock in any incorporated company, was read a second time.

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the same by adding, at the end of the section, the following: "Nor shall the General Assembly, on behalf of the State, assume the debts of any county, city, town, or township, within the State, or of any corporation whatever."

Mr. DAVIS of Parke moved to amend the amendment, by adding the words "without a vote of the people."

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved to lay the section and the pending amendments on the table.

A division of the question was asked for.

The question being first on laying on the table the amendment of the gentleman from Parke, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Wells on the table,

Mr. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 25, nays 94—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Beard, Blythe, Bowers, Clark of Hamilton, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Farrow, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Harbolt, Helm, Kent, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Mooney, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Schoonover, Sherrod, and Wallace—25.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Butler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tagne, Tannehill, Taylor, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—94.

So the amendment was not laid on the table.

The question then being on laying the section on the table,

MR. PEPPER of Crawford. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

THE PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot withdraw it.

The question being taken,

The section was not laid on the table.

The question then being on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Wells,

MR. PRATHER moved to amend the amendment by adding the words "Nor the debts of individuals."

MR. BORDEN. I do not know what the object of the gentleman from Jennings is, but it appears to me the gentleman need not be apprehensive that the Legislature will assume the debts of individuals. I think there is no great danger of that. Sir, I do not want a useful and necessary proposition like this to be laughed out of the House. The consequence of the omission to pass such a provision, will be that every county will be in debt, and combinations will come up here and over-ride the Governor's veto, and although you have declared that the State shall not go into debt, your purpose will be defeated by the action of the counties. They will compete with each other in the race of indebtedness, or in running into debt, and in a few years there will be a debt of fifteen or twenty millions to be assumed by the State. There is no provision of more importance to the community than this. I hope it will be adopted.

MR. PRATHER. It is true that some counties are now indebted, and are likely to be more so, but there is no more probability that counties will ride the State down with debts, or that they will force the State to assume their debts than that individuals will do so. There is just as much probability that the State will assume the debts of individuals as that she will assume the debts of counties. We have already declared that the State shall not loan her credit, and we are now declaring that the State shall not assume the debts of counties. There is just as much propriety in the one proposition as there is in the other, and no propriety whatever in either.

MR. PETTIT. I ask the indulgence of the Convention for one moment on the subject of county indebtedness. I may commence by saying that I am opposed to all public indebtedness. Experience has shown us in this State that it has been a vast and ever-during curse to us. I am as much opposed to political bodies, less than States, getting into debt, as I am to States getting into debt. I am opposed to the indebtedness of States, towns, or counties. I will not delay the Convention by undertaking to show the vast injustice of counties going in debt for public purposes. I have only risen to state what I regard as the law in relation to this matter—and what I warn the Convention, when the question shall be tested, will be found to be adjudicated as law—and it is, sir, that where a county, a corporation less than a State, a political corporation less than the sovereignty of a State, shall get into debt, the individual property of every citizen of the corporation, or of the county, is liable for the debt, and may be sold on execution for such debt. Let me repeat, that there may be no misunderstanding of what I now declare to be the law, and it will be found to be so, that if a county by a vote of its people, or by the action of a board of Commissioners of the county, shall become involved in debt, whether it be a thousand, or an hundred thousand dollars, a suit at law lies against the county for that indebtedness, and when judgment shall be obtained, and execution issued, it may be levied by the sheriff upon the individual farm of A., B., or C., upon any one of the citizens composing the body politic of the county. It does not require that it should be levied on the public property—the county property as such—the court house, or the alms house, but the property of every individual member of the county is liable to execution. I say, sir, that upon examination this will be found to be the law. And this being known, I doubt not the counties will hesitate about going in debt, and I trust they may.

But, sir, the great difficulty that arises in regard to this matter—the great desire I have for the passage of the section, is to avert the ultimate calamity of being burthened with these debts from the whole people. Various counties and towns are running into debt largely, they will find themselves overborne, crushed to the earth, unable to pay the interest on their debts, and they will create such combinations and influence as to induce the Legislature to shift the whole burthens incurred by their imprudent acts upon the more prudent—they will shift the liability from the county, and compel the State to assume the debts of the improvident few. That is the great objection that I have to leaving this matter open; this is the reason for the desire that I feel that it shall be closed by the passage of such a section as this.

There is another then. It is but naked justice if counties, when warned and forewarned, shall continue to go into debt, it is but proper that we guard ourselves against having to shoulder the whole of the burthen—against casting upon the more prudent the burthens incurred by the improvident.

And, I ask members of this Convention who represent counties which have not gone into debt to stand by this proposition, and secure their people against being saddled with the debts of the more improvident counties, that are incurring debts for the making of railroads, plank roads, turnpike roads, and other works for the purpose of accumulating and concentrating within their borders all the wealth of the State.

I live in a county that is, perhaps, as much infected with this wild mania for expending money as any other, and I warn the people of the State, especially of the western counties, not to let such counties as Tippecanoe, and Marion, and Jefferson; and such towns as Indianapolis, and Madison, and Terre Haute, and Evansville, pursue the mad career of incurring debts beyond their ability to pay; for if they do not they may have to pay those debts; they may, and probably will, have to pay for the improvident acts of those ambitious points, one of which I represent myself. I will not detain the Convention any longer.

The question was taken on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jennings, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then being on the amendment of the gentleman from Wells,

Mr. KELSO. I will ask to have the article and the amendments now pending, re-committed with instructions so to amend the article as to include the pending amendment, and to allow counties to create debts by a vote of the county and not otherwise. [Cries of "no, no."] That part of the proposition may be unpopular with a majority of the Convention, but I, for my part, say I feel safe in the assertion that we have, from the time that we have commenced our labors here, taken more pains to tie the hands of the people, than they will thank us for when we go home. I say the people at home, are as intelligent as we are; they understand their business as well as we understand it; and the reason why I propose to send this section back to the committee is, that they can arrange the matter for us as well as we can do it; and in a shorter time. Now I maintain that the people of a county, after they have a proposition submitted to them and have consulted upon it, and by a majority of the voters of the county determined upon it, should not be prevented by us from carrying out their wishes. They are the competent judges, and it is not for us to dictate to them what they shall do. We may prescribe to the Legislature their duties—we may declare what they shall do and what they shall not do in relation to creating debts, but when it comes to restricting the people themselves, we are going a little beyond our mark. We had better leave them to determine for themselves. For this reason, I have asked that the section be referred back to the committee.

Mr. SPANN. I wish to illustrate this matter by a single instance. The county of Jennings, by a vote of the county, or at least of so many as voted at the time, concluded to take stock to a considerable amount in a railroad. The county casts about two thousand votes, but the election took place at an unusual time, and there were but six or seven hundred votes cast. A majority of those, however, voted to take stock. The vote in favor of taking stock, was cast mainly by those living upon the line of the proposed railroad, and who expected to be directly benefited by it, while the voters of those parts of the county through which the road did not pass, were either quiescent or else voted against it. I was opposed to the proceeding at the time, and I still stand upon the same basis. I believe it is an unjust principle. I believe the practical working of it is bad. I shall go for the proposition of the gentleman from Wells, because I believe it to be a wholesome provision. I believe the people of the county never intended that the State should pay the debt—I have no doubt they intend to stand up to it—and as a representative of that county I for one, at least, will never ask the State to pay it, but I am altogether averse to any such course of proceeding.

Mr. SHOUP demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the re-commitment of the section with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Switzerland, it was decided in the negative.

The question then being on the amendment of the gentleman from Wells,

The amendment was rejected.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that the judicial power of this State shall be vested in one Supreme Court, in Circuit Courts, and in such other inferior courts as the General Assembly may establish, was taken up on its second reading.

The section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The section which provides that the Supreme Court shall consist of five judges, three of whom shall form a quorum, who shall hold their offices six years, if they shall so long behave well; that the State shall be divided into five Supreme Court Districts, of contiguous territory, as nearly equal in population as may be; but no county shall be divided in the formation of said district, and a judge shall reside in and be elected by the electors of each district, was taken up on its second reading.

Mr. PETTIT moved to amend, so that one judge shall reside in each district, but the whole five shall be elected by a joint vote of the people of the whole State—all the judges to be elected at the same time.

Mr. PETTIT. The amendment which I offer as a substitute, was reported by a minority of the committee, and the only difference between it and the section reported by the majority of the committee is this, and I beg the attention of the Convention to it for a moment: The section as reported by a majority of the committee, requires that there shall be five judges who shall hold their offices for six years, if they shall so long behave well; and, of course, you know, Supreme Judges will not fail to behave well for six years. The section reported by the majority also provides that the State shall be divided into five Supreme Court Districts, and that a judge shall be elected in each by the legal voters thereof, and shall be a resident of the district in which he is so elected. The substitute which I propose, has all these provisions, with the exception of having the vote for each judge extend all over the State. It provides that the State shall be divided into five Supreme Court Districts, and that a judge shall reside in each; but it allows him to be elected by the vote of the whole State. Now, one word in regard to this: If these Supreme judges had only jurisdiction within their respective Supreme Court Districts, then it would be proper, in my judgment, to confine their action to the district in which they reside; but inasmuch as their jurisdiction is as broad as the whole State, their constituency, I hold, should be as broad as the authority or jurisdiction over which they are to take cognizance. They should be elected by the whole people as they are answerable to and serve the whole people. Hence, I have moved this amendment requiring that they shall be elected by a vote of the whole State, although they shall live each in his own district. One word as to the propriety of the judges living in their respective districts. I have heard a few men, who have not reflected upon the subject, say you might as well have all the judges elected from one place. You might take them all from Madison, or Indianapolis, or from Laporte. I say not. The administration of the law is subject to modification and change, and it is important that the different parts of the State should have each its representative on the supreme bench, so that the practice as well as the spirit of the law of the whole State shall be made up from the different portions of the State. For say what you will about the certainty of the law, the glorious certainty or uncertainty, there is a very considerable difference in its spirit and practice—in the civil and criminal jurisprudence of the State, as administered in the different portions of the State. And if you bring up judges from the south-east and south-west, and from the north and from the centre, they will mingle together the spirit and feelings of the bar all over the State. Hence, I think, they ought to live in different districts. Then as to their being elected by the whole people, I say that when we make their jurisdiction as broad as the whole State, there is the very best of reasons why they should be elected by the voice of the people of the whole State. No man ought to administer laws to a people to whom he is not responsible. A Supreme Judge or an inferior judge should be responsible to those over whom he holds authority. But, sir, there is another advantage, let me say to the Convention, in this course. If you say that five districts shall be formed and a judge elected in each district, you have this difficulty on your hands forever. You are constantly gerrymandering the State, or jerrymandering, as I maintain the word should be pronounced, the g being soft. Well, sir, I say this would be the difficulty. Unless you run the vote all over the State, the Legislature will be constantly endeavoring to make districts to suit political purposes, to divide up the district by crooked lines, in order to get a whig judge here or a democratic judge there. That would be the result. But, if you provide that they shall be elected by the whole people, this difficulty will be obviated, and they will be responsible to the whole people and administer the law accordingly. I am, therefore, in favor of inserting a provision such as I have moved, differing from the section reported by a majority of the committee only in one particular, that is, that the vote shall run throughout the whole State, though the judge shall live in a particular district.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, by striking out "six" and inserting "four."

The PRESIDENT. There is no such word in the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move, then, to amend the original section. I believe the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe is right. I believe it is wise and proper. I have no objection to his amendment, except as to the time for which the judges are to be elected.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that the only part of the section that is proposed to be changed by the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, is the last line, so that, in place of the judges being elected by districts, they shall be elected by the votes of the whole State.

Mr. PETTIT. After my amendment is adopted, the gentleman can move his.

Mr. NAVE. Would it be in order to move to strike out!

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman can make such a motion, but the question must be put in the order in which the motions are made.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe,

Mr. NEWMAN. Before the question is taken, I desire to say a word or two in relation to the views taken by a majority of the committee who reported the article as it now stands. The opinion of the majority of the committee was, that, inasmuch as there would probably be an increase in the number of judges—and that increase was provided for in the article as reported, it would afford an opportunity to the electors, in separate districts throughout the State, to have some knowledge of the qualifications of the candidate for judge, who might be selected for a particular district, and in that view it was supposed better that they should be elected in separate districts. It cannot be presumed but that the voters of a particular district will exercise as much discrimination in making a choice as the people of the whole State would do in the selection of a supreme judge. And their opportunities of knowing the qualifications of the candidate, would be greater, and the tone that would be given to the administration of the laws by this mode of election, would be more advantageous than if the judges were to be elected by the people of the whole State. The individual elected by the district, would be known by a considerable portion of the people within the district, and if not known personally to all the voters, his reputation would extend over the district, while it might not extend over the entire State. This would unquestionably be an advantage, and while he would thus be known to the electors, he would be as well qualified, certainly, to represent the practice and the local feelings of the district and of the people, in his particular district. If you take away this inducement, if you take away the powers of the electors in the district to select a judge to represent them in this manner, there can be but very little advantage from the fact of his mere acquaintance with the local practice of the district. If you expect five judges to be elected by the whole people of the State, as a matter of convenience, perhaps it might be just as well for them all to reside at one place; at the capital, if you please. If you have got abler men in the country, there is no very practical reason why they should be confined to the district. But the object should be to give the people who are to select their officers, an opportunity to have a knowledge of, and an acquaintance with the persons thus to be selected by them. And it does seem to me that the report of the majority of the committee is preferable to the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe. There seemed to be no disparity of views in this respect, on the part of a large portion of the committee. I do not recollect the number, but I have the impression, although it has been some time since the subject was considered, that there was a very considerable majority of the committee in favor of the article that was reported.

Mr. PETTIT. The committee was not full.

Mr. NEWMAN. Perhaps it was not; but no doubt it was a pretty decided expression of the opinion of the committee. If I am rightly informed, there were but three members of the committee who united in making the minority report, which is now proposed as an amendment. The majority of the committee, at all events, acquiesced in the majority report.

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe by striking out the words "all at the same time," so that the Judges should not all be elected at the same time.

Mr. KELSO. There is certainly no necessity for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wells (Mr. Bascom). If there be any propriety in it, it should be provided for in a future section. And I cannot concur with my friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) in the amendment he has proposed. At the first election we should elect all five of the judges, and there should then be a classification by draft or otherwise, so that thereafter the term of office of all the judges should not be the same—so that the election of all should not take place at the same time.

Now, sir, I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and in favor of electing the judges by districts. There is, to say the least, a very respectable portion of the people of Indiana, who are opposed to the election of the judges by the people at all; and that opposition proceeds from the fear that it may be made a matter of political consideration, and the candidates favorable to this branch of reform denied that anything of the sort was in contemplation.

If you make this election a political question the Supreme and Circuit Judges, those who are to decide upon questions of life and liberty, reputation and property, will be composed of better politicians than lawyers, your judicial benches will be filled with a set of babbling politicians who are not fit for judges, and never will be, yet I believe a majority of the people are in favor of the election of judges by the people. Now if we ourselves commence by throwing out the strongest possible hints that we want to put it in the power of any political party to fill the judicial bench, I ask if the people may not take their cue from that hint, and act upon it in the selection of judges. I ask you also, is there any propriety in making the election of the judges of the State depend upon party politics? I say there is not. I say the judge who is competent to discharge the duties of his office will know enough not to meddle with the politics of the country at all. It is not the business of a judge. I am in favor of each district electing its Supreme Judge for several reasons; some of which have been sufficiently urged by the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman.) But in case the judge of the district should die, resign, or remove from the State, I ask if it should become necessary that the whole people of the State of Indiana should be called on to fill the vacancy, when the people of a district can do it as well or better.

A VOICE. A good deal better.

Mr. KELSO. Now we want to take on ourselves the districting the State for political purposes.

A VOICE. Not at all.

Mr. KELSO. Well, I guess I shall vote for districting the State for judicial purposes. We are for striking out the existing judiciary, and forming a judiciary upon a different plan. Then we should take the responsibility, and not throw it on others. If anything is to be done in that line, let it fall upon our shoulders. Let us form the districts in such a way that even-handed justice shall be done to all parties. Let there be no division of counties—let there be no gerrymandering; nor do I think we shall ever be troubled in that way. I am myself fully satisfied with the section as reported by the committee; and I do not think the amendment would make it any better. I fear it would make it worse. It would certainly make it more unpopular. The people of this State if they elect their judges, choose to elect them by districts, and so you will find when you come to submit your new Constitution to the people for their confirmation.

Mr. WOLFE. I cannot support the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, nor am I in favor of the original section, because I do not wish to increase the number of judges. My constituents do not wish that the number shall be increased. I have conversed with the Judges of the Supreme Court here at Indianapolis, and they say that if we give them a Reporter, they do not wish that there shall be an additional number of judges. For this reason I shall go against both the original section and the amendment. I cannot vote for either.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to say a single word in relation to this matter. I thought at first that I should go in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, but I think the judges should not all be elected at one time; not only at the first election, but at all future elections. I would prefer that they should come in alternately. If the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, however, be not adopted, I shall not insist upon the amendment that I have proposed. I think the judges should be elected alternately, so that the whole bench may not be renewed at the same time.

Mr. PETTIT. A few words in answer to the gentleman from Sullivan. I perceive that he is opposed to an increase in the number of the judges. Well, sir, if I did not deem that it was absolutely necessary, I should advocate the increase.

Perhaps the gentleman has not examined the report that came to us from the Supreme Court showing the amount of business that has accumulated in that Court since we commenced our session. The cases have increased in number from eighty-five to an hundred and twenty. Some of them have been lying over for four years, although in those cases, the Court has nothing more to do with parties or with counsel. The judges have only to go to their room and consult and decide upon the case, yet they have not time to do even this. Now what is our situation? Thirty-four years ago, when a convention for the organization of the State Government was held—when we had but about fifty thousand people in the State—that Convention provided for three Supreme Judges. These went upon the bench then, and they have been there ever since; and according to my judgment, the extension of the organization of the Supreme Court was a greater inducement for calling this Convention than any other thing. What is the fact? You have cases lying over from five to seven years before that Court for decision. A man in the meridian of life brings a case into Court and it lies there until he goes down hoary headed to the grave, leaving their children to inherit a lawsuit.

Mr. READ of Clark. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him—and it will perhaps save the making of a speech—whether if a reporter for the Supreme Court, be elected, it would not expedite the business?

Mr. PETTIT. I think it would. The committee directed me to report in favor of appointing a reporter to save the judges from the necessity of preparing reports of cases. The section which contains this provision we have not yet reached, and let me say to you that I am convinced that no three men in Indiana, of the most rugged, the most iron constitution men, who are able to work sixteen hours out of the twenty-four, and confine themselves to their room until labor and toil and weariness shall wear them out, in my judgment, would be able to decide all the cases that, under the present organization of the court, would be thrown upon them. I mean to decide them properly, after investigation, intelligently, and according to law, in any reasonable time. That it is utterly impossible, I am fully satisfied. What are you to do? While we have been in session, four or five hundred new cases have been sent up from the various courts in all parts of the State. And if this be the condition of the Supreme Court at the present time, what will it be before another age rolls round? We do not expect, within our lives, again to re-model our Constitution. We leave that work to our sons, and before that time shall come, we shall have two millions and a half of people, perhaps, in Indiana. And will three judges be able to transact the business of the court, until that time? We should act like prudent men, and though we may place a little more force upon the Supreme Bench than may be necessary at present, yet it will be necessary before our era is out. I am satisfied that five judges are necessary. I say that any people do themselves a flagrant wrong who say they will not have officers enough to discharge the duties required by the public. Why, how much better is it that the State should pay five judges, in order to have a proper administration of the laws—that a sire may not bequeath a litigious case to his son. It is better that a man should pay a little more for judges' salaries than that such an inheritance should be bequeathed to his children. Sir, the people are egregiously mistaken when they say they will not have officers enough to transact their business, that they will submit to procrastination and delay rather than pay a sufficient sum to enable the public business to be properly transacted. I am clearly of opinion that the section ought to pass as I have proposed to amend it. I do not believe we can in justice to ourselves, or in justice to the trade and commerce of the country, constitute a Supreme Court with less than five judges.

Well, sir, in reference to electing the judges by the vote of the whole State. It is conceded that we are to elect all our judges. You say that the circuit judge shall be elected in his circuit by the electors of his circuit—and why? Because his jurisdiction is as broad as the circuit. By a parity of reasoning you might as well say that a circuit judge shall be elected by one county in his circuit, as to say that a Supreme Judge, whose authority extends all over the State, shall be elected by one portion of the State. He is a conservator of peace for the whole State. He is to administer laws for the whole State, therefore, he should be elected by the whole State. His jurisdiction is co-extensive with the State, and so, in my judgment, should be his accountability.

Mr. NILES. I suppose, sir, that the principal reason that will operate with the Convention, in favor of three judges of the Supreme Court, rather than five, will be the difference in expense. Now, there is such a thing as making a small saving at the cost of large sacrifices, and it would be well for us to inquire whether this would not be of that charter. It may be the misfortune of every man, at some time in his life, to be involved in a law suit. It is an evil which no man can say that he will certainly be able always to avoid. Then all men are directly interested in having a judicial system under which justice can be speedily administered. And in nine cases out of ten, all parties are benefited by having law suits decided promptly, even if decided wrong. It is a maxim old as the Roman law, that it is important to the public that there be an end of litigation. One great cause of complaint against the court of chancery in England, has always been the interminable delay attending its decisions. The Chancellors have been always able men, but the tribunal of ultimate appeal has been composed of a single judge. Hence, the impossibility of dispatch and the accumulation of causes which have descended as legacies from father to son. Now, sir, if we weigh the expense of supporting a court against the accruing costs of protracted law suits, it is but a farthing in the scale, and we lose sight of it altogether. The only question should be, how can the business be done well and done most promptly? From official reports before this Convention, and from other reliable sources of information, we know that the Supreme Court is now, and has been for years past, largely in arrears in its decisions. A judgeship upon that bench, is probably the most laborious occupation in the State. My only inquiry in determining the number, would be, can five judges do more business and do it well, than three? There is no doubt that they can. It is true that cases must be determined by a majority of all the judges, but a large portion of their time, gentlemen are aware, must be occupied in examining cases, in the first instance—in weighing briefs and arguments, and collating authorities. This must always be done chiefly by one man, who will afterwards submit the case to his associates. After the case has been decided by all the judges, one man alone writes out the opinion. That is a work requiring great labor and care, as the opinions of the judges become in effect, a part of the law of the land. It is evident that this labor divided among five men, could be performed more promptly than it can be by three. And I have no hesitation in saying that I would rather err on the side of having too many judges, than too few.

One word as to the election of judges in single districts. It is argued that the State should be divided into judicial districts, and that a judge should be elected from and reside in each. It is argued very justly, that under such an arrangement, we will be more likely to avoid the influence of cliques and of local prejudices. The judges will come together from the bar of the different portions of the State, representing the different modes of practice upon the circuits and the legal opinions and talent of the whole State. Now, as one means of securing these very objects, I would have them elected by the voters of the several districts. If elected by the State at large, they will be nominated by party caucusses convened at the capital. The caucus may be under the influence of some prevailing error, prejudice, or passion, and will select candidates who may be its tools. Let them be elected in the districts, and though a perverted sentiment may prevail in one portion of the State, which might exert a controlling influence in a party caucus, some of your judges may be free from its contamination.

Again, sir, if the judges are elected by the State at large, or rather by a party caucus sitting in conclave, in the city, they will always be entirely of one or the other political party. If elected by single districts, they will be divided between the parties, and who can say that that would not be better for the interests and safety of all? Such a court would better command the public confidence and more truly represent the local courts and the bar. I will not allow myself to believe that gentlemen wish to make the Supreme Judicial Tribunal of the State, a mere party machine. The election of the judges in single districts, would be the only means of avoiding such a calamity. The gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) tells us that the districts will be arranged by the Legislature, with a view to party schemes. But what great harm, if a county should be added to or taken from a district for such a purpose? The effect would be little more than to expose the baseness of the men who would be guilty of it. But, this is a strange argument against single districts, to come from a gentleman who would turn the whole matter into the hands of a party caucus. I would rather risk the danger of a gerrymandering of the State, by the public and responsible representatives of the people, than to commit to irresponsible party leaders, the selection of judges to decide upon my rights.

I am in favor not in word only, but in sober earnest, of the election of judges by the people. Let the voters have an opportunity to know the candidates, and though they may sometimes err, they will generally select the men who are best entitled to their confidence, and best qualified for the office. Your calm, judicious, legal minds are not politicians. Their reputation is circumscribed to the region where they reside. It is your noisy politician whose name is familiar to every man in the State, and he is generally the last man who ought to fill a high judicial station. Put up in a single district, as opposing candidates, a noisy politician and a sound lawyer, and, under all ordinary circumstances, the lawyer will be elected. When voters are called upon to elect a man to decide questions affecting their own rights, if they have an opportunity to know the candidates, they will generally select the best man, without much reference to his party associations or services. The truth of this proposition has been illustrated in New York: Four of the judges of their court of appeals, are elected in districts. In one strong democratic district, a whig has been twice elected by large majorities. And in the strongest whig district of the State, a man of opposite politics was chosen. When a lawyer residing at the south-westerly extremity of the State is nominated as a candidate, what can the voters living in the north, know of his qualifications? In order that the doctrine of popular elections be carried out, they should be brought home to the people, that they may vote upon their own knowledge and judgment, otherwise the election is a farce. A Governor may be safely voted for on the recommendation of a caucus and from a knowledge of his political course and opinions, but it is far otherwise with a judge. There could be an argument of some force urged in favor of selecting the judges indiscriminately from the State at large, in order that the highest order of talent might be secured, but I can conceive of no argument unless it be of a party character against their election by the districts in which they are required to reside. I desire to see the judiciary raised above party, and as the only means of securing that object, I desire to see this Convention adopt the principle of election by single districts.

Mr. PRATHER moved that the amendment and the amendment to the amendment be laid upon the table.

Mr. RITCHEY asked for a division of the question.

The question being first on laying the amendment to the amendment on the table, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe on the table,

Mr. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 75, noes 47—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hugin, Hovey, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, Mather, Mathis, May, Mooney, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Sims, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor and Mr. President—75.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berry, Borden, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Duzan, Edmonston, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Howe, Johnson, Kent, March, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Taylor, Trimble, Wallace, and Wiley—47.

Mr. NAVE moved to amend the section so that the number of judges shall not be less than three nor more than five, a majority of whom shall be a quorum, to be elected by districts, and to hold their offices six years, &c.

I offer this proposition, said Mr. N., to supercede several objections that have been urged against the section. It is said that we need five judges on the Supreme bench. This may be true. It is a matter which I will not at present controvert. It is certain that five judges will do more than three in the manner in which they transact business. I will not occupy the time of the Convention by explaining the manner in which the business of the court is transacted. I propose to leave it to the Legislature to determine the number of judges.

It is a matter which should be left to the people's representative, whether they will increase the number of Supreme Judges to five, or whether they will continue the present number.

Mr. PETTIT. My own judgment is, that the whole desirable object of the judicial system that is proposed for the State has been lost. I do not think that there is anything in either section that is worth retaining, when you deny the power or the right to elect the judges by the people all over the State, to make their constituency as broad as their authority. I look upon it as utterly worthless. I say it would disgrace the head of a mouse to establish such a proposition; to talk about people electing their officers, and then to say that the people shall have no power in the matter at all. I look upon the whole symmetry of the system as being lost; and I move to lay the whole article upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KELSO. I shall certainly be compelled to vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks. The gentleman from Tippecanoe, who, he believed, is as well informed on this subject as any member of the Convention, has stated very correctly that there is a large accumulation of business before the Supreme Court in an unfinished condition. This being the case, it does appear to me that the number of judges should be increased. There is no necessity for leaving two distinct points to be settled hereafter, when we ought ourselves to take the responsibility of deciding. The first is, how many judges there shall be; and the second is, how they shall be elected. If it be left for the Legislature to determine, it may remain unsettled for a long time.

Mr. NEWMAN said he was opposed to the proposition, not because he did not think there should be five judges. His impression was that five was the proper number; and if he were a member of the Legislature, he would vote for five. But he thought it was a matter that should be left to the Legislature.

While upon this subject, he would admonish gentlemen that they should at least allow some legislative discretion in relation to matters of this kind. Whenever there is a question, continued Mr. N., which may be confided to legislative discretion, we ought not to consume the time of this Convention in debating it; but should refer it at once to the direct representatives of the people, who are elected for the purpose of looking to their general interests.

Mr. READ of Clark said he thought it was better that the Convention should endeavor to do what was right in regard to the matter, and not, for the sake of saving a few dollars, omit to make such constitutional provision in reference to all such subjects as this as would be most beneficial to the interests of the country. He had a great objection to its being referred to the Legislature to determine and provide for the election of the number of judges that would hereafter be requisite to transact the business of the State; but he was quite satisfied that, at present, three were sufficient. He had been informed by the Judges of the Supreme Court that, if provision were made for the appointment of a Reporter to the Court, three judges were all that would be necessary to transact the business. The time might come when three would not be sufficient. Indiana was growing rapidly; she was going to be a gigantic State, and he trusted there would be no necessity for making another Constitution for a hundred years to come. ["Consent!"] They ought not, therefore, to tie up the Legislature, but leave them to increase the number of judges when it should become requisite to do so.

Mr. FOSTER said he did not profess to know much about this business, but he could at least give an opinion in relation to it. The gentleman last up had declared his expectation that the Constitution they were forming would last an hundred years, and intimated that Indiana was destined to become a gigantic State. He agreed with him entirely in what he had said, and he thought it somewhat extraordinary, in view of this fact, that gentlemen should wish to curtail the powers of the Legislature in regard to matters of this kind. He thought it would be a very proper compromise to leave it to the Legislature to fix the number, with the limitation that the number should not exceed five or be less than three. He regretted very much that the amendment of the gentlemen from Tippecanoe had not been adopted. It was similar to the case of the election of county commissioners, who were to be elected by the whole county, and not by the particular district in which they resided. He thought there was very manifest propriety in having the Judges of the Supreme Court elected by the people of the whole State. If they were to be elected by districts, it would be pursuing the same plan upon which the Circuit Judges are elected. His own opinion was, that the people of the whole State ought to elect the Supreme Judges, and the people of the districts the Circuit Judges. He hoped the Convention would at least make a compromise upon the subject, and leave it to the legislature to decide the number, the same to be not more than five nor less than three.

Mr. KELSO said he wanted to say a word in reply to his friend from Clark. He had had occasionally the honor of a seat in the Legislature, and there had always been some proposition before that body in regard to the Supreme Court. And the question was never started, but there were plenty of members who had been expressly informed by the Supreme Court, that nothing more was necessary than to make provision for a reporter. Now I do not know (continued Mr. Kelso) from what member of the Supreme Court this information comes, that if a reporter be provided for, everything will go on smoothly—everything will be done in proper time; but let me remark, that the Supreme Judges are not the only men who know something about the business of the Supreme Court. Now suppose it would take the entire labor of one man to do the reporting of the Supreme Court, would his labor facilitate the business of that Court so much as to enable them to bring up the business that is in arrear? I say it is out of the question. It cannot be done. I agree with the gentleman from Tippecanoe, that the people want a Court that can transact the business belonging to it, each year, without throwing it over from one year to another.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the Convention will indulge me, I will say a single word in regard to this matter. Practical experience is better than theory, and I have had some experience in regard to the business of the Supreme Court. I have a great regard for that Court. I have no doubt they have labored, in the discharge of their duties as assiduously as any body of men, not even excepting this Convention. But I have had a case before that Court, involving some ten thousand dollars, for two years or more. It is true, it covers a great deal of ground, and requires the consulting of a great many authorities, I have no doubt. I gained the case in the Court below, and it has been here for upwards of two years. I do not complain of the Court for this delay; but I say that the Court cannot perform the duties devolving upon it, within a reasonable time. It would be unfortunate for a man who had his whole fortune tied up in a law suit, to be so long delayed in obtaining a decision; and it is a poor government, in my opinion, that will not pay a sufficient number of officers to keep the wheels of the government in active operation. What is the use of courts of justice, if parties are to be delayed for years, before justice can be obtained? I am satisfied that if this Convention desire to do justice to their constituents in this matter they will increase the number of Judges.

Mr. STEVENSON demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks,

Mr. RITCHEY remarked that it was too near the usual hour of adjournment to take the vote upon so important a question as this. He would therefore move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was, on a division, yeas 51, noes 30, agreed to.

The Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 17, 1850

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT. The question pending when the Convention adjourned, was on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Hendricks (Mr. Nave).

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered on the amendment.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the amendment will be adopted. It appears to me to be important.

The question being taken, there were for the amendment, yeas 67, against it, nays 40—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Bowers, Brookbank, Butler, Chenoweth, Clark of Hamilton, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Huff, Jones, Kinley, Logan, March, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Shannon, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Watts, Wheeler, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bracken, Bryant, Chapman, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foley, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Holman, Hovey, Johnson, Kent, Kendall of White, Maguire, May, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Wallace, Wiley, Wolfe, and Work—40.

So the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section as amended be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. McCLELLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of engrossment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the question being taken, there were, ayes 67, noes not counted.

And the section was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT.

The following section was then read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by consent:

"The Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction in appeals from and writs of error to the Circuit and other courts, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, and such original jurisdiction as the Legislature may confer upon it."

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day, is the fourth section of the same article.

The section was read, as follows:

"The Supreme Court shall appoint its own clerk, who shall hold his office for six years, if he shall so long behave well; and whose duty shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. PETTIT. I move to strike out that section, and insert the following:

"There shall be a clerk of the Supreme Court elected by the electors of the whole State, who shall hold his office for six years, if he shall so long behave well; and whose duties shall be prescribed by law."

The only difference between the two sections is this—that the original section provides that the clerk shall be appointed by the Court, whereas I propose that such clerk shall be elected by the people of the whole State. Now, sir, we have taken a start in the right direction—and I hope we will carry it out as far as possible—that the people shall elect all officers. The office of clerk of the Supreme Court is a very important and lucrative one, and I hope that the clerk, like the judges, may be put before the people to be elected.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, by striking out the word "six" and inserting the word "four." I think four years is a period long-enough for any man to fill an office.

[Cries of "no, no, no," and "consent, consent."

Mr. NILES. I desire simply to say, that as a member of the committee on the organization of the courts, I was in favor of the proposition that the clerk of the Supreme Court should be elected by the people. I can see no reason in the world against it.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson said, that he supposed nothing he could say would prevent the adoption of the amendment. Nevertheless he desired to say that it appeared to him very unnecessary to trouble the people with the election of the Clerk of the Supreme Court. All the people desire is, that a competent man should be selected to fill that office. The Judges of the court know what qualifications are necessary to make a good Clerk, and they are personally interested in securing the services of such an officer. I can see no reason why we may not with as much propriety declare that the Speaker and Clerks of the House of Representatives, and the Secretaries of the Senate, shall be elected by the people, as that the Clerk of the Supreme Court shall be so elected. We are making so many officers elected by the voters of the whole State, that the ballots at some of our general elections will be near a yard long. If you require that the Clerk of the Supreme Court shall be elected by the people, the result will be that a party caucus in this city will select the officer. The people will take no interest in the matter, and will generally vote for the nominee of their respective parties.

Mr. KENT. That is the very reason why I would advocate the principle contended for by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. I say that the people are better qualified to elect all the officers for every purpose of government than any legislature, or any other select body which the people may send to Indianapolis,

Mr. BORDEN. Sir, there is another reason why I think this officer should be elected by the people. I think the judges should have no power of appointment whatever—nothing to do but to attend to their judicial duties.

Mr. LOCKHART. I wish to state, as a member of the committee from which this report emanated, that I was opposed to the report in favor of the proposition of the Chairman of that committee (Mr. Pettit).

Mr. BARBOUR. I was a member of that committee, and in favor of the report as it is. If this were an office in which the great mass of the people were interested, it might be well enough to vest the election in them. But the duty to be performed is simply a clerical duty, and I am satisfied that the people do not require that they should be called upon to make the election. This office is not one which requires any great amount of talent to perform the duties attached to it; and even if it did, I think the judges of the court are better qualified to determine who is adapted to perform those duties than the mass of the people can be. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BASCOM. I move the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be first on the amendment of the gentleman from Randolph, to strike out "six" and insert "four."

Mr. BORDEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and a division being called for on the question, there were yeas 53, nays 50.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken on the amendment as amended, and it was adopted.

The section, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPORTER OF DECISIONS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is the fifth section.

The Secretary read the section, as follows :

"There shall be a reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court appointed by the same, and removable at its will; but no judge shall be allowed to report the decisions of the Supreme Court."

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "appointed by the same and removable at its will," and inserting the words "elected by the electors of this State."

Mr. KILGORE (in his seat). Oh no! That is a little too democratic. A little democracy is well enough, but that is going too far. It is buncombe up to the very hubs. [A laugh.]

Mr. McCLELLAND. Buncombe or no buncombe, all I have to say on that point is that, in all probability, the gentleman may have occasion, in the course of a week or ten days, to explain to his constituents the reason of his vote against, and he will then probably discover whether they entertain the same opinions that he does. If the amendment I have offered should be adopted, the section will then read—

"There shall be a reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court elected by the electors of this State; but no judge shall be allowed to report the decisions of the Supreme Court."

It seems to me that the only question is, whether the people shall elect this officer, or whether the Supreme Court shall appoint him. Every individual in the State is interested in this matter, and I think that every voter in the State should have the right to vote upon the question. The question has been asked, what is the use of having officers of this kind elected by the people? That is a question which it is perhaps hard to answer in any other way than by the Yankee mode of answering a question, by asking another; and in reply to that inquiry, I might ask what is the use of electing any officer by the people at all? [Applause.]

Mr. COLFAX. The effect of this amendment, if adopted as now proposed, would be to elect the officer for life, there being no limitation as to his term. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the gentleman from St. Joseph will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. COLFAX. Certainly I will withdraw it, if the gentleman from Tippecanoe desires to speak.

Mr. PETTIT. Only a single word.

The motion to lay the amendment on the table was withdrawn.

Mr. PETTIT. I am in favor of electing all officers by the people, as far as practicable. But there are some offices to be filled, in which there would not only be no propriety in submitting the election to the people, but great impropriety in it. Let me say here, that as regards the reports of decisions, the judges of the Supreme Court are more interested than any body else. The reporter of these decisions may make the judges look supremely ridiculous by misreporting their decisions, or by leaving out their notes, and in many other ways; and I hold that that officer should be immediately responsible to the judges. It is certainly not an office in which the people take any kind of interest. The duties of it will be to collate and prepare, and draw off the decisions of the Supreme Court, as they are made, and in this the judges are undoubtedly more interested than all other people of the State besides. Let them, then, not only have the power to appoint the reporter, but also to remove him at their will, in case he should not truly and impartially report them, or take sides with this judge or with that, or make any one of them ridiculous.

Mr. SPANN. I do not rise for the purpose of making a speech upon this subject, for it is one the merits of which perhaps I do not much understand. The Convention is about to create an office which has to be filled. Now I am not sufficiently informed in regard to this matter to justify me in saying that this office is unnecessary, or at all events whether it is necessary that the Convention should create the office. I doubt much whether it is not a fit subject for legislation. I therefore move to lay the section on the table.

Mr. BORDEN. The difficulty of leaving the matter to the legislature is this—that it will detain the court itself, and prevent them from doing their business. That is the reason why we say that the reporter should not be a member of the court. It is to prevent delay in business by the court having to report its own decisions.

Mr. THORNTON. I seldom trouble the Convention with any remarks, but this is a subject to which I have paid a good deal of attention, and I must trespass for a short time upon the patience of the Convention while I say a word or two.

Mr. President, I am disposed to move to strike out this section altogether, for I do not think that there is any necessity for such an officer. If, however, I have to vote for creating such an office, I should most certainly be opposed to the Supreme Court having the power to appoint the incumbent. I believe that hitherto it has been a matter of complaint that the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court have not been exactly what they should be, and, sir, although I do not mean to implicate the judges of that court in any way, but I undertake to say that opinions and decisions have been reported which have never been pronounced. I repeat it, that I say this without derogation to the character of the judges. If, then, Mr. President, we are to have an officer of this kind, I want to have one who is independent of the court, and who will report faithfully whatever the decision may be.

But, sir, I say again that I do not want such an officer at all. We contemplate, I believe, creating the office of Attorney General, and should we create such an office I must say that I think the man who may be elected to fill it is the fittest person to report the decisions of the Supreme Court, and I should most certainly vote for his filling such office. He of course may be presumed to be an intelligent officer, and I think that he ought to be the reporter. He will be elected by the people, and in that case, if he be required to perform the duty of reporting the decisions, the object of my friend from Randolph will be accomplished in desiring that his election should be by the people. This, I believe, is the course pursued in several of the States of the Union. In Missouri and other States the Attorney General is the reporting officer of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Now I repeat again, that although I have great confidence in the worthy gentlemen who are the judges of the Supreme Court, yet I do say that the decisions exhibited on paper or in print are not always the decisions that have been pronounced, nor do I say whether they have been bettered or made worse. I cannot avoid referring here to one case in particular, which will be found in 3d Blackford—the case of Parker versus Smith—a very important case in relation to tax titles. Although that decision was given at great length, and the strongest reasons assigned in support of it, there is in the reports a mere legal note of it; and I have no doubt whatever that it was owing to the interest which some gentlemen felt in tax titles that that decision was cut down and reduced almost to a nullity.

If, then, we are to have a reporter at all, let us conter that office upon the Attorney General. There is no doubt in my mind that the office of Attorney General is necessary for the attainment of the ends of justice. We contemplate giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction, and we may have occasion to find fault with officers, and perhaps to try them for offences before that court.

I will call attention for a moment to a section which will be found in report No. 30 from the same committee. It is as follows:

“There shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State an Attorney General, whose powers and duties shall be prescribed by law, and who shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor be elected and qualified.”

I believe that we are likewise about to make provision for suits to be brought against the State. Now if we do this, it will be indispensable to have some one to make defenses for the State. It will be less expense to have an officer at all times ready to perform this duty, than on each occasion to have to make a special appointment. I have seen cases in which the executive has appointed officers to perform this duty, for which the most extravagant fees have been charged and paid. In one case two gentlemen received each five hundred dollars for simply saying that the suit should be dismissed. Now it would be much better in my opinion always to have a respectable officer always ready to defend a suit, than to pay these extravagant fees and depend upon whoever can be obtained for the occasion.

We shall undoubtedly have criminal cases brought before the Supreme Court, and who is the proper person to defend the State but the Attorney General? Sir, much has been said on the floor of this Convention about economy. I will go as far as any gentleman can go in endeavoring to economize the people's money; but it appears to me that thus far we have been guilty of a great omission in not having an Attorney General.

Some years ago the office was created by the Legislature, and a gentleman was appointed who served out his term, and after that the law was repealed.

I am opposed, then, to the Supreme Court appointing their own reporter, and still more opposed to having a man directly elected by the people to fulfil the duties of such an office. If we are to have such an officer, I want to have a man who will stand aloof from the Supreme Court.

Now, while I have the ear of the Convention, I will state that I go against a Supreme Court altogether. I view it as a thing which is entirely useless. We are about to engage in an extensive system of law reform; we are about to repudiate legal technicalities, and to make a new order of things; and I hold that a Supreme Court under such a state of things would be wholly without use or benefit. I want to see a good circuit system adopted, or a good county system; and out of that system let us organize a Supreme Court to try questions as a dernier resort. That is the system adopted by the Constitution of the United States.

When a man has been on the bench of the Supreme Court for a number of years he becomes, as it were, dried up. He learns nothing but dry law technicalities, and superfine distinctions and splitting of hairs. I want that the man who is to try cases on their final issue to be one who mingles among the people, who becomes acquainted with their habits and their wishes and their judgment. I do not say that he should be so much under their influence as to be awed into decisions, but merely that he should understand their will. If you examine the decisions of Supreme Courts, you will find that four-fifths of them are made upon mere technicalities, and not upon their merits at all. Although I have the misfortune to belong to the profession of the law, I have no hesitation in expressing my earnest hope that we may have a thorough reformation in practice, so that men may not be deprived of their rights through mere informalities, or by the application of mere dry technicalities.

Mr. WATTS. I would ask the gentleman from Floyd whether he was one of the counsel who received a fee of $500, for merely saying that a suit should be dismissed?

Mr. THORNTON. No, sir; I was not. I received a mere fifty dollar fee, and the record will show it. Sir, I want to see a man able to come into court and file his complaint without any guard that he shall do it according to a certain form. I am the last man in the world to play the demagogue; but I wish to see the principle adopted. I believe it to be a sound and correct one. A reform of this kind has been adopted in several of the States; and even in England itself, it is progressing. And if this reform be brought about, what use shall we then have for a Supreme Court? Sir, I hold that all cases should be decided simply upon their merits. I wish to see the time when a man shall not be thrown in his suit, because he has brought an action of assumpsit instead of an action of debt. Yes, sir, I hope to see the day when all these absurd and useless distinctions will be thrown to the winds. I say, then, let us have a good circuit system, and, when necessary, hold a court in banc, composed of judges of the circuits.

But, sir, I find I have wandered from the question immediately under consideration. I shall vote against the Supreme Court appointing their own reporter, and I shall do so for the reasons which I have already stated.

Mr. HOVEY. Will it be in order to move to strike out the seventeenth and part of the eighteenth line?

The PRESIDENT. Not while the present amendment is pending.

Mr. HOVEY. I suppose that all we desire is to prevent the Supreme Court from reporting its own decisions. That is the whole drift of the section; and, by striking out the 17th, and part of the 18th line, down to the word "no," the section will probably meet the wishes of the people. That will leave the appointment of the reporter to the law-making power. I think it is an office of not sufficient importance to be embraced in the organic law of the State.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I do not believe in making speeches, if they can be avoided, but the ground has been assumed that the decisions of the Supreme Court need not be reported at all. I think that that is a great mistake. I believe it to be as necessary that the people should be informed of the decisions of the Supreme Court, as that they should know what statutes have been passed by the Legislature. You might just as well say that the statutes should not be published, as to say that the decisions of the Supreme Court should not be reported. I regard the one as equally important with the other, because the decisions of the Supreme Court are in one sense, the law of the land, and become obligatory upon inferior courts, where like cases are involved.

Now, I understand my friend from Floyd, on the right (Mr. Thornton)—and here let me say that there is no man I more highly respect, either as a man or a lawyer, than I respect him—I understood him to say that it was a supremely ridiculous idea, to think of the people electing a reporter, to report the decisions of the Supreme Court. Sir, with the same propriety might we not say that it was supremely ridiculous to propose that the people should elect a judge of the Supreme Court, or a justice of the peace, or a constable? He desires that the Attorney General, should we create such an office, should be the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court. Now, with all due deference to the experience of the gentleman, as a lawyer, I think that the office of Attorney General and that of reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court, should be kept separate and distinct. If I am correctly informed, the reporting of these decisions is worth from $1500 to $2000 per annum. And is that such a trifling matter that the people shall not have anything to say about it? Sir, I think it is too important an office to be filled by any other mode than by a vote of the people. One gentleman argues that the reporter should not be under the control of the Court, and the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) takes the opposite ground, and insists that he should be so much under the control of that Court, and not only to receive his appointment from their hands, but to be subject to dismissal at their pleasure. Sir, I do not think that either the judges or the reporter of the Supreme Court, should have any person under their control; and very certainly the man who reports the decisions of the judges of the Supreme Court, ought not to be under the control of those who make those decisions.

In regard to the inquiry of what is the use of electing such an officer by the people, I have only to remark what I remarked before, and that is that on the same ground, we might ask the question, "what is the use of electing any officer by the people?" Now, sir, I am through; for it appears that speeches do not go down very well.

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford moved the previous question.

The previous question was sustained—ayes 47, nays 33—and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The PRESIDENT. The question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Randolph.

Mr. McCLELLAND demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Berry, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Foley, Garvin, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hugin, Holman, Johnson, Jones, Kent, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Murray, Prather, Read of Clark, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Thornton, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, Yocum, and Zenor—56.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bright, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Gootee, Gordon, Gregg, Harbolt, Hendricks, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, Mather, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Todd, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—66.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

SHERIFF OF THE SUPREME COURT.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day, is section 6, on its second reading.

The Section was read by the Secretary, as follows:

"The Supreme Court shall appoint its own Sheriff, who shall perform such duties as may be required by law."

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to amend the section in the following manner: Strike out the words, "the Supreme Court shall appoint," and insert in lieu thereof, the words, "the electors of this State shall elect."

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the section and pending amendment on the table.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

CIRCUITS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the order of the day, is section No. 7, on its second reading.

The section was read as follows:

"The State shall be divided into at least twenty circuits, and a circuit judge shall be elected by the electors in each circuit, and shall reside therein, and shall hold his office six years, if he shall so long behave well."

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I move to strike out the section, and insert the following:

"The State shall be divided into a suitable number of judicial circuits, and one circuit judge shall be elected by the electors in each, and shall reside therein. He shall hold his office four years, if he shall so long behave well, but he shall not hold office more than eight years in any term of twelve years." ["Consent."]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the original section as follows: Strike out the words "at least twenty," and insert the words "twenty four." [Cries of "No, no, no. "]

I would be glad to obtain the attention of the Convention a few moments for the purpose of explaining the motive which induces me to offer this amendment. The committee on the organization of the Courts of Justice, in their report, propose that there shall be a Supreme Court with five judges, and also Circuit Courts, dividing the State into at least twenty circuits. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ripley would leave the new Constitution in this respect the same as the old. I have moved to strike out twenty and insert twenty-four, and I wish to present a reason or two why I am in favor of this policy.

One great and perhaps the only radical defect in our system of Courts has not been remedied by the committee, of which the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. PETTIT) is chairman.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). Well, I could not get them to agree with me.

Mr. HOLMAN. One great and radical defect, and which I believe as much as any other cause led to the calling of this Convention, has been entirely overlooked by that committee. It will be observed that the committee have provided only for a Supreme Court and for Circuit Courts, and then for the organization of such Inferior Courts as the Legislature may from time to time create. If it is understood that after a period of thirty-four years has elapsed under the supremely objectionable system, for the transaction of probate business, this Convention is to adjourn without furnishing any remedy for this evil, then I believe, and that sincerely, that the Convention will have performed its labors in a great respect, in vain; for if there be one thing above all others that has been a crying evil in our judicial system, it is the defects in our modes of transacting probate business.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention for a moment to the system as it now exists, and to consider the number of Judges employed in the transaction of the business of the judiciary, and then to point out a simple plan for its improvement. When I mentioned the words "twenty-four," as indicating the number of circuits into which I would divide the State, I heard a whisper of objection all over the house. And why is it objected to? Sir, no man, I presume, will object to it except under the idea of its involving additional expense to the State by increasing the number of judges. Sir, I am as much opposed to increasing the number of judges as any man can be, and so far from seeking to increase that number, I am anxious to diminish it. By the plan which we are now living under, we have ninety probate judges. Besides these we have a hundred and eighty associate judges, thirteen circuit judges, and three judges of the Supreme Court, at an annual expense of about thirty-three thousand dollars. We have, in all, two hundred and eighty-six judges for the transaction of our business, many of whom are incapable of performing the duties required at their hands. And this is more especially the case so far as the probate judges are concerned.

So far as the Constitution of 1816 has defined the judicial system, it is unquestionably a good one. I believe that one appellate court, and a system of Circuit Courts is, of all systems, best calculated, not only to promote the ends of justice, but to secure uniformity of decisions throughout the State. Then, so far as the Circuit and Supreme Courts are concerned, there can be no material alteration of the old system. It is good enough. It has answered the purpose heretofore, and will answer in the future. But I now ask every member of this Convention what scheme they have in contemplation for remedying this other evil—the manner in which probate business is transacted!

Now, supposing the State is divided into twenty-four circuits, it will require about eight thousand voters to a circuit. Three such counties as Johnson, Shelby, and Marion, would be embraced in a circuit. Require, then, that the President Judge of the circuit shall hold two terms of circuit court in each county, and also that he should hold at least three terms of probate court in each county. What would be the effect of such an arrangement? In the first place, it would give character to the probate court. In the second place, it would avoid the expense of appeals to the Circuit Courts, from the decisions of the probate judge, which, in many parts of the State, involves a very serious expense. In the third place it would secure uniformity of decisions, and in the fourth place, it would secure competent judges for the transaction of probate business. Will gentlemen, then, say "Leave this matter to the Legislature?" Can they say it? Let them look back upon the operation of the system for the last thirty-four years, and the ineffectual efforts that have been made to amend it, before they determine that it shall be left to legislation. Every successive winter during those thirty-four years, with only five or six exceptions, efforts have been made to change the probate system. The circuit system, and the county court system, and the surrogate system, have all been proposed, and have all utterly failed. And why have they failed? Simply because the Legislature was not willing to assume the responsibility of creating a probate court, possessed of a character commensurate with the jurisdiction imposed upon it, because the expense of the judiciary would thus be increased. Now, sir, the plan which I propose, instead of increasing the expense will diminish it. If we provide for even five Supreme Judges at a salary of $1,200 each, making - - - $6,000

Twenty-four circuit judges at $1,000 each - - - - - 24,000

We have an aggregate expense of - $30,000

For the entire judiciary of the State; or at present salaries, and with the present number of Supreme Judges, it would stand thus:

|                                 |   |         |
|---------------------------------|---|---------|
| Three Supreme Judges at $1,200 | - | $3,600 |
| Twenty-four Circuit Judges 800  | - | 19,200  |

|                                            |   |   |   |          |
|--------------------------------------------|---|---|---|----------|
| Making the entire expense of the judiciary | - | - | - | $22,800 |
|--------------------------------------------|---|---|---|----------|

Now, sir, compare that expense with the expense of the present system, including amounts paid out by the county treasurer for extra terms, &c., I think the following will be found very nearly correct:

|                                         |   |         |   |        |
|-----------------------------------------|---|---------|---|--------|
| Three Supreme Judges at $1,200         | - | $3,600 |   |        |
| Thirteen Circuit " " 800                | - | 10,400  |   |        |
| Ninety Probate " " -                    | - | 8,000   |   |        |
| One hundred and eighty associate Judges | - | -       | - | 11,000 |

|                                                      |   |   |          |
|------------------------------------------------------|---|---|----------|
| Making 286 Judges at the aggregate annual expense of | - | - | $33,000 |
|------------------------------------------------------|---|---|----------|

So that even with the increase of eleven Circuit Judges, as I propose, and dispensing with Probate and Associate Judges, you will effect a saving of at least three thousand dollars a year, even if you increase the salaries to $1000. But supposing that we fix the salaries of the twenty-four Judges at the amount now paid—namely, $800 a year each—you will then have effected an annual saving of $10,200, and you will have diminished the number of Judges two hundred and fifty-seven—a number which has had a tendency rather to retard than to advance the ends of justice.

And here I would remark, Mr. President, that if we adopt the surrogate system—although I believe that there are few gentlemen in the Convention willing to adopt it—instead of diminishing the expense of the judiciary under such a system, we must necessarily increase it. Or, again, if we adopt a system of County Courts, instead of diminishing the expense, you will only increase it; and you cannot adopt either system without creating a court of inferior character—a mere pettifogging court, and that, too, for the transaction of the most important business. It will be nothing more, sir.

Sir, I know of no business connected with the administration of justice, which is of more importance to the people than the probate business; and many urgent reasons might be assigned, why we should have competent judges to preside over it. The fact that its proceedings are mainly ex parte—business in which the widow and the orphan are principally interested—is enough to satisfy any right thinking and right feeling man, that the judges before whom it is to be settled should be not only competent in all that appertains to the judicial character, but also that they should be men of such personal integrity and legal attainments as to give them the entire confidence of the people; for nothing is of more importance than confidence, in your courts of justice. Sir, I have had some experience in connection with the administration of business in Probate Courts, and am, to some extent, familiar with the manner in which that business is conducted; and I here venture the assertion, that the widows and orphans of the State of Indiana could better have afforded to pay out of the estates left them by deceased husbands and fathers, the pittance which would have paid the salary of a competent judge, than to have had the wretched substitute for judges which they have had to decide upon their rights. Mr. President, we are to secure to a man charged with crime a man of competent talents to preside when the question of guilt or innocence is pending. When man meets man in open court, you are willing to provide a competent judge, for the determination of their legal rights; but when the widow and the orphan appear, friendless and unprotected as they are, you do not hesitate to put them off with a man of such competency as can be obtained for some $75 a year.

Some years since, Mr. President, an administrator of an estate, and a sleek, well-fed man, went into a Probate Court, with an attorney. The judge was undoubtedly a worthy, honest man, but certainly not too well qualified for his post. The attorney addressing him, said: "Here is a gentleman who has a claim against a certain estate, and the administrator is not willing to assume the responsibility of allowing it; but the court can hear the testimony, and if satisfied the claim is right, can allow it." The witness was accordingly examined; and, sir, let me say, that I was informed that any lawyer, by a single question of cross-examination, would have said in a moment that the testimony was entirely fallacious, and did not begin to sustain the claim, which amounted to some four thousand dollars. It is a difficult and delicate thing to interfere in a matter of this kind, when you are not employed; but I am told that it was suggested to the judge, that the amount involved was a large one, and that it would be better in such a case to let a suit be regularly brought. To this suggestion the judge replied, that this gentleman would certainly not present an unfair claim against the estate—that it was undoubtedly a just one—that the estate should not be exhausted in costs, and that it was proper it should be allowed. Yes, sir; and that claim was allowed, in the absence of any person interested in the defense. And what was the consequence? Why, sir, within the last six months, the widow and her orphan child, whose rights were thus promptly disposed of, were begging bread in the streets of one of your towns. And, sir, this is not a solitary case. All over the State, acts of high-handed injustice have been done by these courts. The judges are men of honesty, undoubtedly; but they are not men of sufficient intelligence and discrimination. I will admit, that perhaps the most of these judges are honest; but, sir, honesty is not the only qualification that is required here. You want competency as well as honesty; and you cannot secure the services of judges of that kind, unless you give them a competent salary; for, in this State, most men are poor, and have to live by their labor. ["Consent, consent."]

Mr. President, I wish to present two or three other sections, in connection with the amendment I have offered. The section which I propose to amend, if it be so amended, would read as follows:

"SECTION —. The State shall be divided into twenty-four Circuits, and a Circuit Judge shall be elected by the electors in each Circuit, and shall reside therein; and shall hold his office six years, if he shall so long behave well.

I propose, in the next place, the following sections:

"SEC. — The Judge of each Circuit shall hold in each year at least two terms of Circuit Court, and at least three terms of Probate Court, in each County of his Circuit.

"SEC. — The General Assembly may increase or diminish the number of Circuits, as the business of the State may require."

And then, in connection with the same plan, I propose as follows:

"SEC. — There shall be elected by the qualified voters of each County, a clerk of the Circuit Court and a clerk of the Probate Court, who shall hold their respective offices for four years, and shall not be eligible more than eight years, in any term of twelve years.

"Provided, That in Counties containing less than two thousand voters, the same person may be eligible to both offices."

My idea on that subject is this: In large counties it may be necessary to confer limited surrogate powers upon the clerks of Probate Courts. There are a thousand things connected with probate business which might be transacted by the clerk, without the intervention of judicial power. In the early part of the session, I offered a series of resolutions embodying the surrogate system. On conversing, however, with the gentlemen of the committee, and with members of the Convention, I am not only satisfied that the surrogate system connected with judicial powers, is defective and ought not to be adopted, but that it would lead to almost necessary corruptions, and that few officers exercising surrogate powers could maintain that dignity and character requisite in a judicial officer.

I would further observe that in the State of New York, where this system prevailed for a long series of years, in the amended Constitution of the State it is expressly provided that no judicial officer shall receive fees for his judicial services, but that he shall be paid for these services by a fixed salary.

And let me say here that in looking over the debates of the Convention of New York, you will not find a single argument on the subject of the surrogate system, but would show the utter impracticability of that system working well, if you confer upon the Surrogate judicial powers. Every argument which you will there find shows that fact beyond question. If the Surrogate be honest, and at the same time competent, the system may do tolerably well; but if he be deficient in either of these qualifications, his court will necessarily become extremely odious and oppressive to the country.

Now I would like to call attention to the course of legislation on the subject of Probate Courts since the commencement of our administration as a Government. In the year 1817, the year after the adoption of the Constitution, by an act of the Legislature, the associate judges held Probate Courts at an expense of four dollars per day to the State; but in the year 1824 the probate business was transferred to the Circuit Court, and I would like to have it remarked as a remarkable instance of the anxiety of the Legislature to get rid of this important business without expense to the State, that although they threw the probate business into the Circuit Courts, they did not increase the salary of one of the judges, nor did they increase the terms of the courts in any one circuit. Every man must see that you cannot throw ex parte business into a Circuit Court under these circumstances without its being neglected. Where men have litigated cases in courts, each having rights, they will force this business back. And, sir, it is not the executor, or the administrator, or the guardian, that usually wishes to press this business forward. They are too often anxious only for delay.

By the act of 1829 our present probate system was adopted, and for the last twenty-one years all the iniquities of that system have been borne by—not exactly the people of Indiana—but by the widows and orphans o those who have gone to their graves, and, sir, let me say that a more odious system never was so long fastened upon an intelligent and enterprising people. And why is this so? Because the Court has no character. Nobody has any confidence in its decisions. The ministerial officers of the Court are all connected with it by virtue of some higher office, and the whole Court itself, although its jurisdiction is so important, presents just such an appearance as this system of legislation is calculated to produce—a court without character and without standing; a court whose decisions are five times wrong where they are once right. And it is very important to be considered that some of the duties devolving upon a Probate Court are not only important as connected with those who cannot defend their own rights, but important as connected with questions of law. All the questions that are involved in Chancery cases are involved in the jurisdiction of these Probate Courts—the construction of wills, the enforcement of trusts and powers—and yet the people of the State of Indiana have said for thirty-four years that although they will furnish competent courts and judges to try men accused of crime, although they will give to men a competent tribunal for the settlement of all questions of law and of fact that may arise between them, yet when it comes to those who cannot protect themselves, the widow and the orphan, they must have assigned to them an inferior court, not only in point of character, but also in point of ability, to decide upon and protect their rights.

I hope that gentlemen will not object to the passing of the amendment I have proposed unless some better plan is presented. I trust that they will not pass over this business as unimportant, because the tears of the widow are not streaming in our sight, and the cries of the orphan are not ringing in our ears.

I will, then, explain again what I propose. I propose that the number of circuits shall be increased to twenty-four, that the judges shall hold two terms of Circuit Court and three terms of Probate Court every year in each county; thus placing the Probate Court upon the same footing, and giving to it the same character as you give to your Circuit Court. In the thirteenth judicial circuit, I have the number of days consumed by the Circuit Courts, and also by the Probate Courts, during the year ending with the last fall terms, and I find that under the old system the judge was employed twenty-eight weeks, holding two terms of Circuit Court in each of the four counties. By the system which I propose he would be employed thirty weeks, giving him twenty-two weeks' time to examine cases which ought to be examined out of court, and also to attend to other necessary business connected with his jurisdiction. If a change is not demanded by the people in our Probate system, then let my proposition, and any other proposed reform, be defeated. If, however, experience has proved our present system to be unjust and defective, and the people ask for reform, then let no gentleman shrink from responsibility by leaving this matter where it has stood for thirty-four years, the sport of capricious legislation.

Mr. BORDEN next addressed the Convention, and gave his views on the proper organization of the judiciary system, in which he proposed, first, that the judges of the circuit court should hold the supreme court.

He alluded to the advantages of the English Nisi Prius system, and also to the same system which he said existed in New York.

He objected to the power being vested in the Legislature to create and abolish courts;

And announced his uncompromising opposition to the present probate system;

And that the same system of courts should prevail throughout the State.

His speech will appear hereafter.

Mr. LOCKHART. For the purpose of giving the gentleman from Dearborn an opportunity of offering his amendment in the right place, I move to lay the section and pending amendment now before the Convention on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is section 8, on its second reading.

The section was read as follows:

"The circuit court shall be composed of one judge only, who shall hold at least three terms every year in each county in his circuit, and shall have such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the section and inserting as follows:

"The circuit court shall be composed of one judge only, who shall hold every year at least two terms of circuit court, and at least three terms circuit court in each county of his circuit."

Mr. NAVE. If the Convention will give me their attention for a short time, I think they will learn that they will have to do one of two things, if they desire to have any improvement in the system of doing the probate business of the State. If I could have the attention of the Convention for a very few moments, I wish to say a word in reply to the argument advanced by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

From the manner in which he has discussed this question there can be no doubt that he has had as much experience as any gentleman on this floor, in relation to this kind of business, having himself been a probate judge in the county from which he hails; and his argument would doubtless, on that ground, have much weight with the Convention. But, sir, let us examine the argument. He passes through the county of Dearborn, and one or two other counties, and he there shows a system from which it is evident that it would be much better to adopt the plan which he proposes, than to continue the arrangement which now exists. But let us look at the State of Indiana as she is as a whole, and not merely as she is found in the county of Dearborn, and one or two other adjoining counties.

Now as to the plan which he proposes: no doubt in some counties it might answer well enough, where there are only two or three counties in a circuit; but when you require that one judge shall hold two terms of circuit and three of probate court in each county every year, I would like to know how it is to be done in those circuits which take seven or eight counties to form them? Sir, it is impossible. No matter how talented and experienced a judge may be, it would be impossible for him in these large circuits to attend so often.

The proposition, therefore, appears to me to be one that should not be adopted by this Convention. I admit frankly that the present system of doing probate business is in many instances absolutely ruinous to widows and orphans, and that it is a curse to the country rather than a blessing; but let us be careful that we do not entail a worse system upon the country; for we might occasionally have a circuit judge who knows but little of law; and in such case the people of his circuit would suffer equally as much in regard to their probate business as they suffer under the present system.

Sir, I have a proposition to offer, by which I design to create a system which, in my opinion, will work well. I will read it for the information of the Convention:

"There shall be elected in each of the organized counties of the State by the electors, at the time and place of holding their general elections, one county judge, who shall hold his office for 4 years, if he shall so long behave well, who shall perform the duties of surrogate and probate judge; and who, with the aid of two justices of the peace, shall hold courts of session with such civil and criminal jurisdiction as shall be given by law."

Now let us examine this proposition for a moment. If we organize an independent court in each county in the State, and elect a judge who is to take cognizance of all matters of probate, it will be the duty of the Legislature to pay such compensation as will secure men of sufficient talent to discharge the duty; and by associating with him two justices of the peace, you can give him jurisdiction in all actions of debt or assumpsit under the sum of $1,000; and in minor offenses such as misdemeanors, which detain the circuit courts so long. With such an arrangement you would not need more than eight or ten circuit judges, and you would thereby greatly reduce the expense which will be inevitably entailed upon the people if the system proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn should be adopted. I am, therefore, opposed to it, and in favor of a different system; and I will even go so far as to say that I would prefer the present system rather than resort to such an experiment as that proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn. I will offer my proposition at the proper time.

Mr. BASCOM. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the word "one" in the twenty-fifth line, and insert the words, "circuit and two associate judges."

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would observe that the amendment of the gentleman from Wells does not apply to the gentleman's amendment. There are but four lines in it [a laugh].

Mr. HOVEY. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn: add "Provided that the circuit and probate courts shall be held at separate terms, and shall in no case be joined together."

Mr. HOLMAN. That I understand to be the language of my amendment. If the language is not sufficiently explicit, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Posey.

Mr. HOVEY. I wish to offer a few remarks in regard to these amendments. I must say that I am very favorably impressed with the system proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn. It is almost impossible to devise any plan that can be worse than the present probate system. The judicial history of the world cannot present a more imbecile judicature of that kind than has existed in this State since 1816. The men who preside in these courts are generally honest and upright, and are raised to the bench on that account, but there are but few of them who make any pretensions to legal acquirements, and yet the probate courts may be said to be the most important, in a practical point of view, of any courts within the State. These courts have the control and management of all the property that is left by decedents, and consequently the whole wealth of the country may be said to pass through them once in twenty-five years, or every generation. Their weakness does not arise from the want of natural capacity on the part of the judges. The State has refused to pay them anything like a fair compensation for the labor necessary to prepare them for their duties, and the consequence has been what would be naturally expected, that they have, as a general rule, neglected to qualify themselves at all. I find no fault with the judges, as men—they, no doubt, do what they think is right. But every lawyer knows that there is more fraud and rascality, and more wrong done in these courts to the helpless, the widow, and the orphan, than has been perpetrated in all other courts put together. I would not be understood as saying that these wrongs originate from the corruption of the judges. There are no officers more pure in intention; but, sir, they are compelled to adjudicate the most intricate and lengthy cases that are presented to any court—they are compelled to construe new, fluctuating, and complicated laws, without guides, and when we remember that all these duties are generally performed on a hearing of but one side of the case, we should not be surprised at the results. I can point to the records of a probate court in this State, where, in one single account current, not less than FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS was unjustly allowed. Among the vouchers, strange as it may seem, will be found the champaign and cigar bills of the executor, with his traveling expenses in different parts of the United States, and the cost of building himself a house. Of course such an account current would not be sworn to even though the law were ten times more positive than it is. Even in this gross case, I have no idea that the judge acted from impure motives—it was his honesty, and his confidence in the honesty of others, that induced him to make the allowance without investigation. This is but a specimen of the workings of our probate courts, and I hope this Convention will have nerve enough to correct the evils which we have been subjected to for the last thirty-four years. Unless some better plan is offered, I shall vote for the system offered by the gentleman from Dearborn; and, as the labor of the judges will be much more arduous than at present, I think their salaries should be increased. The idea of getting judges who are capable of administering justice, to work for nothing, is a farce that I hope will not be again acted in this State. The judges of your circuit courts are, and the judges of the courts contemplated by the amendments, will be, placed in more trying situations than even the judges of the Supreme Court. The judges of these courts have points and cases presented to them, which they are compelled to determine without time for reflection, and without the means of references, while in the cases tried in the Supreme Court, the judges have written briefs, which they can examine by the day, or the week, or the month, or the year, if they choose; and with such facilities, any judge of that Court, who has a half a head upon his shoulders, will, in a very large majority of cases, come to correct conclusions.

Mr. WOLFE. In reflecting upon the proceedings of the Convention for the last few days, and with the anxiety which appears to prevail, to get through our business, I do not think that the Convention is prepared to go into a full change of system in reference to our courts. It will take at least two weeks to do anything like justice to the subject. My own opinion is, that we had better go on in the beaten track, and leave this matter open to the Legislature. I believe that we will hereafter have Legislatures embracing nearly as much intelligence and talent as there is in this body ["consent, consent"], and they will be in a better situation to deliberate upon these matters than we are. As we have taken away from them, or will take away from them, the power of passing special and local legislation, they will have comparatively but little business to do, and I therefore think we had better travel on to some other subject, and get along the best way we can.

Mr. OWEN. I do not propose to go into this discussion, but will only say here, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Sullivan, that, so far as my section of country is concerned, there was hardly a single subject which attracted more attention, or which was thought more worthy of our deliberate consideration here, than the question of re-organizing the probate system. I hope that gentlemen will not pass hastily over it, but that they will give it the consideration so important a subject deserves.

Mr. BASCOM. I am entirely opposed to the probate system going into the hands of the Circuit Courts. The gentleman from Posey says that, if this is done, one thing will be necessary, namely: that the judges should have large salaries.

Mr. HOVEY (interposing). The gentleman is entirely mistaken. He will not find such a remark in my speech.

Mr. BASCOM. That was what I thought I heard the gentleman say, and I am glad to learn that I am mistaken. I hope the Convention, if it adopt any system at all, will adopt a plain practical system. We do not want a system of probate business to be settled by the Circuit Court at all. Your Circuit system is a kind of high tribunal, and none but he who wears a fine coat and a new hat can appear before that tribunal. [Applause and cries of "No! no!"] It is so in your Circuit Courts; and not only that, but when you enter the Court, you will find a couple of men with long sticks to stir up the out-siders. [Laughter and applause.] I am aware that I shall excite the ire of the lawyers here; but when they get tired of knocking and thumping, I will begin speaking. I conceive that the people do not require this change at our hands, nor indeed any change in the probate system to the extent to which some gentlemen seem anxious to go here. I am willing to admit that it needs reformation and simplifying, so as to afford a ready and speedy mode of settlement of decedents' estates; but by no means such a system as that proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn. I hope the section will not be adopted.

Mr. KILGORE. I think there has not been before this Convention since we have met a subject more important than that which is now under consideration. There is no gentleman of the legal profession whose experience has not taught him that there are many defects in our present probate system; and, as has been well remarked by one gentleman on this floor, it has been a source of legislation for the last thirty years; and notwithstanding this, we still have a system that is calculated not only to unsettle land titles, but to tolerate frauds of the most abominable character.

Sir, a Probate Court is one of the most important courts of the State. Every particle of property in the State, both real and personal, must pass through the adjudication of that court, either directly or indirectly, once in every twenty-five years. The loose and unguarded manner in which the business of the Probate Court has been transacted heretofore, will ultimately have a tendency to produce as much uncertainty with regard to our land titles, as ever existed in the State of Kentucky. Sir, if any member of the legal profession was disposed to bid farewell to his ordinary practice, and resolved to make money at the hazard of everything like character, he need not desire a better occupation to accomplish that object than to enter into an investigation of the titles of the country. Well pleased as gentlemen may be with the present system—and I know that there are many gentlemen, from different counties, who think that the system is just what it ought to be—yet I will go into the counties of these gentlemen, and I will venture to assert that there is not one out of ten of the titles settled by these Probate Courts but could be set aside at once. An individual, to discharge properly the duties which devolve upon a Probate Judge, should not only be a common law lawyer, but he should also be a good chancery lawyer. The most important chancery questions frequently present themselves for his decision and adjudication, and these, too, in which the rights of parties who are unable to defend themselves, or to guard their own interests, are deeply and seriously involved. The rights of the orphan and the widow, and not theirs only, but the rights of those who become purchasers of property, are affected. They become purchasers of the property of decedents, sold under order of these Probate Courts, and before they are aware of it, the title is swept from under them by the owners, who have investigated the proceedings and discovered the errors that have been committed.

Now, how are these Probate Courts organized? Why, sir, we take up a common justice of the peace of the county, and we make him a Probate Judge. We place him upon the bench, and he becomes general administrator of all the interests of the county. The people counsel with him who is thus regarded as the guardian of all interests of every kind, but who, in many instances, has never read a page of law in his life. They believe that he is competent to direct them in the discharge of these all important duties; and it just becomes the case of "the blind leading the blind," and "both fall into the ditch."

Now what system we should adopt I am not prepared to say. I have been revolving a system in my mind. The circuit system, as presented by the gentleman from Dearborn is perhaps one of the best. The chancery system has also been suggested, but I find that there is a disposition here to destroy all distinction between common law and chancery courts. If that is done, it at once supercedes chancery jurisdiction, and so far as that is concerned, does away with it. We must then inquire what is the next best system. We presume that the circuit judges will be competent men, and we rationally infer that they are more competent to discharge the duties of probate judges than country justices of the peace, however honest they may be. Objection has been made against blending the two courts together; that, however, may be easily obviated. If the number of circuits, as proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn, should be adopted, we may be enabled, or at least the Legislature may, to authorize the holding of four sessions every year. I would have no objection to setting two of these terms apart for issue business, and for attending to the probate business of the county. Let it be the duty of the judges to make up issues for trial in the common law business of the county, and attend to the settlement of decedents' estates during the residue of the term, when the mind of the judge can be directed to it; and that you pay him such a compensation as will warrant him in giving his whole attention to the discharge of these duties, and then you will undoubtedly get them discharged. But until you pay them sufficient, you will neither be able to secure the talent necessary for the discharge of these duties, nor to secure the attention and application of the individual who is called upon to discharge them. If you pay him such a compensation as is hardly sufficient to keep soul and body together, he will not give that attention which is necessary to the proper discharge of the duties of the bench. Sir, this is not a matter in which we should stop to count dollars and cents. It is of vastly more importance to the community that a good compensation should be paid to the judges of these courts than that millions of money should be wasted, through ignorance or design.

Sir, you will find that in a majority of cases where an estate has passed through the probate court, it is found to be insolvent. Everybody, perhaps, entertained the opinion that the deceased left sufficient property to pay all his debts and to leave something for his widow and children; but the estate has passed through the probate court, and by the time it has passed through that mill, it is consumed in officers' fees, lawyers' fees, and unjust claims made for the purpose of wronging those who are unable to defend their own rights. Then, sir, I repeat, that, let the expense be what it may, I want to do away with the present system, because it is an abomination and a curse to the country, and to all concerned in it.

I am not particular about the plan offered by the gentleman from Dearborn, or any other which is equally good. Any good system will receive my approbation. I want to do away with the present system, and to have this business supervised by a judge of sufficient talent.

I am well aware that the moment a lawyer rises in his place here, to advocate a measure, it is almost a fatal blow to it, and it is regarded with the strongest suspicion. This is unfortunate, but I suppose cannot be remedied. Were I, however, disposed to consider my own interest as a lawyer, I would say, "leave the system as it is;" and I would practice upon the titles as a means of making a fortune, or purchase the rights of heirs who supposed they had no title. I can assure gentlemen that more money might be made by an operation of that sort than by filling the office of judge either of a probate or a circuit court.

One advantage that will be gained by placing a competent man upon the bench will be that you at once dispense with the necessity of coming into court backed by a lawyer. If an administrator is disposed to do right and not willing to take his own judgment, he is bound to employ an attorney. But if you place a competent man upon the bench, he will require everything to be done in conformity with the law. It is his duty to do so, and he will see that it is done, and that justice is done, too. I have now done with the subject, and must apologize for having trespassed so long upon the attention of the Convention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALL). The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not in the habit of making motions, but I declare that the question which is before us is one of so much importance, and there are so many suggestions made, all requiring consideration, that we cannot, in this off-hand manner, and upon the spur of the moment, settle this question as it ought to be settled; and I therefore move to lay the section and the amendment on the table. [Cries of "no, no, no!"]

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Wallace, and it was decided in the affirmative.

CHANGE OF CIRCUITS.

The PRESIDENT. The next question is on section 9, on its second reading.

The section was read as follows:

"The Legislature may provide by law that the judge of one circuit may hold the courts of another circuit, in cases of necessity or convenience."

The question being on ordering the section to be engrossed for a third reading, it was decided in the affirmative.

DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. HOVEY offered the following as an additional section:

"No judge shall be allowed to report the decision of the Supreme Court."

The section was adopted and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

COUNTY COURTS.

Mr. HOWE offered the following as an additional section:

"There shall be in each county a county court, to be composed of one judge, who shall have original jurisdiction in cases of probate, and such other jurisdiction as shall be conferred by law, and whose salary shall be five hundred dollars, to be paid out of the county treasury, and such fees as may be prescribed by law."

On motion, the section was laid upon the table.

CLERK OF THE CIRCUIT COURT.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is section 10, on its second reading.

The section is as follows:

"There shall be a clerk of the Circuit Court elected by the electors in each county, who shall hold his office six years, if he shall so long behave well, and who shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the section and inserting the following:

"There shall be elected, in each county, by the electors thereof, a clerk of the circuit court, and a clerk of the probate court, who shall each continue in office four years, and until his successor is elected and qualified, each of whom shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by law; provided that in counties having less than two thousand voters, the same offices may be performed by one person."

I hope that gentlemen will not dispose of this section without reflection. It will be remembered that we have already adopted a section providing for the election of a clerk of the Supreme Court; and I think we ought to provide also for the circuit and probate courts.

Now, as the business of the counties increases, I think it would be desirable that it should separate the business of the two courts entirely; not only with reference to the judges and their terms, but also in reference to the clerks, for this reason: It will be necessary to confer upon the clerk of the circuit court some limited surrogate powers, as for instance that of making out an order or application in cases of insolvency, and other proceedings which are entirely ex parte. Now, I have no objection, if gentlemen think it necessary, to fix upon a higher number of voters than that proposed. But there certainly will be a time when it will be desirable to separate the two offices entirely. The business is entirely distinct. There is as much a line of demarcation between these two classes of business, as there is between that of auditors of counties, and that of clerks of circuit courts. I think it is highly desirable to separate the business, especially if it be found necessary to increase the power of clerks of the circuit courts. Every one knows that the clerks of circuit courts are quasi surrogates for certain purposes. And if the surrogate powers are increased, the clerk of the probate court should be a separate officer from the clerk of the circuit court.

Mr. WOLFE. The gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) should remember that he lives in a large county, while I live in a small one. Why not, then, have both these offices in one, for the present, because in the small counties it may be difficult to find competent men to discharge the duties of them, if they are separate. Besides, some ten or twenty years hence we may want to separate these offices, when our counties become more populous. And cannot the Legislature do this? ["Consent."] I should think so. I can see no necessity for creating new offices in the Constitution. We have already created a number of new offices, and I shall most seriously object to this additional one; and further, in order to test the sense of the Convention on the matter, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I hope the gentleman from Sullivan will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. WOLFE. Certainly, if the gentleman from Tippecanoe desires it.

The motion was withdrawn.

Mr. PETTIT. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn. We have adopted, or at least ordered to be engrossed, a section that reads as follows:

"The judicial power of this State shall be vested in one Supreme Court, in Circuit Courts, and in such other inferior Courts as the General Assembly may establish."

Now, if it should be found necessary to divide these Courts, and to make two or three in a county, the General Assembly will have the power to appoint all the officers that may be necessary.

But, sir, I agree, for once, with my friend from Sullivan, and I am glad of it. ["Consent, consent."]

Mr. WOLFE. And I am glad of it, too.

Mr. PETTIT. I will not say but that I know something more about the organization of courts than that gentleman; but, sir, I contend that there is no propriety in dividing the clerkships, in regard to the judicial business of any county. If this is done, it will be necessary in the first place, to have two buildings. This will be inconvenient, especially to persons coming to your county seats from the country. If they want to see any particular record, they will not know to which office to go, if you have two offices; whereas if you have only one, they can go to it directly and find what they want. If these records are all kept by one man using the proper seal for each court, then each man, in the county will know to what building to go when he wants to examine a record, and considerable expense will thus be saved. I think it is unreasonable so seek to divide these offices.

Mr. HOVEY. I think the gentleman from Sullivan, is right. [Applause and thumping on the benches.] The section can be so amended as to answer both his purpose and that of the gentleman from Dearborn. With that view, I propose to amend the section so as to make it three thousand voters instead of two thousand—the number proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the section and pending amendments on the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I call for a division of the question.

The question was then taken, first on the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. Hovey on the table, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. Holman on the table, which was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the section on the table, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following as an additional section:

"The probate court shall have such civil jurisdiction, and the circuit court such civil and criminal jurisdiction as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. BASCOM. I move to lay the section on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next business is the following section, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the section as follows:

"There shall be a competent number of Justices of the Peace elected by the electors in each township in the several counties, and who shall continue in office five years if they shall so long behave well: whose powers and duties shall be regulated and defined by law."

Mr. THORNTON. I move to lay the section on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSERVATORS OF THE PEACE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next business is the twelfth section, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the section as follows:

"All judicial officers of this State shall be conservators of the peace in their respective jurisdictions."

The section was adopted and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, when,

On motion,

The Convention adjourned.

~~~~~
SATURDAY, JAN. 18, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NEW.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HOVEY presented the petition of one hundred and thirty citizens of Posey county, remonstrating against several restrictions adopted by the Convention, and praying that some liberal provision be made in regard to banking.

Mr. H. said, I have recently been compelled, by sickness in my family, to visit that portion of the State from which the petition just read emanated, and I can bear testimony so far as I could learn, that the people there, without distinction of party, concur in the general, with the sentiments contained in that petition.

I can say that throughout that whole region of country, there is a decided feeling in favor of some banking system—one that may be safe, and at the same time offer more general accommodations than the present State Bank. Nor is that feeling confined to the county of the petitioners. For three hundred and fifty miles along the Ohio river, which I traveled in going to and returning from home, I heard the sentiments contained in that petition reiterated from every quarter. It would be wrong for me to conceal from the Convention, the fact that the people through the southern part of this State, think we are placing too many restrictions upon them.

Why, sir, with one hand we are giving them more than they want—we are casting upon them the power of electing persons to fill little pitiful offices, such as State Librarian, Clerk of the Supreme Court, Sheriff of the Supreme Court, &c.; officers in which the people at large have, and take but little interest; while, on the other hand, we are tying them down through the Legislature, and embarking in experiments, unknown to the political world. Such a course, sir, looks to me like gorging the lion with meat, which his appetite does not crave, and chaining his limbs to destroy his action. I warn the Convention not to place too many restrictions upon the rights of the people, for there is a "voice behind the throne," which can and will be heard, that is more powerful than the throne itself, and unless we adopt a more liberal policy, it may be heard in opposition to the Constitution we are making. Some gentlemen talk about reforms that are in advance of the present age, and expect to reap many laurels for their great political discoveries. Let me say to such, that those who are up with the age, and understand the wants, feelings, and character of those for whom they legislate are generally wise enough for all practical purposes, and will demonstrate their wisdom by moulding their reforms to suit the people as they are, and not as they may be.

The causes which chiefly conduced to the calling of this Convention, were few. The election of the important State officers by the people—changing the sessions of the Legislature from annual to biennial sessions—a change of the seminary fund to the use of common schools—the prohibition of the immigration of negroes and mulattoes to the State—the prevention of local legislation, &c. These were nearly all the changes demanded, and might have been accomplished long, long before this. But what have we done? Why, sir, the few amendments the people demanded, will sink into insignificance when they come to examine the "revised code," which we will soon submit to them as a Constitution.

I have detained the Convention longer than I intended, and have only been induced to do so from the reflection that that petition is not the production of unreflecting and thoughtless men, but that it presents the embodied opinions of those fully capable of understanding the full meaning of their requests. As there is no committee to whom the petition, at this late day, can be properly referred, I move to lay it upon the table.

The petition was accordingly laid upon the table.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. RISTINE offered a resolution in relation to a sale of the stock in the State Bank of Indiana, and the application of the proceeds to the support of common schools.

The resolution lies over.

Mr. FRISBIE offered a resolution instructing the committee on law and law reform to report a section permitting every free white male citizen over the age of twenty-one years, of good moral character, to practice law in any and all of the courts of the State.

Mr. BORDEN suggested that the resolution should go to the committee on courts of justice. SEVERAL VOICES. "No, no." "The subject belongs to law reform."

The resolution was adopted.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. It will be recollected, sir, that some time since, a resolution was offered fixing a time for the final adjournment of the Convention. That resolution was indefinitely postponed. I now wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is necessary to re-consider that vote, in order to fix a day for adjournment, sine die?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would remark that it is not in order to introduce a resolution on the subject. [Cries of "consent."]

Mr. FOSTER. Is it in order to move to re-consider! because, if so, I will make that motion.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman, if he voted with the majority?

Mr. FOSTER. I am under the impression that I did, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention will close its labors, and that the members thereof will return to their constituents on the tenth day of February next.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution is not in order.

Mr. MILROY offered a resolution as to the expediency of fixing a minimum of salaries.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHERROD offered the following:

Resolved, That the Convention now take up the orders of the day.

The resolution was adopted by unanimous consent.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The first thing in order being the section which declares that all prosecutions shall be carried on in the name of the State,

It was read a third time and passed.

COUNTY DEBTS.

The section prohibiting county debts, and the assumption of such debts by the State, was read a third time.

Mr. HELM moved to re-commit the section with instructions to amend by declaring that further restrictions on the rights of the people are unnecessary.

I am opposed to the section now under consideration, and to the amendment that is pending to that section. I believe that we have already placed too many restrictions upon the rights of the people. I apprehend, sir, that if we go on in the way which we have been going, the Constitution which we are about making will fail to be approved by our constituents.

It would be better if we were to follow the example of those who framed the present Constitution, and exercise similar moderation. We have heretofore declared the power of the people for self government. And we have also adopted a provision prohibiting the credit of the State from being loaned for the purpose of carrying on works of internal improvement, and have directly said that we would not consult their will on that subject. If we continue to carry out restrictions of this kind, perhaps before we close our labors we may propose to restrict individuals in reference to credits. We, in the first place, commence by restricting the Legislature. Now we are restricting counties, and if we continue we shall end by placing restrictions upon the actions of individuals in regard to going into debt.

We might just as well pass a section declaring that men shall not contract debts; that we shall not be allowed to use the credit system in individual transactions, as to say that we shall not, in a corporate capacity, or that counties shall not. I am opposed, I say, to every restriction of this kind, and I am well assured that such is the case with the people of Indiana generally.

We have, on more than one occasion, taken it upon ourselves to act the part of guardians of the people of Indiana. This, I presume, is the effect of the internal improvement system of which so much has been said on a former occasion. It is a necessary consequence for people to run from one extreme to another; and I presume there are many in this Convention who participated in running the State into that extreme, and now they are willing to run into the other extreme. I say we should pause before we act in a matter of this kind any further than we have already acted. We have had a voice from the people, and that very recently, too, on this subject. They have spoken to us through the Legislature which is now in session, and that voice is directly from the people. They have shown us that there should not be so many restrictions imposed. A restriction of this kind has been attempted to be imposed upon the people by the interposition of the veto power, and they have declared that this was an usurpation of power, and we have had this morning the voice of the people speaking again through a memorial upon this subject, and that, too, from the old democratic county of Posey, and they speak like democrats and free men on the subject. They do not feel like having their hands tied.

I hope that this section and the amendment will be re-committed, and that we will have a report according to what the people have expressed through their representatives and memorials.

Mr. GORDON moved to amend the instructions so as to direct the committee to strike out the first four lines of the section and add the following:

"No county shall subscribe to stock in any incorporated company without the consent of a majority of all the voters of said county being first obtained."

Mr. HELM accepted the amendment as a modification of the instructions he had moved.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the re-commitment of the section with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Rush,

Mr. PETTIT demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 47, nays 74—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. So the section was not re-committed.

The question then being, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 93, nays 22—as follows:

So the section passed, and was referred to the committee on revision.

THE JUDICIARY.

The first section of the article reported from the committee on the organization of courts of justice was read a third time.

The section is as follows:

“The judicial power of this State shall be vested in one supreme court, in circuit courts, and in such other inferior courts as the General Assembly may establish.”

The question being, Shall the section pass?

Mr. THORNTON. I discover, on looking over the article reported from the committee on the organization of courts of justice, that we ordered, I believe, as many as five sections to a third reading yesterday, and passed over some sections, and some of the most important of the number. At the instance of some of the friends of a somewhat different judiciary system, I have drawn up an amendment, which I design to offer as a substitute for the article reported by the committee. With the indulgence of the Convention—though it is with great reluctance that I trouble them at this late period, when time is so precious—I will advert for a moment to the plan of the gentleman over the way, from Dearborn (Mr. Holman). I was, at the first blush, inclined to support the plan that he proposed; but after giving it some consideration, I have become so well satisfied that it will not meet the expectations of the people, that I should greatly prefer the adoption of the one which I propose to submit. I am satisfied that the people expect a tribunal to be provided for each county; and though the plan proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn may furnish a good Circuit Court system, and to some extent supply the place of a Court of Probate, and remedy, to some extent, the evils complained of; yet it will not meet the exigencies of the country, either at this time, or in the future. Now, if you create twenty-four circuits, there being ninety-one counties in the State, it will leave more than two-thirds of the counties without any county tribunal. I ask you if the people are to depend for the transaction of their probate business upon a Circuit Judge perhaps fifty miles off? No, sir, it will not answer; and we shall be driven back to the old probate system that we have all agreed to dispense with. If we adopt the plan proposed by the gentleman, the people will be dissatisfied, and the Legislature will be compelled to make provision for each county. The people will not be satisfied without having a judge within the county, to grant letters of administration and letters testamentary, writs of habeas corpus, and attend to matters that will necessarily arise constantly in the several counties. Let me put the question: If this principle be adopted, it is probable that the counties of Floyd, Harrison, and Washington will form one judicial circuit, the residence of the judge to be at New Albany. Will the people of Washington and Harrison counties be satisfied to have their business transacted at so great a distance from them? No, sir. We must make provision for doing probate business, and business appertaining to criminal law—business which arises every day within the counties, and which demands a prompt and ready administration of the law through the medium of some domestic tribunal in each county.

I go with the friends of reform in respect to the Grand Jury, to a certain extent. I think the Grand Jury may be safely dispensed with, except in penitentiary offenses. Let all other business which has heretofore received the consideration of the Grand Jury be withdrawn, and jurisdiction over such be conferred on justices of the peace, and on a county tribunal, to be created and styled a County Court. This course has been adopted in several of the States recently, and it is one which has been found to work well, and one which I think it is very proper we should adopt. We must recollect that our population is rapidly increasing, numbering at this time about a million of inhabitants. We are about becoming a great commercial State, and it is indispensable that we should have a court at each county seat; and especially a court to do probate business. We must have a judicial officer there who will keep his office always open. If this is not done, I predict the people will express such dissatisfaction that we shall be driven back to the old system that we have, without scarcely a dissenting voice, agreed to dispense with hereafter. I heartily agree with the gentleman from Dearborn, that this system has done nothing but furnish facilities for robbing the widow and the orphan, as well as for doing injustice to the creditors of the estates of decedents—that the proceedings of those courts are such as to lay a foundation whereby all our land titles will be shaken and rendered doubtful.

It may be said that my proposition will not afford a sufficient remedy, by supplying a competent tribunal. But let me say to gentlemen, that, if we establish a suitable court in each county, it will soon have sufficient business to make it an object, with gentlemen who are qualified for the transaction of such business, to accept the office of judge of said court.

I have no wish to occupy the attention of the Convention unnecessarily, or to consume time to no purpose; but I will read my proposition, and if it fail to meet the approbation of the Convention, and it should prefer the plan of the gentleman from Dearborn, I shall be satisfied to abandon mine; for, as I have said on a former occasion, I never make a proposition that I am so wedded to, that I have not some scruples that I may be wrong, when objections are seriously raised and pressed against its adoption.

I said yesterday that I was opposed to having a separate tribunal for the transaction of probate business alone. The plan of my friend from Dearborn must assume that character, and for that reason I object to it. It will be impossible to sustain such a system and carry it into successful operation. The proposition which I am about to submit will, I hope, obviate some of the objections to the gentleman's plan, and may meet the expectation of those who stand between the two parties.

While on this subject, if I meet with the indulgence of the Convention, I will add another remark. I am aware that all propositions for radical reforms meet with opposition from the fraternity to which I have—perhaps, I might say—the misfortune to belong. They are always conservative, and ever opposed to anything like innovation upon the old, long-settled land-marks of the law.

I do not wish to intimate anything that might be construed into an attempt to throw disparagement on the honorable profession of which I am an humble member. Nothing is more disreputable than this, and I shall not do so; but I must be permitted to do justice to truth so far as to say, that all efforts at reform in the practice of the law have ever met with the most decided opposition from the members of that profession generally, although it is equally true, that among those who have taken the lead in the great business of reform, we find the names of some of the most distinguished of the legal fraternity. In England, we find the names of Romilly, Brougham, and others; and in our own country, some of the most distinguished and experienced members of the bench and bar are at this moment using their most active efforts to carry out reforms of this character. Let me, among a host of others, point to Judge Lumpkin, of Georgia, Judge Wells, of Missouri, Judge Nicholas, of Kentucky, and especially, to the Hon. Timothy Walker, of Cincinnati, Ohio, late Judge of one of the Courts, and a distinguished Professor of Law in a law school of that city. This gentleman is the author of a work on American Law, one of the best elementary treatises extant on that subject, and one which has received the approbation of the first and ablest jurists of the present age, as well on this as the other side of the Atlantic. He has also been the principal conductor of the Western Law Journal, a law periodical of established reputation, having reached a seventh volume. In his work on American Law, as well as in his Law Journal, he has most ably advocated and clearly demonstrated the indispensable necessity of a radical reform of our law, and especially of law procedure. The Hon. John C. Wright, the able and efficient editor and conductor of the Cincinnati Gazette, and formerly a distinguished member of the Supreme Bench of the great Buckeye State, is, and has for some time, thrown his weight into the scale in favor of law reform. Other distinguished names might be mentioned, but these are sufficient to show that a great revolution is in progress.

If gentlemen will look around, they will see that reform must take place. I am satisfied it must and will come, and we may as well meet it at once.

My proposition is as follows:

SECTION. 1. The judicial power of this State shall be vested in a Supreme Court, Circuit Courts, County Courts, Justices of the Peace, and such other inferior courts as the Legislature may enact and establish.

SEC. 2. The State shall be divided into not less than ten districts, which may be increased from time to time, as the exigencies of the State may require, to be composed of compact and contiguous territory, in each of which a Circuit Judge shall be elected by the qualified voters therein, at the time fixed for holding general elections for State officers, to serve for four years, and until their successors are elected and qualified.

SEC. 3. The said Circuit Courts shall have such jurisdiction within their circuits respectively, and sit at such times and places as may be prescribed by law.

SEC. 4. There shall be elected by the qualified voters of each Judicial Circuit a Prosecuting Attorney, who shall hold his office two years, and until his successor be elected and qualified: Provided, however, That in the event of the regular Prosecuting Attorney being unable or disqualified to act, or from other contingency, it should become necessary, the Circuit Court shall appoint a Prosecuting Attorney for the time being.

SEC. 5. There shall be enacted and established in each county within this State a court of record to be styled "The County Court," to be composed of a single judge, to be elected by the qualified voters of the counties respectively, to serve for four years, and until his successor be elected and qualified; who shall have jurisdiction of all probate matters, together with such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law.

SEC. 6. The said County Court shall be always open for the transaction of business, and may sit at such times as may be directed by law.

SEC. 7. The Judge of the County Court shall be his own clerk, but may be authorized at his own expense to employ a person to act as his clerk for the performance of clerical duties merely; said judge, except in such cases as may be specified by law, shall not receive fees for his services, by the way of compensation therefor, but the same shall be taxed by him and collected by the proper officer, and paid into the county treasury.

SEC. 8. The Judges of the County Court shall receive such compensation for their services as may be prescribed by law, to be paid out of the county treasury.

SEC. 9. There shall be elected by the qualified voters of the State a Chief Judge, who, with the several Judges of the Circuit Courts, shall constitute the Supreme Court, a majority of whom shall be a quorum, and shall have appellate jurisdiction and a supervisory control over all inferior judicial tribunals; and said Court collectively, and the Chief Judge alone, may be vested with such original jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law. The Chief Judge shall be the President of the Supreme Court, who, as well as the several Circuit Judges, shall receive an annual salary out of the State Treasury which shall not be diminished during the period for which they may have been elected.

SEC. 10. An Attorney General shall be elected by the qualified voters of the State, to serve two years and until his successor be elected and qualified. He shall by virtue of his office, be reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court, which he shall cause to have published semi-annually, and shall moreover perform such other duties and receive such compensation as may be fixed by law.

SEC. 11. The General Assembly shall provide by law that the judge of one circuit may hold the court of another circuit, in cases of necessity or convenience; or may provide for the appointment of special judges for like purposes.

SEC. 12. Provision also may be made by law for the creation of Courts of Conciliation, for the adjustment of all matters of controversy, the course of proceeding of which shall be regulated by law.

SEC. 13. The exercise of jurisdiction by the several courts in this State in matters of a civil nature shall be without regard to any distinction between law and equity or the different kinds of actions at law, except so far as the same are distinguishable into cases founded on contract from those arising out of torts and all fictions of law, are hereby abolished.

SEC. 14. The General Assembly, if it should be found more expedient, in lieu of the Supreme Court herein provided for, may create a Supreme Court to be composed of the said Chief Judge, and not less than two, or more than four associates, which court shall be vested with such jurisdiction as may be defined by law.

I have had the misfortune, if I may be allowed the expression, to wear the ear marks of the whig party, but so far as my humble influence is concerned, I shall go as far as any democrat in making the terms of office short; and I say to my esteemed friend over the way from Ripley, that there are features in his proposition, that I cannot submit to. I not only want to make the tenure of office short, but I wish to let the people elect the same man to office as often as they please. I take the ground that the people always aim to do right. It was a favorite saying of the celebrated Charles Scott of Kentucky, who was distinguished for the point and roughness of his mode of expression, that the people always intended to do right, and, though sometimes they might go wrong, yet whenever they got wrong they were sure to get right again. Now I have made the tenure of office of these officers four years, and to be re-eligible without any restriction or disqualification, which I firmly believe to be the true democratic rule.

There is a feature of the proposition to which I ask the particular attention of the Convention.

[Here Mr. T. read, commented upon, and explained the sections numbered 5, 6, 7, and 8.]

Were I permitted to legislate for the country, I would give to this court jurisdiction over all criminal matters not cognizable before justices of the peace, and which would not subject the offender to confinement in the State Prison, and dispense with the Grand Jury in such cases. In this I would agree with my friend from Tippecanoe, so far, at least, who has eminently signalized himself for his efforts to abolish the use of a Grand Jury entirely. I would require this judge to keep his court always open. He should have jurisdiction to the extent of five hundred dollars in actions founded on contract, and those on tort to the extent of one hundred dollars, and down as low as twenty in either case. That would throw so much business into that court as to make it respectable, and I undertake to say that it would call upon the bench men of reputable legal qualifications as lawyers; because in the larger towns it would command business enough to warrant a salary of a thousand dollars per annum.

While upon this subject I would state that with a view to provide the means of paying the judge of the contemplated court, I would have what might be termed a docket fee taxed on each civil suit, to be paid by the unsuccessful party, because, in accordance with an old hackneyed saying, I hold that the man who dances should pay the fiddler—in other words, persons who litigate should bear the burden of paying court costs—also let reasonable per centum be charged on the amount of estates settled in probate cases—and as to criminal matters, I undertake to say that if we limit the inquiry of the Grand Jury to cases wherein the punishment is imprisonment in the Penitentiary, and withdraw the cognizance of all lesser penal offenses from the Circuit Court, as heretofore suggested, I have no doubt but that three out of four of the cases under the present system of proceeding would be transferred to the court which is contemplated to be hereby created.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's fifteen minutes are out.

Mr. MILROY moved that the rule be suspended.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I thank the Convention for the indulgence they have extended to me.

These, as I have stated, are the sources to which I would resort to create a fund by which the salary of the judge which I propose to create should be paid, and if they will not produce enough, I have no hesitation in saying that the county will cheerfully pay the remainder, rather than not have his services.

Now, sir, I come to a provision that has some degree of novelty about it.

[Here Mr. T. read section 13 of his proposition.]

By this section is proposed to abolish all distinctions between equity and law, also all distinctions between common law actions and fictions of law, and in lieu of such unmeaning and senseless absurdities to substitute a plain, direct, rational, and common sense system of procedure. ["Consent."] I want to see something put into the Constitution that will enable Indiana to march in the line of progress which is indicated by several of our sister States. I am pained to see that she is now so much behind other States in this respect. The great Empire State of New York has set the example by abrogating the old technical system that has so long clogged and rendered the administration of justice odious in that State.

Even England, from whom we have derived the greater part of our technical forms in law proceedings, has determined to get ahead of us in the way of reform. This proposition will dispense with those distinctions between actions which have heretofore been so troublesome, as well as the distinction between the equity forum and the common law forum. If there be anything that has deservedly met with the decided disapprobation of the people of this country, it is that the Court shall not decide the equity as well as the law of the case.

I ask that the article be re-committed with instructions to substitute the proposition that I have read. Or if that form of proceeding could be dispensed with, I should much prefer that the matter should be discussed and determined now.

I repeat, I cannot vote for the plan proposed by my friend over the way, for the reason that I know the people will not be satisfied with it. I have no desire to be troublesome, or to press my opinions with unyielding tenacity—I am always willing to defer to the judgment of others; but in this case I claim to have enjoyed the opportunity of acquiring some experience. I have been upwards of thirty years at the bar, and a good part of that period actively engaged in the business of my profession. So far as the practice of law is concerned, I may say, as Enneas to Queen Dido, "All of which I saw, and part of which I was."

One word further. After we reform the Judiciary, as we propose, we shall not have so much necessity for revising the cases determined by the inferior courts.

I ask gentlemen to consider how many cases are brought up for revision, upon mere technicality. Such a system, I say, the people disapprove of, and will inevitably be wholly repudiated by them.

With the indulgence of the Convention I will relate an anecdote which occurs to my mind, in connection with this subject. A certain gentleman, who is now no more, and who, while he lived, was an ornament to the State and to the legal profession, of which he was a distinguished member, whilst practicing at the bar, brought an action upon a promissory note, in favor of a tight, hard-fisted old Gripus, and happened to bring a wrong action. A demur was interposed, and the case was lost. His client afterwards met him. "Why, Colonel," says he, "it appears that judgment has gone against us, and I have lost my debt and have the costs to pay. I thought we had a good case; it was a plain note of hand." "Why," says the Colonel, "the confounded note did not fit the declaration." Such cases often happen. I wish to see no more of them. I do most sincerely hope that we shall adopt such a system of reform that all the revising court will have to do then will be to decide the merits of the case, free from technicalities. If so, there will be very few cases sent up for revision.

It may be said that the judge who decides the case in the first instance, ought not to sit upon the Supreme Bench. Let the Legislature manage that. But it appears to me that there is an advantage in it, because when the case goes up for revision, the judge before whom the case was tried is acquainted with the facts of the case, with the parties, witnesses, and all the circumstances attending it.

I presume that no man will act corruptly; especially a judge, and a judge elected by the people, too. My plan will give eleven judges, six of whom shall constitute a quorum. It will meet the objection that has been made here to the old Supreme Court, on account of there being too few judges. When the business is divided out, it can readily be performed.

If the Convention think that my proposition should not go to the committee, I am content; but I will remind the Convention—but will not undertake to say to it, like my young friend from Posey, over the way, that I warn them—I will not undertake to lecture the Convention, but I must remind them, that unless we adopt a proper system in reference to the Judiciary, the Constitution that we are making will either be rejected, or the Legislature will create a tribunal in order to meet the wants of the people, and we shall be compelled to go back to the same miserably defective old system with which the country has been cursed for years, against which such loud complaints have been uttered by everybody, and which we have so generally decided against, and unanimously agreed to discard in committee. I admit the subject is incumbered with difficulty. The only thing that seemed difficult to me, was to provide the means to pay the judges' salaries. But I think the matter that I have submitted will be sufficient to meet the object.

My desire is to promote economy, as well as to insure the establishment of good and competent tribunals to administer justice at the very doors of the people, as nearly as such a thing is practicable. I do not want to compel people to travel fifty or sixty miles to have their cases decided, which they must do, unless we adopt some such system as this. I thank the Convention for their indulgence.

The PRESIDENT. What is the gentleman's motion?

Mr. THORNTON. I move to re-commit the article, with instructions to substitute the proposition that I have read.

The PRESIDENT. The Convention has determined to consider the sections separately.

Mr. THORNTON. Then I will withdraw my proposition for the present.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to re-commit the section with instructions to amend by adding that there shall be a register elected in each county, to hold his office for three years, who shall transact probate business, &c.

I conceive, sir, (said Mr. McCLELLAND,) that this proposition will obviate the objections that have been made to Probate Judges. The objection that at present exists is in regard to the incompetency of the officers; and the compensation which is paid will not justify competent men in accepting them. Now it is admitted that the business is principally arithmetical work. To be sure, there are other duties which devolve upon Probate Judges, but the greater portion of the present business is altogether arithmetical. Now by adopting such a section as this, and electing a register to grant letters testamentary and of administration, and give him the fees that are now given to the clerk of the Probate Court, it will make a respectable office, so far as pay is concerned; so much so as to induce men who are qualified to discharge the duties thereof to accept of the appointment.

Let issues at law and chancery be tried by the Circuit Court. By this means we shall take the important cases from the jurisdiction of the Probate Courts, and bring them before competent tribunals, and at the same time it will be less expense to the suitors and a great saving to the estates, for these cases can be settled during vacation. I think this will obviate the objection that appears to be made against the existing system of Probate Courts.

Mr. KILGORE. As the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Randolph seems to be connected with probate business, I move to lay the instructions on the table.

A VOICE. "That will carry the section with it."

Mr. KILGORE. No matter; let it carry the section then.

The Convention refused to lay the instructions on the table.

The question was then taken on the motion of the gentleman from Randolph, to re-commit with instructions, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then being, Shall the section pass?

Mr. THORNTON. On reflection, if I suffer this matter to pass, I shall perhaps be precluded from proposing my substitute, unless upon a reconsideration, in order to get at the section. I now move that the section be re-committed, with instructions to substitute what I have proposed; and this will test the question. If the Convention are disposed to sustain the views which I have had the honor to submit, they will substitute my plan for the article proposed by the committee.

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Floyd to re-commit with instructions; and it was, upon a division—ayes 46, noes 40—decided in the affirmative.

So the section was re-committed.

The section which provides that the Supreme Court shall consist of not less than three nor more than five judges, &c., was read a third time.

Mr. PETTIT moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to amend, so that the Supreme Judges shall be elected by the people of the whole State.

Mr. KELSO. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Tippecanoe has the floor.

Mr. PETTIT. I have moved to re-commit this section to the committee from which it came, with instructions to amend it so that the judges shall be elected by the electors of the whole State. I do not design to detain the Convention but a moment; I must, however, take leave to say, that the vote which was taken yesterday upon this section indicated a retrograde march of more than a hundred years. Sir, each judge of your Supreme Court represents the whole people of the State. Now they are appointed in this way under the old Constitution—the Governor, who is the direct representative of the whole people of the State, nominates a judge, and the Senate, which represents the whole people of the State, confirms the nomination. Hence the whole people of the State are the constituents of each judge. And yesterday, the Convention indicated that they were determined that a portion of the people of the State should elect a man to preside over the destinies of the whole people. Sir, it is a retrograde march. I am sorry to see any such measure adopted. A gentleman, the other day, told us that the judges should be elected in their own neighborhoods, where the people would best know them, where their abilities would be known to the electors. Sir, the same remark will apply to the election of Governor. You might as well make provision that he should be elected only by the voters of the neighborhood in which he lives, because the people in many other portions of the State may be ignorant of the fitness of the candidate for the office. Sir, the candidate for a judgeship should go before the people as other candidates do. Let him traverse the State; let him not declare on the stump how a judge should decide this case or that. But I earnestly desire to see the time when there shall be competing candidates all over the State. Nothing would tend more to elevate the moral sentiment of the whole people than such a course. Tell me it is degrading for a man who seeks office at the hands of the people to go out amongst the people, and canvass for that office! Sir, he should go and discuss before the people the general principles of jurisprudence, and he will impart more information to the community, as to their rights, their duties, and obligations, than could be imparted by any other means that can be adopted.

Sir, a man who may be very popular in one neighborhood, and who may be very desirous of getting on the supreme bench, may be very objectionable in other portions of the State; and as the judge is to rule over all, he should have the sanction and approbation of all.

If you adopt the provision contained in the section, you go back more than a hundred years. You make your Constitution more anti-republican and more objectionable than the principles that we have met to reform. It is a mockery to tell me that you will elect a man in one district who is to administer laws for the whole State. As well might you elect a Governor by the votes of one district. As well might you elect a Circuit Judge, not by the votes of this circuit, but of the county in which he lives. Who would tolerate the idea? You do not elect a Judge of the Supreme Court for one district, but for the whole State; and he should be elected by the votes of the whole State.

Sir, the object is, and it is an insidious one, to give an opportunity to the Legislature to gerrymander the State, so as to put upon the supreme bench men of one particular class, to control the feelings of the whole State. Let the whole people of the State come up, en masse, and let them choose their judges, as they choose their Governor, by the votes of the whole people. I ask that the section be re-committed, with the instructions that I have offered.

Mr. KELSO. When I rose, at first, I did not know that the gentleman from Tippecanoe intended to make any remarks. It was my purpose to propose a slight amendment to his instructions, and then to vote with him. But his argument has convinced me that he is wrong. I shall therefore move my amendment separately, and shall be compelled to go against the gentleman's proposition. Now I undertake to say that if a judge of the Supreme Court is elected for the whole State, every representative in the General Assembly is just as much elected for the whole State. The judges of that court assemble and consult upon the cases submitted to them, from whatever part of the State those cases may come.

Mr. PETTIT. They will do precisely what the members of the Legislature do; but they will decide sectionally.

Mr. KELSO. Sir, there is no reason to suppose that, unless you pre-suppose them to be a pack of infernal scoundrels, which I am not prepared to do at present. I hope, sir, that the judges will be elected by districts, and I hope there will be five judges of the Supreme Court, although I do not know yet whether the Convention will decide upon that number. When the judges meet to interchange opinions in regard to decisions made in different portions of the State, I maintain that those who live out of the district where such case arose, and such decision was given, will be more disinterested, and consequently better qualified to decide upon the case, and to determine whether error has been committed in the decision or not. Now, members of the Legislature are elected in different counties, and no one votes at the election but those who reside within the limits of the county; but when they get here, the representative of Scott or Jackson county may cast a vote that will impose upon the people of Tippecanoe county a law that they abominate. His action applies to the interest of the whole State. Just so will it be with the judges of the Supreme Court. Their action will be for the whole State; but let each district elect a judge, and they will be elected by men who are better acquainted with the qualifications of the candidate than could be the case if he were elected by the voters of the whole State; if we pursue this course, we shall be certain to have the Supreme Bench filled with politician, instead of sound lawyers.

Again, the gentleman says he hopes to see the time when candidates for the Supreme bench will go out before the people and discuss before them—what? He says, not how this case or that case shall be decided! What will they discuss?

Mr. PETTIT. The general principles of jurisprudence.

Mr. KELSO. Well, what in thunder do the people know about the principles of jurisprudence? What do they care about them? After he has preached about Coke on Lyttleton, and Blackstone, and Swift, and Story, and Kent, the people will go off grinning, and saying they did not know what the man meant—they could not understand one-half he said, and finally come to the conclusion that the man was a fool or crazy.

In all law suits you form an idea which is the right side, and when you have heard the evidence and arguments you are either convinced that you were right or find out that you are wrong. If you feel that you are right you appeal to the Supreme Court. Then you care nothing about the general principles of jurisprudence. You want to elect a man whose reputation stands high in the county or circuit where he lives, as a lawyer. You do not expect to elect either a doctor or a farmer. You do not expect the candidate to go out on the stump and deliver lectures on law. No good can grow out of such a practice. The people do not want to hear such lectures—they will not listen to them. Let the judges, then, be elected in their districts where their reputation and standing are known—where men can be elected in whom the people have confidence—men whom the people can trust. There is no reason that I have heard yet—though I admit the argument of the gentleman is an ingenious one for the wrong side of the question—there is no reason why the whole people of Indiana should be disturbed upon the occasion of filling a vacancy arising from the death or resignation of a member of the Supreme Court. Shall the whole State be convulsed with the election of a judge to serve out the balance of the term? Shall the candidate be compelled to traverse the State to make the people acquainted with him for the balance of a term, perhaps two years? There is no reason for it. The proposition that came from the committee is a correct one. It was destroyed yesterday by the gentleman from Hendricks. I hope it will be restored. We certainly should so arrange the matter that we may get lawyers for Supreme Judges instead of mere politicians.

Mr. NILES. I would not rise to make another remark upon this subject, but for the allusion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, which was evidently intended for me. It is true I did contend on yesterday, that the judges of the Supreme Court should be elected in the several judicial districts. My object was to remove the judiciary as far as possible, from the corrupting influence of party politics. I believed then, and still believe that that would be best done by giving the election of judges to the men who would know them. Why not permit the voters in the Pocket, to elect the judge who is required to reside there, and the people of the north to elect another instead of permitting men in the north, who know nothing of the candidate in the Pocket, and who must act blindly, under the influence of party leaders, to overrule the judgment of the men who know the candidate? The plan of election by single districts, will be better for all purposes except those of a mere political and partisan character. If you desire to make the Supreme Court a political machine, then the gentleman from Tippecanoe proposes the true plan, and he will accomplish his object. He says that the judges are officers of the whole State, and therefore, should be elected by the State at large. So the members of the Legislature are legislators for the whole State, but you elect them in the smallest practicable districts, and even in that case the single district plan is the true one. When the gentleman admitted that the judges should reside in the several districts, he yielded his whole ground.

But the gentlemen uttered one sentiment against which I enter my earnest protest—that we should have a stumping judiciary. It is an old fashioned idea that your judges should be calm, dispassionate, impartial men—that your judicial tribunals should be as passionless as the marble monument of justice itself, and hold the scales with even hand. Does he spurn these notions of our fathers as hostile to the spirit of the age? Would he have your judges to stump the State and mingle in the vile strife of party politics—to pledge their opinions in advance, on grave, judicial questions, in order to secure the votes of an excited popular assembly? Would he drag the judicial robes through dirty gutters, and defile the ermine with the slime and filth of party politics? God forbid that this Convention or the people should ever sanction such a sentiment. Let politicians stump it through the State, and secure votes by popular harangues, but let your judges be selected for their independence, their learning, and integrity. I trust this Convention will not descend so low as to sacrifice to party the independence of the judiciary and the highest interests of the people. Party feeling may always exist. I have no wish to compel the people to subside into cold indifference upon political questions. Of that there is no danger. But I do protest with all the earnestness of which I am capable, against the scheme of the gentleman, as tending towards the condition of things which he seems to desire.

Mr. BORDEN. I rise merely for the purpose of correcting the gentleman as to the mode of creating the Courts of Appeals in the State of New York. Four out of eight of the judges are elected by the State at large, and I believe that no one has ever considered that those who are elected by districts are, as a general thing, to be compared in point of ability and fitness for the station, with those who are elected by the people at large. Yesterday, I was about to suggest a plan by which we might elect our judges in a mode similar to that pursued in New York. But since the question has come up in regard to the election of the judges for the Supreme Bench, exclusively, it seems to me they should be elected by the people of the whole State. Is there not great danger, if they are elected by the districts, that they will degenerate into mere local offices? Should not a judge of the Supreme Court have a reputation as wide as the State itself. It is only by having them elected by the whole State, that you will have suitable men placed upon the bench of your Supreme Court. I had designed to make a few remarks in reference to this question; but I have taken a severe cold, and it is with difficulty that I can articulate; but it is an important matter, and I shall take an early occasion to express my views in regard to it. I trust, in the mean time, that we shall hear the opinions of gentlemen fully expressed.

Mr. DOBSON. Understanding that this vote was to be taken, I came here, although scarcely able in consequence of the state of my health, to do so. I was astonished when I heard of the vote that was given yesterday. It is, as I consider, a departure from those principles which should govern us, and I am satisfied that the decision of the Convention, in regard to this matter, will be changed when gentlemen take time to reflect upon it.

The gentleman from Switzerland is frequently correct, though sometimes wrong. He seems to be wrong on this occasion. Now, in regard to the election of representatives, the example that he puts is not fair. I ask the gentlemen if one county sends two or three representatives, whether they are not elected by the whole county? Although commissioners are elected in different districts of the county, the whole county votes for them. Mr. President, I hold that no man shall exercise powers for me, without my having an opportunity to vote for conferring those powers upon him. When a man wants power, he shall take off his hat and ask for it. I am satisfied the Convention, when it comes to the final vote, will rectify the mistake they have made.

Again, the gentleman denounces the idea of making pledges all over the State. I ask how many people there will be in favor of the retail system. They will be just as likely to make pledges upon one plan as the other, in one only to a district, in the other to the people of the whole State. They wish to have it on the quarter horse principle. I want a four-mile heat. The man who is not able to come it all over the State, should not decide cases all over the State.

The gentleman from Allen says, that the candidate should have a reputation as broad as the State, and that he who has not, should not have a seat on the Supreme Bench. I agree with him, and it was expressly for the purpose of giving a vote upon this question that I come here to-day. I hope the vote of yesterday will be reversed. Where county commissioners are elected, they are elected by the whole county, and I hope we shall not make an exception with regard to Supreme Judges.

Mr. WOLFE. I desire merely to give a reason for the vote I gave yesterday. Gentlemen seem to suppose that we are going to do a great deal of harm. I can see no difficulty that can possibly arise. But I voted against the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe yesterday because it fixed the number of judges at five. The number is now left an open question, as I desire it should be. And I know that my friends around me were actuated by the same motive in the vote they gave yesterday.

Mr. MOORE demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question being on the motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe to re-commit the section with instructions,

The yeas and nays were demanded and they were ordered, and being taken they were—yeas 66, nays 57:

YEAS.—Messrs. Baseom, Borden, Bracken, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliot, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbelt, Helm, Hendricks, Hovey, Johnson, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, March Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Owen, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tannehill, Trimby, Wallace, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Gregg, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, May, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Sims, Steele, Spann, Stevenson, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Watts, and Yocum—57.

So the section was re-committed.

Mr. NAVE moved to re-commit the section with instructions to amend by striking out so much as gives the Legislature power to confer on the Supreme Court original jurisdiction.

Mr. NAVE. My object is to strip the Supreme Court of all original jurisdiction. That court has as much business before it as it can dispose of without taking original jurisdiction. It has been complained of before the Convention, that that court is unable to get through with business that is properly before them. It is wholly unnecessary, therefore, to confer upon it original jurisdiction. Yesterday this matter escaped my notice. I hope that the proposition I have offered will be adopted, and that the court will be confined in its action to cases of appeal upon writs of error.

Mr. PETTIT. There was some difference of opinion in the Convention in reference to this latter clause of the section. The gentleman from Hendricks opposed it. But the majority of the Convention were of a different opinion. I believe that it can do no possible injury. The gentleman moved to strike out only these words: "And such jurisdiction as the Legislature may confer upon it." It has no original jurisdiction now, but the Legislature may find it necessary hereafter to confer original jurisdiction in some cases, as where authority is given to save the State. Or it may be necessary to give it original jurisdiction in some particular locality. They are not compelled to do so, but it may be done if it should be found to be necessary. In my opinion, the section is right as it stands. I think it ought not to be re-committed.

Mr. BIDDLE. I conceive the amendment of the gentleman from Hendricks to be a very important one, and I am sorry to differ with the chairman of the committee on this point. He is aware, however, of the opinion I entertain upon the subject, as I am a member of the committee, and as my views were expressed in the committee room. There are two points in a judicial system that I regard as being so important, that they should remain inviolate forever. This is one. The moment you give the Supreme Court original jurisdiction, you make it in no wise superior to the circuit courts. I do not mean to say that the Supreme Judges are not superior to the circuit judges. On an average they are; but you have to take average men to fill the Supreme Bench. The Almighty does not send men for particular purposes, greatly superior to all other men. No human government can stand long unless it can be worked by men of average ability. True, we have occasionally very great men; but in the life time of a State we cannot expect to always have them. We must so organize our government that common men, of common ability, can carry it on in all its departments. The true cause of the superiority of the Supreme Court, I believe to be in the organization of the system, not in the ability of the judges.

I trust the amendment will prevail. We should keep the Supreme Court for a court of errors, and for no other purpose. There is no system that will work well except upon this basis.

Now, I undertake to say that the Supreme Court of Indiana presents a better record than any other court of its age in the United States.

Mr. PETTIT. It has original jurisdiction.

Mr. BIDDLE. It has never exercised original jurisdiction to any considerable extent.

Mr. PETTIT. It does, and always has.

Mr. BIDDLE. I attribute this superiority to its organization. That court does not consist of judges, whose equals, as respectable as they certainly are, could not have been found in any period of the State. Let any Supreme Judge undertake to hold a circuit court for several consecutive months, and be called upon to decide unpremeditatedly point after point, as fast as learned and ingenious lawyers can raise them, and you will then have an opportunity to test their capability. I have a great respect for that court, and so long as you keep it organized as it is at present, it will be greatly superior to the Circuit Courts. Young as the State is, there are but two States in the Union that have presented a record of superior judicial decisions. Let us then keep this court free from all disturbing causes. Let us give them time to mature their decisions carefully. It is upon this court that the Circuit Courts must rely for their decisions. If you compel the Circuit Judge to make rules as points may arise when a trial is in progress, with a jury in the box, with council contending before him, and often surrounded with all the disturbing causes that agitate men, you will introduce confusion. Give to the Supreme Court original jurisdiction to try questions of fact, and they will be placed in the same condition with the Circuit Court, and there will be no superiority. The judges are generally able men, but you cannot hope that this will always be the case. Their superiority over all of the courts west of the Alleghenies is attributable to the constitution of the court. Give them no original jurisdiction; give original jurisdiction to the Circuit Courts. Let us keep the superior court exclusively a court of error.

This is one of my fundamental ideas with regard to a judicial system. The other idea is that the Supreme Court should never be made itinerant. This applies to courts à nisi prius, but it should not apply to a court which gives the law to all the others. I do assure gentlemen that if they give to the Judges of the Supreme Court original jurisdiction and drag them all over the State, they will be but little if at all superior to the average of Circuit Judges. Keep away all collisions from your Supreme Courts. I hope the Convention will not impair this fundamental rule.

Mr. HOWE. A majority of the Committee were in favor of the section as it now stands. It is true the Supreme Court ought to have what is called original jurisdiction in some cases, in order to secure perfect justice, to parties litigant. I will put one case, that is the case of mandamus. Every lawyer knows that cases are occurring every day where the order of a judge is required to be issued. It is sufficient to suggest one or two necessities. I think, therefore, it is best to let the section remain as it is.

Mr. BIDDLE. I would simply ask the gentleman whether the granting a writ of mandamus is original jurisdiction? It may possibly be so, but it is inherent in the Supreme Court to compel obedience to its mandates by mandamus, or other process, and you need not specifically grant them this power. The power to fine is an original jurisdiction, but it belongs inherently to all courts. The Circuit Courts are sufficient for all cases where the writ of mandamus may become necessary.

Mr. HOWE. There may be cases of mandamus as original cases.

Mr. NEWMAN. I do hope the Convention will suffer the section to pass. I am satisfied that no injury can arise from it. If gentlemen can point out any danger that is to be apprehended from the operation of this provision I will yield the point. I shall vote for the section, and I do hope the Convention will come to a vote and dispose of the matter at once.

The question was taken on the motion of the gentleman from Hendricks, to re-commit with instructions, and it was decided in the negative.

The section was then passed and referred to the committee on revision.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY,

The question being on the final passage of the fourth section of report 29.

Mr. BASCOM moved to suspend the rule requiring the yeas and nays to be taken on the final passage of a section.

The motion was agreed to, and the section was read a third time and passed.

The question was then taken on the final passage of sections nine and twelve, and the rule requiring the yeas and nays being suspended,

The sections were passed.

REPORT OF DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is section thirteen, on its third reading.

The section was read as follows:

"No judge shall be allowed to report the decisions of the Supreme Court."

Mr. BORDEN. It is a well known fact that much inconvenience is frequently experienced by delay in the publication of these decisions. I move therefore to re-commit the section with the following instructions:

"The General Assembly shall provide by law for the speedy publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court."

My object is to remedy this defect. We all have felt the difficulty in not having these decisions furnished in proper time.

Mr. PETTIT. It seems to me that we can easily consent to the amendment without the necessity of referring it to the committee. The proposition is right enough, and I presume no member of the Convention will object to it. It can be adopted by unanimous consent without the necessity of a reference.

The amendment was agreed to by unanimous consent.

The section, as amended, was then read as follows:

"The General Assembly shall provide by law for the speedy publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court; but no judge shall be allowed to report the decisions of the Supreme Court."

The rule requiring the yeas and nays being suspended,

The section, as amended, was passed.

COUNTY COURTS.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up from the table an additional section which I offered on yesterday in relation to County Courts.

The motion to take up the section was agreed to.

The section was read as follows:

"There shall be in each county, a county court to be composed of one judge who shall have original jurisdiction in cases of probate, and such other jurisdiction as may be conferred by law, whose salary shall be $500 per annum, to be paid out of the county treasury together with such fees as may be prescribed by law."

Mr. HOWE. It must be obvious to the Convention that we must either have a county court system or an extension of the circuit system. So far as my action in regard to this matter is concerned, the course which I have laid down for myself is this: If we can have a respectable county court, which shall have probate jurisdiction, and certain other civil jurisdiction—say to the amount of three, four, or five hundred dollars—and also criminal jurisdiction, in small offenses, and if you give such judge a sufficient salary, and provide for it in the Constitution, I will go for the county court system, and let the circuit courts remain as they are. But unless we set forth in the Constitution what the salary shall be—and I would not go for less than five hundred dollars, and such fees as may be prescribed by law—then I shall go against it; for unless you make it a respectable court, and give the judge a competent salary, you will have nothing more nor less than the present probate system. Gentlemen may say "Leave this matter to the Legislature." Sir, I cannot agree to that. I contend that experience in this, as in other matters, is worth a thousand abstractions; and experience has shown, in the most ample manner, that there is no dependence, whatever, to be placed in the Legislature in regard to sustaining judicial dignity. I am for putting this matter entirely beyond the power of the demagogues in the Legislature—and let me say, when I use that word, that I mean no disrespect to the General Assembly, but we all know that men of that character are too apt to obtain seats there, and to seek their own popularity and aggrandizement are dearer to them than the best interests of the people. I would, then, go for the county court system, giving to each judge a fixed salary of $500, with such fees as would make the situation worth about $800; and with a such salary, I have no doubt, whatever, that you could obtain the services of competent men. Without it, you certainly will not.

Mr. THORNTON. The gentleman from Lagrange and myself have the same object in view. The only difference between us is, that I do not wish to prescribe what the salaries shall be, because the services will be so dissimilar in the different counties, that I doubt whether any general provision can be prescribed by us. In such a county as Floyd, a judge would have business enough to make the office worth at least a thousand dollars a year, while in other counties it might not be worth one fifth of that sum. I insist upon it, therefore, that it would be establishing a disproportionate rule to say that the man who is performing services every day in the year, shall receive no more pay for those services than the man who is occupied only some three or four months in the year. I desire that we should leave something for the Legislature to do. I do not, so far as I am concerned, wish to see it indicated on our part that we have all the wisdom of the State of Indiana, as well now as for all time to come. I would, therefore, have the salaries of the judges fixed at a rate proportionate to the services to be rendered; and it strikes me, therefore, as we agree in the main, that the question of salary should be left to the Legislature and to the people, to be determined upon hereafter, and to be adapted to the duties to be performed. In the first place, I assume, without fear of contradiction, that we must have such a tribunal as the one here suggested, and, whatever may be the salary of the judge, if the business is sufficient the situation will become respectable. Throw into that court the probate business, and give to it civil jurisdiction in all cases not exceeding $500, and criminal jurisdiction in all cases that would be above that of the justices of the peace, and below that of the circuit court, and you would have a court that would be most of the year employed, at least in the more populous counties of the State, and, although it may not, in the first instance, call men of high legal qualifications to the bench, it will eventually do so. The proposition which I offer as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Lagrange, is this:

There shall be created and established in each county in the State, a court of record, to be styled "The County Court," to be composed of a single judge, to be elected by the qualified voters of the counties respectively, to serve four years, and until his successor be elected and qualified; who shall have jurisdiction of all probate matters, together with such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law.

The county court shall be always open for the transaction of business therein, and shall sit at such time and place as may be directed by law.

The judge of the county court shall be his own clerk, but may be authorized, at his own expense, to employ a person to act as his clerk, for the performance of clerical duties merely; said judge, except in such cases as may be specified by law, shall not receive fees for his services by way of compensation therefor, but the same shall be taxed by him and, collected by the proper officer, and paid into the county treasury.

The judges of the county courts shall receive such compensation for their services as shall be prescribed by law to be paid out of the county treasury.

The plan which I have had the honor to submit, contains a provision which contemplates keeping the proposed court always open, so the the greatest facilities may be afforded to persons having business to transact therein, to make their applications for the purpose, and more especially to such as may wish to procure letters of administration, writs of habeas corpus, ne exeat, &c. As regards the salary or compensation of the judge of this court, I admit it is difficult to devise a suitable plan. I feel confident, however, that the plan proposed by my friend from Lagrange will not answer the purpose. No general mode of compensation is practicable. The only way, it seems to me, is to leave the matter to be settled by the tribunal doing business for the counties, to adjust and fix the amount of compensation the judge is to receive.

Mr. COOKERLY. It will not do.

Mr. THORNTON. Well, I am aware that at the first blush such a plan is obnoxious to every plausible objections, but what are we to do? I take it that we must provide for such a convenient, and as I may term it, domestic tribunal as the one proposed. I conscientiously believe it is eminently demanded by the wants and wishes of our people. If we fail to provide such a one here, the public voice will call so loudly for it that the Legislature will have to make provision and the result will be that we will be remitted back to the old wretched probate system, which we have so unanimously agreed to repudiate.

I therefore move the proposition I have read as a substitute for the one submitted by the gentleman from Lagrange. I wish to present the question to the Convention whether or no the members are disposed to favor the plan of a county court.

Mr. KENT. I am in favor of the County Court system, with one judge; but I am also in favor of leaving it entirely with the Legislature to prescribe the duties of such courts. It is quite evident, Mr. President, that there is a great variety of sentiment in this Convention with regard to this question; and if we undertake to settle all the details of this matter here, it will necessarily prolong the session one or two weeks.

Now, with regard to the expense of these judges, I am inclined to the belief that the expense incurred by the counties of this State for the present probate system, associate judges, and the large sums paid sheriffs and a host of appointed officers, under the present onerous mode of doing county business, will more than meet the expense of the establishment of the County Court system. By the report of the Auditor of State, I find that in nineteen counties, the expense of the present system is twenty-nine thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars and forty-five cents. I am inclined to the belief that, in these nineteen counties, we can save not less than $17,000, to be appropriated to the expense of keeping up these County Courts. I will take, for example, the county of Allen. There the expenses are $2,577 62. Now deduct the amount paid to the probate judge, which is $40; the amount paid the associate judges, which is $237; and one-third of the amount paid to grand and petit jurors, bailiffs, &c., and you have the enormous sum of $1,577, which might go to the payment of a judge of a County Court. If gentlemen will look at the report, they will find that they pay $1,046 for bailiffs alone; petit jurors, $875; Grand Jurors, $216; making a total sum of over $2,100 in round numbers. Now, sir, if it be in order, and no gentleman desires to discuss the subject, I will move its indefinite postponement, so that the matter may be left to the Legislature. [Cries of "No! no! no!"]

Mr. KELSO. I am pretty sure, Mr. President, of one—

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. KENT. I will withdraw the motion if the gentleman from Switzerland wishes to speak.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to indefinitely postpone is withdrawn.

Mr. KELSO. I am pretty sure, Mr. President, of one of two things—either that this proposition is radically wrong, or that the manner in which it has been got up is wrong. I confess I do not understand the remarks of my friend from Floyd (Mr. Kent); for I would like to know if his proposition is not only to dispense with Grand Juries, but also with petit juries, and with sheriffs, and bailiffs, and other county officers?

Mr. KENT (interposing). No, sir; I divide the expense, and cut off a large portion of the expense of these officers.

Mr. KELSO. I believe that, so far as a sheriff is concerned, his fees are fixed and regulated by law until it comes to such allowances as the court may give him; and I would like to know how the gentleman is going to provide for that. The court makes provision for extra services, and they have a right to do so. But why not at once make the Probate Court a court whose duty it shall be to discharge all matters relative to the probate of wills, and the administration of decedents' estates? We have another court without it; and, supposing it is a good one, I ask, why commence a County Court in the manner proposed?

Now, in reference to the remark of the gentleman from Floyd, I am not for hurrying over the little matter that remains, nor am I for passing over that which legitimately belongs to this body, and handing it over to another body.

Sir, we have had a probate system since 1829, and the great difficulty of that system is—for the law is good enough—that you do not pay money enough to secure the services of a man on that bench competent to decide what ought to be decided. Now, if we leave this matter to the Legislature, what guarantee have we that they will not fix it as they have allowed it to remain ever since 1829—the most deplorable system of any State in the universe, except Illinois, where the justices and the administrator invariably use up the estate? Sir, the fault is, that we do not pay money enough for services of this kind to secure competent men to perform them. I hold that, whatever court takes charge of this probate business, you ought to give the judge a competent salary, in order that you may secure the services of a man learned in the law; for if we leave it to the Legislature we have no sort of guarantee that they will ever make it one whit better than it is at present; and it is known that the proceedings which are had in these Probate

Courts are among the most fruitful sources of litigation. And has the Legislature made any effort to check it? No, sir. Thousands of dollars have been spent upon it, and yet in no respect will they change it. In some particular counties they may have changed it, and given a man another dollar a day out of the county treasury; and notwithstanding all the testimony staring us in the face of the iniquities perpetrated in these Probate Courts since 1829, we have continued to labor under this difficult system, which has been a curse to the State from one end of it to the other.

Now, I do not care by what name you call this court. It matters but little about the name; only let it have such jurisdiction as it can exercise in civil, criminal, or probate matters, without conflicting with each other; and let us fix such a salary as will secure the services of a competent man. If we do not do that, why then leave it where it is; and if we leave it where it is, I am satisfied that we should be still better off without any Probate Court at all.

MR. PETTIT. I do not design, Mr. President, to talk upon this subject; but I will take the liberty of saying that I had, for the consideration of this Convention, drawn up a full plan for the organization of County Courts, but it did not meet with the approbation of a majority of the committee, and I did not see fit to make a minority report upon the subject.

There is one feature, sir, in the proposition of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) to which I cannot agree, and that is, making a judge his own clerk. It is not compatible with the dignity of a judge that he should enter up his own records. After sitting all day, listening to the ding-dong of lawyers, the testimony of witnesses, and the verdicts of juries, is he fit to sit up all night and make his own records? Certainly not. Besides, it would be eternally charged that he gave judgments in this way, or in that, in order to save his fees; and no man filling such a station ought to be placed in such a position as to be liable to such a charge.

Neither am I prepared to say, Mr. President, that we should fix the salary at five hundred dollars in all the counties of the State. In some counties the services would be worth twice that sum, and in others they would be worth very little. I had a plan by which I provided that there should be a county court; that that court should have appellate jurisdiction from the decisions of justices of the peace in all cases; that there should be a provision that he should be paid no salary, but that in all cases of appeal from the decisions of justices of the peace, the parties appealing should deposit with the clerk one, two, or three dollars—whatever the Legislature might determine upon—as the judge's fee for trying that case; that he should be at liberty at any time to take that fee out of the hands of the clerk, and that whoever lost the cause should pay that fee among his other costs.

In that case the judge would not be the least interested. His fee is deposited and paid beforehand. I calculated that this court might have limited civil and criminal jurisdiction; in the latter, so far as regards those cases which would not involve a fine of over fifty dollars, or imprisonment for three months, and in the former to such cases as do not exceed the sum of five hundred dollars; and that in these civil cases the plaintiff should deposit a fee of two, three, or four dollars, as the Legislature might determine, and that the judge should take that fee and tax it up against the losing party. He would thus have no interest on either side of the cause at all.

So in criminal cases: that in all cases of conviction the county should collect a fee of four dollars from the convicted party, and that he should receive two dollars out of the county treasury for every case which he examined; so that under this plan you see there would be no salary to be paid at all.

I said further, that into the hands of this court there should be given all matters of probate; and without attaching any salary at all, you might say that the judge should be entitled to one per cent. upon all the invoices settled in the court. If you make this allowance upon the invoices, he has then no interest in making the estate large or small. In this manner each county might pay to a judge a very respectable salary without taxing either the treasury of the State or that of the county. But if the propositions to amend now pending are voted down, I will offer an amendment as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, which will leave the Legislature to carry out all these details, leaving them also to fix the jurisdiction between the justices of the peace and the circuit courts. The section which I will offer will be this:

"There shall be a county court in each county of this State, composed of one judge, who shall be elected by the electors of his county, who shall hold his office four years, and whose jurisdiction and duties shall be fixed by law."

Now that will leave it to the Legislature to say how the man shall be paid, and what his duty shall be; and I think the main object both of the gentleman from Floyd and the gentleman from Lagrange will be answered by a section of this sort.

I will offer this as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, provided the amendment of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton) should be voted down.

MR. THORNTON. I believe that myself and my friend from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) agree pretty well as to the necessity of creating a court of this character. I must, however, correct him in a conclusion at which he seems to arrive, which is by no means warranted by my proposition. He takes the same ground that I do. No man feels more repugnance than I do to the idea of a judge being his own clerk, and taxing his own fees, and taking them himself. I fully approve of the proposition of my friend from Tippecanoe, and I have risen for the purpose of accepting his proposition. All I wish is for the Convention to determine that the people shall have such courts. I do not wish the proposition to be trammelled by questions of salary or anything else. I withdraw my proposition, and accept the one proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

Mr. HOWE. I entirely concur with the gentlemen from Tippecanoe and Floyd, as to the necessity of having a county court; but the gentleman from Tippecanoe is for leaving everything in relation to the compensation of the judges to the Legislature. Now do we not all know that the power of establishing these very courts has existed for the last thirty-four years, and that yet the Legislature has never established them, notwithstanding the notorious fact of the insufficiency of the probate system. That fact is enough for me; and I regard it as our duty, while we are about it, to establish a wholesome judicial system, which will be applicable to the wants of the people of the State, and be beyond the reach of the fluctuating legislation of the General Assembly. I say that this is a practical question, that it results in this: "Shall we have a respectable county court with probate jurisdiction, or not?" If we leave the question open, what reason have we to suppose that the Legislature will fix a competent salary to that office? We have no reason to suppose anything of the kind from past experience. It is therefore obvious that we ourselves ought to fix that salary so as to insure the services of a competent man; for if there be anything in a court which needs examination, it is those questions which relate to the disposal of our estates; and unless we have a proper salary fixed for these officers, we shall still have a contemptible court. And, Mr. President, unless I can carry this proposition, or something like it, I shall fall back upon the proposition of the gentleman over the way (Mr. Holman) as the next best proposition that has been made. There is no doubt that the county court system will be the most expensive system; but, sir, the question of expense is not the most important one involved here. The question is, which is the best system? and believing the county court system to be the best, I shall support it with this proviso, that we make provision for the payment of suitable salaries to the judges of these courts so as to secure the services of efficient men.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. It is with great reluctance, Mr. President, that I rise to say a single word upon this subject. I am quite aware that the gentlemen of the bar are supposed to know much more about these legal questions than we do, and that they may be regarded as better judges of what will be most conducive to the interests of the people than we can be. But let me refer for a moment to one argument which is made use of here, and on which gentlemen appear to place great reliance. They propose to elect judges in each county, and they go upon the supposition that if they give a high salary they will of necessity obtain men of high legal attainments. But, sir, I very much question the truth of the conclusion. It by no means follows that if these judges are to be elected by the people, you will secure men of acknowledged legal ability, merely because you offer a high salary.

Mr. KELSO (interposing). I suppose the gentleman from Ripley will admit that the people of the several counties have good common sense.

Mr. SMITH (resuming). Yes, sir, they have good common sense I know; and I believe that nine times out of ten they will elect a good common sense man.

Mr. President, in the committee, I differed with gentlemen in regard to the county system, and also in regard to the election of a single judge, and conferring upon him civil, criminal, and probate jurisdiction, for the reason that I see in it an evil—this evil, Mr. President, that we will have a court in perpetual session. It will be a mere pettifogging court, taking the place of the justices of the peace all over the country, in cases in which they are equally well qualified to decide. My idea is that the report made by the committee with one or two slight modifications, is the correct ground for us to act upon.

But, sir, if we go into this judicial system, it will detain us here for two more weeks at least. I am certainly opposed to this plan of carving out twenty-four circuits. I think, too, with regard to salaries, that they should be left to the Legislature. I have nothing farther to say except that I wish it to be understood that this is my opinion on the subject.

Mr. NEWMAN. Originally before the committee, I was in favor of our judicial system being confined to a Supreme Court, to circuit and county courts, and such others as might be provided for by law. The committee were not harmonious on that subject. Although I assented to the report, I much doubt whether we shall be able to harmonize any better in the Convention than gentlemen did in the committee. I would have preferred, however, to have had the designation of a county court, leaving it to legislative action to confer probate jurisdiction upon it if they should think proper to do so. They have a right under the first section of the article to create a county court. If we had made it a mere county court, it would be a question whether other jurisdictions could have been conferred upon it. But when we proceed to define what that county court may do, and what it may not do, it seems to me that we are descending below what should be a mere constitutional provision. And further, if we undertake to say what the salaries of these judges shall be, we shall be doing that which was not confided to us by the people to do.

We have been told here by gentlemen, that we have lived for the last thirty years under the present probate system without the Legislature having improved the condition of things. Now, I admit that this is true, but at the same, if the country is represented in your General Assembly, and they are not disposed to improve the system, are we not bound to submit to it? Sir, we are bound to take the world as we find it, and if we do not find it as enlightened as we could wish, we are bound to make the best of it we can. It is one of the incidents of society that we cannot agree in our views of these things, and I am willing to confide to society as it is in its present enlightenment, the duty of fixing a proper court, giving to it proper jurisdiction, and determining what compensation shall be awarded for the services to be performed.

With these remarks, I leave the question with the Convention, and for the purpose of testing the sentiments of this body on the subject, I will move that the whole matter be indefinitely postponed. [Loud cries of "no, no, no."] Very well then, if gentlemen wish to discuss the matter still further, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would not occupy another moment of the time of this Convention, did I not feel a very decided anxiety that the result of our deliberations upon this subject should prove beneficial to the country. Mr. President, there are four plans before this Convention. The first is the report of the committee on the organization of Courts of Justice. The report which that committee has presented to the Convention leaves entirely untouched and unnoticed the mode of transacting probate business.

The second plan is that proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit)—proposing simply the organization of County Courts, and nothing more.

The third plan is that proposed by the gentleman from Lagrange, (Mr. Howe,) who proposes in the first place, that there shall be County Courts, and in the second place, that each of the judges of these courts shall have a salary of at least five hundred dollars per annum, with such fees in addition, as may be prescribed by law, &c.

The fourth plan is that submitted by myself, to increase the Circuits from twenty, as proposed by the committee, to twenty-four, and to place the Circuit and Probate Courts on the same footing.

Sir, it has not been asserted by any gentleman upon this floor, that our probate system is not defective; but on the contrary, almost every gentleman who has spoken upon the subject has added his testimony to the fact, already so notorious, that the mode of transacting probate business is a disgrace to the statute books of Indiana, ["consent, consent,"] although, as in my own county, there are many excellent men on the Probate Bench.

Now the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe is nothing more than the plan under which we have been living for the last twenty-one years. Let me inquire of that gentleman, for whose judgment in all matters pertaining to law and its administration I have the highest respect—where is the difference between calling the system a County Court or a Probate Court, provided the organization is the same and the evils are unremedied? I undertake to say, and the experience of the last thirty-four years prove it beyond all question, that if you say there shall be a County Court, you will retain in, and fasten upon the country the same system of transacting probate business which has been so long a just cause of complaint.

If then you adopt the County Court system without incorporating in it the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, securing such a salary to the judges as will command men of competent talents, the board of Commissioners or a cringing Legislature will fix their salaries, and these men will provide a compensation which, while it is onerous to the State, from the number of judges, will be utterly insufficient to secure competent men.

How does it happen, let me ask, that gentlemen are willing to confine the probate business of the country, involving the exposition of wills, the execution of trusts, the settlement of the land titles of the country, together with various other important public duties—how, I say, does it accord with practical wisdom and sound sense to say, as is thus said, in effect, that interests of vital moment, affecting, slowly but surely, the whole property in the State, shall be left to incompetent men, through capricious legislation?

The proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange is manly, to say the least of it. It is a manly, honest proposition; and perhaps the only reason why the Convention will not adopt it will be, that it would necessarily increase the expense of our judicial system. It would increase it at least $45,000, over and above our present expenses. And even were it adopted, what will we have accomplished by it? We have a Supreme Court and Circuit Courts, and in addition to these, it is proposed that we should have County Courts with salaried officers, to whom we are to pay each $500 a year, sufficient to secure respectable talents; and yet at least the same end can be attained by Circuit Courts, the cost of which will be annually at least thirty-four thousand dollars less. But, sir, if you are determined that County Courts shall be organized, you should at least secure to the country competent judges to preside over them, so far as they can be secured by giving them a competent salary. And, sir, let me say to this Convention, that if they intend that this system of Probate Courts or County Courts shall be retained, that is if they do not intend to go any further than that, I would ask them, as a favor to the people, to leave the whole of it out of the Constitution, for I cannot believe that the Legislature of a State containing a million of people can much longer perpetuate a system of this kind.

If, then, we do not adopt the system proposed by the gentleman from Lagrange, and still propose to adopt the County Court system, I do hope, as I have already expressed it, that the whole system will be left out, in order that we may still entertain the expectation that some future Legislature will be willing to do common justice to those who cannot vote with them or legislate with them in the protection of their own interests.

But why—why, let me ask gentlemen, should we consign this probate business to a County Court?—a court of inferior jurisdiction? Why should this be done? Is the business inferior in its character to that which usually comes before your Circuit Courts? Is it of less importance to the parties who are interested? Does it involve less serious results? or are the rights of those whose interests are peculiarly involved in your Probate Courts, of less moment than the rights of other citizens of the State of Indiana, that you must consign them to a court of inferior jurisdiction? [Applause.] Sir, the gentleman from Tippecanoe, in picturing out what the Legislature might do under his plan, proposes to give to men the right to bring their cases before a Circuit Court, where the judge is paid a competent salary out of your State Treasury; and that, if any party is not satisfied with the decision of that court, he may appeal from it, and submit his case to the investigation and decision of the Supreme Court, the judges of which are also paid out of the Treasury of the State. But when you come to try the rights of the widow, bereaved, and downcast, and forlorn, who comes to you with tearful eyes and a throbbing heart, whose soul is sunk within her, and whose affections are buried deep beneath the sod that covers all that is left of him who was the pride and solace of her life—and the rights of the orphan who has now no father, save that Father who is in Heaven—you are not only to put them off with an inferior tribunal, but even to take one per cent. from the little pittance left them by a dying husband and father, in the fond and anxious hope that they might not be compelled to rely upon the miserable charity of a cold and unfeeling world? [Great emotion and applause.] Sir, is this the liberality—is this the generosity of manhood? Is this the mode in which the rights of the widow and the orphan are to be disposed of by this Convention? No, sir, not one man in this body, I will venture to assert, save and except the gentleman from Tippecanoe alone, will ever be found so regardless of the rights of the bereaved, as to put his name to any Constitution containing such a provision as that. [Renewed applause.]

But, sir, the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Kent) proposes to leave this matter entirely out of the Constitution. It was very appropriately said by a gentleman on this floor on one occasion, that “we should look to the rock from whence we were hewn,” [a voice—“carry out the quotation—and the hole of the pit from whence we were dug,”] and if we look to that rock, if there be one thing more than another that is desired of this Convention by the people, it is a reform in the manner of doing this business; and yet you are proposing not only to extend your Supreme Court, and to retain your Circuit system as hitherto, increasing the number of circuits and the salaries of the judges, while the only real and radical evil you are willing to leave untouched. “Leave it to the Legislature” you say! Sir, look back upon the last thirty-four years and see what the Legislature has done!

In 1825 this business was consigned to the associate judges; but, sir, it was considered an outrage upon the people because they were allowed four dollars per day while they were attending to this business. In 1829 that plan was abandoned; and for what reason? Because it was supposed that some very clever man in each county could be obtained who would perform the business at an expense of three dollars a day; and while they increased the salaries of the Supreme Court Judges to fifteen hundred dollars a year, and that of the Circuit Judges to one thousand dollars, they said to the Probate Judges, “You can attend to the duties of your office for seventy-five dollars a year.”

Besides this, sir, every badge of inferiority is imposed upon the Probate Court. Your Probate Judge must go to your Circuit Judge, and ask him for a certificate—a certificate of what? Why, sir, a certificate of his competency to superinend rights which the highest judge in the State cannot be found too competent to protect.

Then, Mr. President, if the county court system must be adopted, I certainly should prefer the plan proposed by the gentleman from Lagrange, because the proposition is manly, at least, though I much question whether the increased benefits will be commensurate with the increased expenses.

Then, sir, let me say again, that were you to increase the number of your Circuit Judges even to thirty, and give them a salary of a thousand dollars a year each, this with your five Supreme Court Judges at twelve hundred dollars a year, would only make the sum of thirty-six thousand dollars. If you adopt the plan of the gentleman from Lagrange, it will cost you sixty-four thousand dollars. With the plan I propose we would have a competent judge in every court.

I am willing to admit, Mr. President, that perhaps no gentleman on this floor has thought more carefully over this subject than the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) for whose experience and discrimination I entertain the highest respect; but if that gentleman believes that the surrogate system will do for our State, I must say that I think he has examined this subject to very little purpose. Why, sir, has that system been virtually abandoned in the State of New York? Why has it been abandoned in other States, so that a Superior Judge, or Chancellor is now the Probate Judge, the Surrogate performing only ministerial duties connected with that office?

One argument that has been used against the Circuit Court system, is, that it might be desirable to obtain injunctions, restraining orders, and writs of habeas corpus when the Judge might be in a neighboring county. Supposing this to be so, I ask gentlemen whether there are not in every county, clerks, whose qualifications would enable them to attend to business of this kind, subject to the revision and control of the Circuit Judges? There are, undoubtedly; and I think there is, therefore, no force in the objection, whatever.

I hope, Mr. President, that gentlemen will desire that a direct vote may be taken upon this County Court system, and that they will bear in mind that there are but two plans of County Courts—the one virtually retaining the Probate Courts as they now stand, and the other providing for a salary to be paid to the judges, of five hundred dollars per year—these are the two systems. If you go for the proposition of the gentleman from Lagrange, you will increase the expense of your judiciary to at least sixty-four thousand dollars a year; and if you support the plan of the gentleman from Tippecanoe you will perpetuate the present probate system with all its manifold evils.

Then, on the other hand, if you decline both of these plans, I ask you whether the interests of the community would not be most effectually subserved by increasing the number of circuits as proposed, transferring to them in a separate and distinct court, the supervision of the probate business? I doubt, sir, very much whether, even by the great increase of judges proposed by the advocates of this county system, you can improve the proper administration of justice. If you have a large number of judges, many of them must necessarily be men of inferior qualifications, for you must pay inferior salaries; whereas, if you have but few, you will have the whole country from which to select them, and the best and most competent men will undoubtedly be selected.

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman from Dearborn is mistaken when he says that the surrogate system has been abandoned in the State of New York. They have a County Judge who is his own clerk, and who keeps his court open all the time, as a surrogate.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Allen will allow me, I will read from the amended Constitution of New York:

"The County Judge shall receive an annual salary, to be fixed by the board of supervisors," &c., and in the report of the Judiciary Committee, the following language is used: "Surrogates shall be elected for four years—they shall be compensated by fixed salaries, and they shall not receive any fees or perquisites of office," and when I have referred to the surrogate system, of course I have meant, as is always understood by that system, a body of judicial officers who are clerks of their own courts, who tax up the fees of their respective offices, and receive those fees as a compensation for their judicial and ministerial services.

Mr. BORDEN. I understand he receives his whole fees out of the county treasury. Now it occurs to me, as I stated yesterday, that you have to do one of the two things—either to increase the number of your circuits, or adopt the County Court system; and it becomes the Convention to decide that question; for you may depend upon it the Legislature never will decide it, and the State will continue to be cursed with this probate system as it now exists.

Mr. KILGORE. If I could suppose that any benefit could result to the people by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, or that we would better our present probate system, I would most cheerfully support that amendment. But, sir, if the section reported by the committee should ultimately pass this body I look upon that amendment as wholly unnecessary. Sir, what is proposed but to organize an inferior court in each county of the State. The section of the new Constitution to which I refer gives the Legislature that power already. The Legislature has power to organize a Supreme Court, or a Circuit Court, or any other inferior courts. They have the power to adopt the present Probate Court as one of the inferior courts contemplated by the section, and to confer upon that court all the jurisdiction which gentlemen insist should be conferred upon a County Court. The Legislature can confer upon the Probate Court jurisdiction in civil cases any moment they may think proper; and not only so, but to whatever extent they may choose. But, sir, will that remedy the inconvenience? Will the fact that they extend to that court additional jurisdiction give us more competent men to preside over it? Will that secure more talent, and integrity, and ability to discharge the duties of that office than we now have upon the Probate Bench? Most certainly not. Not only so, but we place the parties in a very awkward predicament.

We require the administratrix of the deceased husband to come up to your County Courts and to mingle with the worst class of men that can be found in the State—thieves, slanderers, and every other description of bad characters. And, sir, after all will it affect the object intended? I think not.

Some gentlemen have spoken about salaries. There can be no question, sir, whatever, that if you give suitable salaries you will call to the bench talent in proportion. If we are to have these County Courts I should be decidedly in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Lagrange. But I am opposed to both, because I do not believe that with either of them we can attain the end we desire. I would give to the Circuit Judges competent salaries—such salaries as will secure the best legal talent of the State, and in such case I have no hesitancy in saying that I believe the people will have them there. I am unwilling to leave the question of salaries with the Legislature; I should desire it to be fixed by the Convention. We have trusted to the Legislature long enough; and I trust that the Convention will act upon higher and nobler ground than mere pandering to the feelings of this man or that man. I presume that gentlemen have come here prepared to victimize themselves, if need be, so far as public opinion is concerned, for the good of the people.

How is it, sir, with the Legislature? "Economy, economy," is their constant cry—a cry made only for buncombe, it is true; and all efforts to increase salaries meets with universal disapprobation. I am disposed to fix in the fundamental law such salaries as will secure good and efficient men who will give their attention to the duties of their office. I would not leave it to the Legislature at all. But a few years ago we found them whittling down the salary of the Governor of the State making it entirely too low for such a functionary, and then they brought down the salaries of the Circuit Judges to $800 a year. Sir, if you wish these duties to be well performed you must give such compensation as will enable men to give their whole time and attention to the business—not a mere pittance that may possibly be enough to keep soul and body together, but enough to supply at least the ordinary wants of life, and to procure something like a library which is as necessary for the Judge on your Bench, as the jack plane and chisel and mallet and guage are to the carpenter. Now look at your Judges of the County Court as now proposed. He is not necessarily to be a lawyer; he may be a layman; but he must have some knowledge of the law in order to enable him to discharge his duties; and how is he to acquire that without the aid of books? And how will he get his books unless you give him a competent salary? Then let us at once fix for these functionaries a good salary. Let us transfer this probate business to the hands of the Circuit Courts and give them sufficient time for the settlement of all business unconnected with their civil and criminal jurisdiction, and we have nothing to fear.

Sir, although the Legislature have acknowledged the evils of the present system as it has existed for the last twenty years they have not had nerve enough to remedy those evils. I know that a great majority of gentlemen here are anxious to get through with the Constitution. I know that many of them regard the rod of the Legislature as being held over them, lest the Legislature should not make an appropriation for our expenses; but I for one would be willing to stay here without money and without price for ten weeks longer whether the Legislature made any appropriation or not, so that we could have the business done well and in such a manner as will meet with the approbation of the people.

Mr. President, I have stated the reason why I cannot go for the proposition either of the gentleman from Lagrange, or the gentleman from Tippecanoe. If I could go for one, I would go for both; but I cannot go for either.

Mr. THORNTON. The gentleman from Lagrange has offered a proposition giving to the County Judge a salary of not less than $500. I submitted a proposition which I intended as a substitute for that offered by my friend from Tippecanoe, and at his suggestion I withdrew it, and adopted the one which he proposed, and I shall be disposed to assist him in carrying it through.

Now one word in reply to the honorable gentleman from Delaware. I never see that gentleman rise to his feet but I expect to be gratified by what he says; but on this occasion he does not appear to evince his usual sagacity, because he says that under the County Court system the administratrix of an estate will for the time being be necessarily thrown into the society of criminals and the worst class of characters who are usually to be found about courts, forgetting that under the system which he proposes she will be thrown even into worse society—that of the highest criminals—perhaps murderers; at least if not thrown into their society she will have to appear at the court where they are to be tried.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman from Floyd allow me to explain?

Mr. THORNTON. Yes, if the gentleman can explain. [A laugh.]

Mr. KILGORE. I stated that my plan was that the circuit court should hold four or five sessions per annum. That at two of the sessions, at least, they should make up issues, and attend to probate business, not trying any criminals at all, or even civil suits; so that the gentleman's sarcasm does not apply, for he must clearly perceive that in such case there could be no criminals there.

Mr. THORNTON. The argument of the gentleman from Delaware was against the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, of which I am the god-father; but his objection to it was, that it would draw into that court the ladies of the county where felons are to be tried.

Now I want to know how he will account for this—for I am a little fearful that he is looking a little beyond the preservation of the morals or the feelings of the ladies. When I see a gentleman endeavoring to create twenty-nine berths at one time, I must say that I think the gentleman is either trifling with the Convention, or that he is much more of a blockhead than I thought he was.

I say to the Convention, then, that we must adopt some system of the kind proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. I would be glad, if I could do no better, to take a man of good common sense, as a judge of such court; for I do not expect to create an office of that kind, or to affix such a salary to it as will draw upon the bench a man of profound legal attainments. And, sir, permit me to say, that, if gentlemen create such courts as those contemplated by the gentleman from Dearborn, they will not be able to find great men enough in the State to fill the whole of these twenty-nine places. But, sir, let that be as it may, I must say that I cannot endorse such a system. As matters stand now, I am not afraid to meet my constituents, but I certainly should be, if I voted for five Supreme Court judges, and twenty-four circuit judges.

Now the gentleman from Dearborn holds the rod in terrorem, over the Convention, by talking about an additional expense of $45,000, which these county judges are to cost, over and above the amount which it will cost the State, by the plan he proposes. But, sir, by my plan, it will not cost more than $12,000 altogether. His plan will cost at least $34,000 a year. There are to be 24 circuit judges, with sheriffs, bailiffs, and a host of other officers, and I am satisfied that, taking that system fairly into consideration, it will be as expensive as any you can adopt. Let me say, too, that the courts which we propose erecting, will open a fair field of ambition to a certain class of young men, who by their own conduct will create respect for the court.

The gentleman from Dearborn says that we might get restraining orders, writs, and injunctions from the clerk of the circuit court, or a justice of the peace; but, sir, when the writs are issued, we want somebody to try them. We do not want to wait half a year, or a year before we can have trial. Now, although a man who may be elected judge of a county court, may not be very well skilled in law, yet he will become acquainted with business and will soon learn.

Mr. President, I cannot say that I can vote for the system as proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn; I think I would rather fall back upon the old system, odious as it is. If we do not adopt this county court system, the people will create a tribunal to do this probate business. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe will be adopted; but, if the Convention should vote it down, I trust we shall have some other mode provided by the Legislature.

Mr. KILGORE. I was not aware that I had said anything to excite the ire of my friend from Floyd, and I am sorry that he should have come to the conclusion that I am either a knave or a blockhead. If, however, the gentleman has arrived at that conclusion, by the same process of reasoning by which he appears to have arrived at some others, it is not to me a matter of much surprise. I trust, sir, however, that, whatever I may be now, by the time I have practiced law for forty years, like the gentleman from Floyd, I may have learned something, and that I may be able to aspire to something higher than a county court. I did not suppose that the gentleman misunderstood what I said. I merely spoke of the peculiar jurisdiction to be conferred upon a court. Yesterday, in the presence of the same gentleman, I stated what my views were in relation to the proper division of business in that court. The gentleman from Floyd objects to it, and his reason was, that we would want some court to issue writs of habeas corpus, and injunctions, and other processes. I would ask whether we might not confer such power upon the oldest justice of the peace in the county, or upon the county auditor or county clerk, and whether these persons, in nine cases out of ten, would not be more competent to decide such questions as might be brought before them, than the ordinary run of your probate judges. Such justice, auditor, or clerk, might be able to do everything necessary to be done, save the final settlement of estates; and he certainly would be equally as competent to discharge all these duties, as the present probate judges, or the associate judges of your courts. Why, sir, who are these associate judges? You elect men from the county who are not lawyers at all. You take them from the plow, or the anvil, or the carpenter's bench, and make associate judges of them, and they can issue writs of habeas corpus, and try cases. If, then, these men who know nothing of law, can do this, why not confer these powers upon a clerk, and allow him, if necessary, to issue writs of habeas corpus. Everything the gentleman desires upon that subject, can be attended to without the aid of these county courts. I have no feeling of hostility, sir, either to the gentleman who is the god-father of this proposition, or the gentleman who is the parent proper. They may have all the honor of its paternity. I have nothing whatever to do with the bantling. They may take it and raise it, if they are able.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. Howe, and it was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McFarland). The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise simply to say this: that on yesterday, the proposition which I offered, was, at my own instance laid upon the table; and it strikes me, as a matter of business, if the Convention have determined upon rejecting this proposition, it would be some evidence of their intention to do one of two things—either to leave the matter entirely open to the Legislature, or to increase the number of circuits. I ask, therefore, that we may have the yeas and nays on the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. WOLFE. I just want to say that I think our people want some mode of getting into court. The circuit court system, it seems to me, will not suit them. We want such a court as men of common sense, or even women may go into [laughter, and "consent, consent, consent."] and do business. I believe that the proposition of the gentleman from Tippecanoe is the best that has yet been presented, and I shall give it my support.

Mr. KELSO. I cannot but think that, by Monday morning, we shall have a much better plan matured than the one now under consideration; and, in order to give time to think of the matter before we take any decisive action, I move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Pettit, and the yeas and nays being ordered, they were taken, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Biddle, Bryant, Chapman, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Edmonston, Gootee, Hawkins, Kinley, Logan, March, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, Miller of Fulton, Millican, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Pettit, Shoup, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, and Zenor—40.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Barbour, Bascom, Beard, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bracken, Brookbank, Butler, Carter, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Elliott, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Had-don, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson of D., Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Sherrod, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Watts, Wunderlich, and Mr. President—75.

So the amendment was not adopted.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. Howe.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to take from the table section 7, with the pending amendment.

The motion to take up the section was agreed to.

Mr. ——— moved that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention refused to adjourn.

The reading of the section and amendment was called for, and they were read.

On motion,

The Convention then adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. KELSO,

Delivered in Convention, on the subject of Currency and Banking, on Tuesday, January 14th, in reply to Mr. OWEN.

Mr. KELSO. Mr. PRESIDENT: I beg leave to differ with our very learned teacher of democracy.

Mr. OWEN. Not a teacher of democracy, at all.

Mr. KELSO. By no means, Mr. President, not a teacher at all; he only takes upon himself to pronounce boldly and emphatically, what is and used to be Jackson democracy, not forgetting, at the same time, to tell us that it is he who best recollects the democratic doctrine in the days of the hero of New Orleans. Sir, upon that point I will take issue with the gentleman. And I tell him, and I tell this Convention, that there are men in this body who recollect all about the old doctrine of Jackson democracy, as well as the gentleman from Posey ever did, or ever will recollect it; and, sir, I profess to be one of the men. Sir, it was the birth day of my political life. The first vote I ever gave for any civil office, was for General Jackson for President of the United States. I gave that vote, too, in violation of the law, for I gave that vote in November, 1824, and I was not twenty-one years old until the eighteenth day of the next month. From that time, to say the least of it, I studied, learned, and debated the various political subjects of the day, and I now have a recollection much nearer corresponding to the written history of those times, than has been preached or practiced in this Convention, by either the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) or the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read).

When the question is presented, bank or no bank, their General Jackson is quoted as against all banks; and so he wrote. But, upon a test vote, it was, by this Convention, determined that there may be banks in Indiana. No sooner is such a decision announced, than the gentlemen are ready, on the moment, with General Jackson as authority against State Banks.

Now, sir, General Jackson, I presume, was, in reality, opposed to all banks; that he was emphatically a hard money man. But, under existing circumstances, he accommodated his public declarations and course of conduct, in a great measure, to the then tone of public opinion—a great and powerful law, that all public men should treat with becoming respect. He first attacked the United States Bank; and, in 1832, he prostrated that institution, or he gave to it the death blow that did prostrate it. But, before the end of the life of that bank, he removed the public deposits from the vaults of the United States Bank, and caused them to be placed in the vaults of State banks, and other banks; and in his message to the Congress of the United States, upon the subject of such removal, he spoke in high terms of State Banks, and pronounced them much more safe depositories for the public funds than the Bank of the United States was, or ever had been.

But, sir, time taught him his mistake, and he, like an honest man, acknowledged it, although the public funds were deposited in the Bank of the United States, and by the Bank used and banked upon for nineteen years, yet the government never did lose one dollar by that Bank. General Jackson commanned their removal—the mandate was obeyed, and in less than two short years, one million and a half of dollars was wholly lost by the operations of what was then familiarly called, the pet bank system.

From that day, General Jackson declared against all banks, and spoke of them as a set of heartless, soulless, swindling corporations, unfit to exist, and not safe to be trusted. He, sir, made no distinction; his opposition was to all banks, and I now challenge gentlemen to show us the denunciations of General Jackson against State Banks, separate and apart from other banks.

General Jackson, in the most unqualified manner, denounced the very idea of foreigners holding or owning stock in the United States Bank, by agent, proxy, or otherwise, howsoever, directly or indirectly. But now, forsooth, the times are changed. Gentlemen wish—and more especially the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit)—to establish an unlimited host of free banks, and say they would be glad to see foreigners from Europe come in among us and take the stocks in those banks within our own State. And we are told, sir, yes, impudently told, that this is good old Jackson democracy. Sir, not one word of it is true—not the first word.

When we ask that the bare privilege may be left for the State to take stock in the bank, or not, as to the people hereafter may seem right, they are up in arms, and instantly begin preaching General Jackson democracy—that it is wrong very wrong, for the State to own stock in any bank; and the language of the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen), is, “as there is none, and should not be any connection between church and State, neither should there be any connection between bank and State;” and this, he says, was the opinion of General Jackson. When, I ask, did these worthy friends learn all this? Certainly before 1839—certainly more than eleven years ago. Well, sir, in the winter of 1839, both the gentleman from Posey, (Mr. Owen,) and the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) were members of the General Assembly of this State. That was at a time when our then splendid, but since most odious system of internal improvements, was in full blast—it was before that stupendous fabric of human folly had spread its withering blight over the length and breadth of our State.

Well, sir, at that session of the Legislature Joseph G. Marshall, a staunch and well known friend of the improvement system, and a whig, introduced a bill, the object of which was to borrow a large amount of money upon the credit of the State, to be converted into bank stock. We were told, the other day, by several members, my worthy colleague among the rest, that the State Bank had lost to the State one million of dollars in State bonds. At the time the statement was made, I was not prepared to even contradict it; but now, sir, I am not only prepared to contradict their assertions, but I am prepared to prove the falsity of the charge. It was, sir, to themselves a stumbling block, how the bonds so lost had become chargeable to the State, independent of the bank; but to me the matter is now easily solved, and I shall here take occasion to explain it. I want the people at home to understand this matter, for it was not unfrequently adverted to upon the stump last summer, and much injustice was done the State Bank by that course. As I have already said, Mr. Marshall, on the 17th of January, introduced a bill, numbered 228, to increase the capital of the State Bank, as was declared by the title. On the 6th of February following, a lapse of twenty days, for consideration, the question is put, Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading? The next, and by no means an unimportant inquiry, is, what was the true character of that bill, and what was the ultimate object of creating it a law?

I here state, the bill was brought forward for the sole use of the internal improvement system, and for no other or different purpose. I am authorized to say that it was without the least possible agency on the part of the Bank. The Bank really had no interest in it. She was sought to be made the mere instrument of the State, through which to make money to be applied to internal improvement purposes, and to that alone. To put the matter beyond the possibility of dispute as to the object and intention of the act, I will, with the permission of the Convention, read the fifth section of the act, which of itself gives a full explanation. It reads as follows:

"The amount of said loans shall be subscribed and paid over by said commissioner of the sinking fund, as bank stock, in the branches of the State Bank, at fifty dollars for each share. The dividends on which, shall be first applied to the payment of interest on said loans; and the overplus is hereby appropriated to internal improvements, to be applied to the payment of interest on State bonds, sold for that purpose, in such manner as the Legislature may direct."

Now, sir, can there be any mistake as to the purpose to which the proceeds of that loan were to be applied? Not one dollar of it was ever intended to benefit the State Bank; nor had the State Bank one dime of interest in the loan. The sum to be loaned was one and a half million of dollars. The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, through the agency of the President of the State Bank, or the Fund Commissioners, were directed to make the loan. It was to be made for the State, and not for the Bank, as has been heretofore urged, both here and elsewhere.

They sent the President of the State Bank to borrow the money. He was the mere agent of the State. He sold one million of the stocks on a credit, and the State, not the Bank, lost some eight or nine hundred thousand dollars of that stock, or State bonds.

Now I ask the question, did this law in any way connect the State with the Bank? Did it not place the funds of the State, thus to be borrowed, (provided they had ever got any,) directly within the vaults of the State Bank, completely at her mercy, without any sort of security, to be banked upon, for the use and benefit of the internal improvement system? Could there be a more complete union of State and Bank? Could there be a greater confidence reposed, than was in this case reposed by the State in the Bank?

Now where, sir, think you, we shall find those early admirers of Jackson democracy—those gentlemen whose very nerves quake at the bare thought of a connection between State and Banks? Sir, the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) did not vote upon the bill at any stage, as is shown by the journals. But, sir, the gentleman from Posey (Mr. Owen) did vote upon the question of engrossment, and upon its final passage. And he, at every point, voted for that bill. The law passed—the bonds were sold, and the State sustained the loss. If it was right then to connect the State with the Bank, what makes it wrong now? If the State might then invest one and a half million of dollars in the State Bank, to be banked upon to make money for internal improvement purposes, why may she not now invest all her trust funds in the same way, and let them be making twelve or fifteen per cent. instead of six, to educate the little children of the State? Jackson's theory had been promulgated to the world, as early as 1832; this happened seven years afterwards. If the Jackson theory of no connection between Bank and State is good and wholesome now, why was it not good then? If we are to receive and obey it as a part of the democratic law of the party now, have you increased its obligation since 1839?—for at that time the gentleman himself who now presses it home upon us, did not regard it as being of any binding force or effect.

It was also the unqualified advice of General Jackson, that foreigners should not be permitted to invest their capital in our banking institutions. That part of his teachings is now to be regarded as valueless. And why? Because, forsooth, it does not exactly suit the convenience of gentlemen to comply with it, upon the present occasion. In other words, it is their interest to do otherwise.

Here, sir, is the language of the old Hero himself. It is that which, but lately, we heard read by the gentleman from Monroe (Mr. Read). "Should the stock of the bank principally pass into the hands of the subjects of a foreign country, and we should unfortunately be involved in a war with that country, what would be our condition? Of the course which would be pursued by a Bank almost wholly owned by the subjects of a foreign power, and managed by those whose interest, if not affections, would run in the same direction, there can be no doubt. All its operations within would be in aid of the hostile fleets and armies without, controlling our currency, receiving our public moneys, and holding thousands of our citizens in dependence. It would be more formidable and dangerous than the naval and military power of the enemy. If we must have a bank with private stockholders, every consideration of sound policy, and every impulse of American feeling, admonishes that it should be purely American. Instead of sending abroad the stock of the bank, in which the government must deposit its funds, and on which it must rely to sustain its credit in times of emergency, it would rather be expedient to prohibit its sale to aliens, under penalty of absolute forfeiture."

The foregoing, sir, are some of the opinions of General Jackson, upon the impropriety of foreigners becoming our bankers.

But, sir, the times have changed. And why have they so changed? We are told that this is the age of progression, and that we are the progressive democracy, and that it is our extraordinary progress that has brought all this about. Well, sir, I have always learned that as a country progresses in knowledge and science, that men and things may, and necessarily do, change; but that great principles are immutable, and remain always the same. I repeat, sir, there is no good reason can be assigned, why, if one part of our good old Jackson democracy should now be the law of the land, that the other part should not also be regarded as equally sound.

I have no confidence in a set of political creeds that are good one day, better the next, the next day bad, and by the fourth day, ready to be repudiated in toto. Such a doctrine will not do me. Sir, I am against the foreigner becoming our banker, and I am in favor of a well-regulated State Bank, with all necessary and proper restrictions—a real State Bank, wherein the State has an absolute interest—not a mere rickety-headed, muling and puking bastard, bearing the name of State Bank, but owned and controlled by a set of foreigners, who have no interest in common with us, and whose only inducement to come among us, is for the purpose of drawing from us all they can of the precious metals, and leave among us a spurious and irredeemable paper circulation in its place.

Hereafter, I trust, when gentlemen undertake to press upon us the teachings of any of our patriotic statesmen who have gone before us, they will themselves be willing to take the admonition as a whole, and to practice upon it, and not seek to garble it to suit present special purposes.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, }
January 25th, 1851. }

I am erroneously reported by you in a few remarks made on the 13th of this month.

I take this occasion to remark that I have more than once requested the stenographer to hand to me for revision any remarks of mine, before publishing the same. This request has been disregarded, and I have been misrepresented in many instances.

What I said on the 13th of January was as follows:

Mr. HALL. I have had some experience in Legislation—have been present when great excitement prevailed, but never was in a body where there was as much excitement as now exists in this body. It is useless to attempt a compromise of a question of as much magnitude as that now pending under such a state of feeling. If the friends of the free banks propose a measure it is either laid on the table or voted down. The same takes place with a proposition originating with the State Bank party. The better course to pursue, is to refer the whole question to a select committee, and by the time a report shall come in from that committee, this body will be prepared to act with more deliberation on the question. I therefore renew the motion to refer the subject to a select committee of one from each judiciary circuit.

S. HALL.

MONDAY, JAN. 20th, 1851.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. WILSON, of Lafayette.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT announced the first business in order to be the consideration of the special order, being in relation to Grand Juries.

Mr. BASCOM moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling him to introduce a resolution calling on the Auditor of State to furnish the Convention with a statement of the amount of fees paid to attorneys, &c.

The rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

GRAND JURY.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the section in relation to Grand Juries, the pending question being on the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley (Mr. Smith) to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vanderburgh (Mr. Lockhart). Mr. Pepper of Crawford having also moved to strike out the section and insert a distinct proposition,

Mr. HOVEY remarked, that as there seemed to be a disposition to compromise this matter, he hoped it would be postponed for a day or two. [Cries of "no, no."]

Mr. PETTIT. The Convention can dispose of it in two minutes.

Mr. HOVEY. Very well.

Mr. PETTIT. This question has delayed the Convention some time. I propose to put it upon a basis that no one can object to. I shall, in a moment or two, move that all the amendments be laid upon the table, in order that I may offer a substitute for the section. I abandon the idea of abolishing the Grand Jury, and shall propose to leave the whole question to the Legislature. What I shall offer is a provision to this effect.

The Legislature may continue, abolish, or modify the Grand Jury system. This, I think, will suit those who want it continued as well as those who want it abolished or modified. It will dispose of the entire subject. I therefore move that the pending amendments be laid upon the table, in order that I may offer this as a substitute.

Mr. WOLFE asked for a division of the question.

The question being first on laying the amendment to the amendment on the table, it was decided in the affirmative.

The question then being on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburgh on the table,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 67, nays 51—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Butler, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Huff, Johnson of O., Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Ristie, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, and Yocum—67.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Carter, Clark of H., Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Haddon, Hawkins, Helmer, Hitt, Hovey, Howe, Johnson of D., Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, May, Morgan, Newman, Read of Monroe, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, Wallace, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—51.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

The question was then taken on laying the amendment of the gentleman from Crawford on the table, and on a division—ayes 54, noes 30—decided in the affirmative.

The question then being, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. PETTIT. I now move to strike out all after the word “resolved,” and insert the following:

“The Legislature may continue, abolish, or modify the Grand Jury system.”

I offer this, sir, (said Mr. P.) as a compromise, and I hope it may be adopted, and the matter ended. It neither proposes to abolish nor continue the Grand Jury system, but leaves the matter entirely with the Legislature.

Mr. MILLER of Fulton demanded the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded by ayes 60, noes not counted, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. BORDEN. As this is one of the most important questions that can come before this body, we ought to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 93, nays 28—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Blythe, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Huff, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—93.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Crawford, Dunn of Jefferson, Fisher, Hogin, Howe, Kilgore, Lockhart, Milligan, Morgan, Newman, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Thomas, and Watts—28.

So the amendment was adopted.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ATTORNEY GENERAL.

The section which provides for the election of an Attorney General was taken up on its second reading.

Mr. THORNTON suggested that the section had better be laid on the table for the present, until the information asked for by the gentleman from Wells should be obtained.

The section was, for the present, laid upon the table by unanimous consent.

CIRCUIT COURTS.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section which provides that the State shall be divided into twenty circuits;

The pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) to strike out “twenty” and insert “twenty-four,” &c.

Mr. HOVEY. In the few remarks which I propose to make, it will be necessary not only to consider the section before the Convention, but also the series of sections heretofore offered by the gentleman from Dearborn. The sections offered by him constitute a system of themselves, and must be considered as a whole. When stripped of their legal phraseology, they amount to this: There shall be a Supreme Court and twenty-four Circuit Courts in the State; the Circuit Courts to consist of one judge, and vested with the jurisdiction possessed by the present Circuit and Probate Courts; to hold two terms of the Circuit, and at least three terms of the Probate Courts in each county in every year. I propose to amend this plan so that, after the year 1860, the General Assembly shall be empowered to vest the probate jurisdiction in such courts as they may think proper.

It may not be unprofitable to look a little into the history of the jurisdiction now possessed by the Probate Courts of this State. By the laws of England the Ecclesiastical Courts and Courts of Chancery had complete control of all matters now cognizable in our Probate Courts. The Ecclesiastical Courts were composed of the clergy, and no person except one of that order was permitted to be a judge. Our forefathers, at an early date, adopted the common law of England, and formed their courts after the English models, as near as the condition of our institutions and society would admit. As early as January 2d, 1818, the common law of England, with all statutes and acts made in aid of the same prior to the fourth year of King James the First, &c., and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, and not inconsistent with the laws of this State, was adopted by our General Assembly. The probate jurisdiction, as it was connected with the Church of England, was of course deemed inconsistent with our republican institutions. This led to the establishment of courts in this country unknown to the common law. In some States they are called "Orphans' Courts"—"Surrogates"—"County Courts"—and with us and others, "Probate Courts."

From the formation of our Territorial Government in 1800, up to 1818, the jurisdiction now exercised by our Probate Courts was vested in the Court of Common Pleas or Circuit Courts. In the last mentioned year that jurisdiction was transferred to the associate judges of the Circuit Courts, who retained it until the act of January, 1824, when it was taken from them and conferred upon the "equity side of the Circuit Courts," or, in other words, upon the President Judges. At that day, if I have been correctly informed, the President Judges made no small show in the political arena, and as they received no extra pay for the additional labor thus cast upon them, they succeeded the following year in getting the probate business transferred to the associates again, subject to their revision.—Acts Feb. 11th, 1825. Here the probate business rested until January 23d, 1829, when the present probate judge system was established. By this review it will be seen that, since 1818, the associate judges have had the control of that court ten years, the President Judges one year, and the Probate Judges about twenty-one years. These frequent fluctuations plainly prove that the people have never been satisfied with these courts; and I can say that, so far as my information extends, from an investigation of the old records of these Courts, and my own experience as a practicing attorney for the last nine years, that they have had good cause for that dissatisfaction. I will further say—and I believe the old members of the bar and the records of the State will bear me out in the assertion—that there can be no period found since 1818, in which the probate business has been as efficiently administered as during the term in which the President Judges of the circuits were compelled to perform those duties.

It may be now asked how we are to remedy this long borne evil? I will answer it freely and without disguise. PAY YOUR JUDGES. Do you expect to procure men well qualified to discharge all the complicated duties of these courts for the pitiful sum of fifty dollars a year? And yet, sir, that is about an average of what they now receive. He that knows anything about law, will tell you that that sum will not pay your judges one dollar a day for the labor they should bestow out of court to qualify them for their duties, not to mention the time spent within. There are no judges whose duties are as complicated as those who preside in our Probate Courts. To fill that bench as it should be, would require an honest, firm, upright man—a good accountant, familiar with the ecclesiastical law, so far as relates to the granting of letters testamentary and of administration—familiar with all their nice distinctions in regard to trusts as treated of in works on equity—familiar with the common law of England, and familiar, in short, with the whole law of our State that relates to the many nice and subtle questions which arise in these courts. And yet the people murmur because their judges permit estates to be squandered, because they make titles to land by which the innocent suffer, and because, in short, that they are not all that they should be—wise, honest, and familiar with the laws! I have found it to be the case, not only in law, but in all the practical details of life, that MONEY is the grand moving principle. Few men can be found capable of filling such important stations who have patriotism enough to do it for fifty dollars a year. I repeat it, sir, if you want good courts, you must pay the judges who preside.

The history of all the cases of any one county in this State, if it could be fairly and truly written, would show such startling developments that it would lead to the abolishment of these courts without delay.

An old member of the bar in my part of the State, who is a sound lawyer and good practitioner, styles these tribunals "courts of confiscation." He says that the administrators, clerks, doctors, and lawyers make a clean sweep of the whole." This is rather a harsh censure; but I am fearful, sir, that such cases are not rare. The dead man, the widow, and the orphan have never been the particular favorites of the living. At an early period in the English law, the whole personal estate of the decedent vested in the King, as "the father of his country," and was not even liable for his just debts.

The King subsequently granted the property of decedents to his holy bishops, to be used by them "in pious uses," which they construed to mean for their own use—not the pious use of paying the dead man's debts—not the pious use of providing for the bereaved widow—not the pious use of rearing and educating the helpless and destitute orphan—but to minister to their own corrupt and luxurious vices! And, sir, the feeble guard which we throw around the widow and orphan here leave them but little less room to murmur, than under the iron rule of the old monarchs of England.

Sir, the General Assembly has spoken with more than one voice, through its laws, in condemnation of our probate system. The auditors of the respective counties have the control of your Trust Funds, the surplus revenue, and the Common School Fund, and are authorized by law to loan the same, by taking mortgages on real estate; but they are strictly forbidden not to loan money on any lands, the titles to which have been acquired by purchase at executors' or administrators' sales! Now, sir, what language does this speak? The State has an interest in these funds, and she knows that the courts, through which these titles are made, are so defective that she will not permit her officers to risk her money. Surely this is very kind and considerate! The farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, those who are not familiar with the laws, may purchase their lands and get bad titles; but the State is too wise to lose her funds in such unsafe investments. Surely this interest which the law-makers of the State seem to feel for her, and not for the people, is ahead of the age!

I cannot pass by another law, to be found within our code, although it may not be strictly within the scope of this debate. By our general law of limitations, twenty years adverse possession of land, with color of title, gives the possessor a right against the world. In the case of sales of land by guardians, administrators, or executors, the heir or ward is compelled to bring his action within five years after the sale, or within five years after the termination of the guardianship, R. S. 1843, page 458, sec. 25, thus giving these generally helpless claimants one-fourth of the time that is given to the adult citizen in other cases to recover his lands. Is this not too hard, when we take into consideration the manner in which these sales are made. Upon a deficiency of personal estate to pay the debts of the decedent, the administrator commences suit against the heirs for the sale of the real estate. An attorney has to be employed to file the petition—the sheriff takes his writ, and with due form and ceremony goes to the widow's house, who has the innocent, helpless, suckling defendant upon her breast. A man unfamiliar with our law would ask, what is he doing? Why, sir, he is reading his writ to that babe, that can neither walk nor talk, commanding it to be and appear before the Probate Court, to show cause why its lands should not be sold to pay its father's debts! Oh ye wise law-makers, your wisdom is astonishing! Thus, sir, the lands pass from the hands of that suckling child, and five years after the sale he is forever debarred from reclaiming it, no difference whether it was justly or unjustly sold! The whole system of our present probate laws, with the organization of courts and all, seem to me to be an altar erected upon which the widow, the orphan, and the helpless, may be conveniently sacrificed. Enough of this. I will now return to the subject.

From the view which I have taken, two conclusions follow. The first is, that the Probate system should be changed, and the second is, that that cannot be done without a fair compensation to the judges. As the people did not expect at our hands that we would fasten upon them any expensive system, let us see whether the same amount now paid for our judicial officers cannot be more judiciously used. Under the plan submitted by the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) by abolishing the offices of the Associate and Probate Judges, I am sure we can.

The cost of the present system is about as follows:

|                                        |       |         |
|----------------------------------------|-------|---------|
| 3 Supreme Judges, at $1200.           | - - - | $3,600 |
| 13 Circuit Judges, at $800,           | - - - | 10,400  |
| 180 Associate Judges, say $50 each,   | -     | 9,000   |
| 90 Probate Judges, Auditor's estimate, | -     | 5,000   |

286 Judges.—Total pay of Judges, - $28,000

This estimate varies from that submitted by the gentleman from Dearborn, as I make no allowance for extra charges. I think extra charges should not be made in the estimate, as about an equal amount of costs of that kind would probably arise under any system.

The following would be the cost of the plan proposed:

|                              |          |
|------------------------------|----------|
| 3 Supreme Judges, - - - - -  | $3,600  |
| 24 Circuit Judges, - - - - - | 19,200   |
|                              | $22,800 |

Thus making a saving by the proposed plan over the old system, of $5,200 a year. I must, however, say that I think the judges under this system should be allowed $1000 salary. The expenses under the proposed plan would then be—

|                                     |         |
|-------------------------------------|---------|
| 3 Supreme Judges, at $1200, - - -  | $3,600 |
| 24 Circuit Judges, at $1000. - - - | 24,000  |

$27,600

Which would leave a balance of $400, in favor of this over the old system, and raise the salary of the Circuit Judge from $800 to $1000 per year.

That these 24 Judges will be able to perform the labor, has been shown by the gentleman from Dearborn, in an example of his part of the State. I will offer one to show that it will also suit the counties in the part of the State where I reside. There are 186,000 polls in the State, which being divided by 24, (the number of Judges proposed,) would give to each circuit 7,750 polls. Vanderburgh, Gibson, and Posey, would lack 600 polls of that number, so I will add in Warrick:

| Counties.    | Polls. | Days C. C. | Days Pr. Ct. |
|--------------|--------|------------|--------------|
| Vanderburgh, | 2,454  | 28         | 56           |
| Posey,       | 2,500  | 18         | 36           |
| Gibson,      | 2,140  | 12         | 24           |
| Warrick,     | 1,707  | 10         | 20           |
|              | 8,801  | 68         | 136          |

Thus showing that in these four counties, containing more than a thousand polls over the necessary ratio, a Judge would have to serve 68 days in the Circuit Courts, and 136 days in the Probate terms, making in all 204 days in the year.

Thus I think I have shown that the plan is economical, superior to the present system, and in every way capable of being carried out, without any additional expense.

By the amendment I shall offer, if it shall happen to be inefficient, after eight years' trial, the Legislature can establish some other system. I hope the Convention will have the nerve to throw off the chains that have so long bound us, and if they will not accept this, that some plan may be adopted that will, in some extent, at least, improve the present feeble Probate system.

Mr. BORDEN said he desired to make a few suggestions which he had been prevented from doing on Saturday, in consequence of suffering from the effects of a severe cold which produced hoarseness.

It had been said that this was a matter for lawyers to discuss and to decide upon. He affirmed that it was a question which it was important for the lay members to consider and decide. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRATHER. What does the gentleman mean by lay members?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Allen has the floor.

Mr. PRATHER. I am aware of that, sir, but I wish to get an explanation.

Mr. BORDEN. I mean those who are not lawyers professionally. But I believe the Convention is going to permit all persons to practice at the bar, therefore, there will be no lay members. [A laugh.]

Mr. BORDEN then proceeded to address the Convention again, in continuation of his remarks on Friday last. He said he had some amendments which he desired at the proper time to propose. He contended that to give the necessary independence to the judiciary, the judges should be elected for a reasonable term of service, and should receive a liberal salary.

He contended that the judges of the Supreme Court should be elected by the people of the whole State, that they should go out of office in classes, and that they should be eligible to no other office during their term of service as judges. Another change that he desired to see was that the Supreme Court should hold a session once a year in each district. He contended that the present probate system should be abolished, alluded to the New York and Pennsylvania probate systems, and argued that the Convention should decide the question for themselves, and either create a county court or throw the probate business at once into the circuit court and increase the number of circuits. His remarks are withheld for revision; they will be published hereafter.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. The debate having been opened to the lay members at the suggestion of the gentleman from Allen, I have the permission of my friend from Ripley, who is a great economist, to occupy about five minutes of the time of the Convention.

The argument of the gentleman from Posey, goes to show that the administrators of estates and the lawyers and officers of the courts are the greatest enemies of the widow and orphan. But he did not show us how estates could be settled without the intervention of courts and lawyers, and administrators. To carry out his argument, the gentleman should have indicated some way in which we could get rid of these instrumentalities. He tells that our statutes, in the most conclusive manner, certifies to the incompetency of the probate court, by providing that lands, the title of which has been derived through the agency of this court, shall not be admitted as security for funds loaned by the State. The Statute testifies in the same manner, to the incompetency of the circuit court. [Mr. Clark read from the Revised Code, to the effect that no land sold on execution issued on judgments obtained in the circuit court, should be taken in security for money loaned by the State.] So that by the same argument, the circuit court is just as objectionable as the probate court.

Now, the gentleman from Allen says, that we dodge this question—that we are afraid to abolish this probate court. But he proposes to establish a probate court and call it a county court; although it is nothing else than the present probate court.

Mr. BORDEN. The gentleman misunderstood me. I say you should decide the question. If you do not establish a county court, the business should be thrown into the circuit court.

Mr. CLARKE of Tippecanoe. Well, you establish a county court to transact the probate business. In what respect will it differ from the present probate court, except in name? The court has the same jurisdiction. You elect the judge by the same electors. You refuse to enlarge the salary to induce more competent men to take the office, and how will the court be improved in any respect by calling it a county court?

The gentleman from Posey stated many objections to the law, in relation to the administration and settlement of decedent's estates. These are subjects for the Legislature to amend and settle. The defects of the law are not the fault of the probate judges. Nor is it the fault of the present system, that prudent men are not always appointed as administrators. Men do not always manage their own affairs prudently. And wise men may even be unwilling to burden themselves with the trouble of other people's affairs.

If estates could be settled without the intervention of administrators, his argument would be true. The greater part of the business of the probate court, is the settlement of accounts; and I venture to say that the circuit court would not bestow the necessary labor upon this branch of their business. The greater part of the evil of which the gentleman complains is not in the court, but it is owing to defect in the law. We have not had laws that would enable the administrator to collect debts that were due to the estate. This has been one of the great evils of our probate system, and is one of the chief causes of delay in the settlement of estates. Now, sir, I could go to our circuit court and show that we have had civil cases there, where there were living parties pursuing claims for five years, without obtaining a decision. And what greater security would we have that probate business would be decided speedily. I think it would be impossible to make any court that would remedy all the evils that are complained of. But if we establish a new probate court, I have not yet heard how we are to get rid of the enemies to decedent estates—administrators and clerks. If we transfer the probate business to the circuit court, there would be these harpies of lawyers of which the gentleman complains so much, exacting still larger fees.

A DELEGATE. "And doctors, too."

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir, the doctors' fees have also to be paid, and I grant you they are high enough. If the clerks' fees are too high, they can be reduced. If he is a harpy, upon the estate, you can cut him off with a smaller allowance, but if you establish a surrogate court, and make the judge his own clerk, will he be less a harpy? When you make his fees depend upon the record that he himself shall keep, will he be less a harpy? I imagine not.

Now, if we leave this question open, whenever the experience of the country suggests a better system, the Legislature will provide it. They will provide higher salaries when the business and the condition of the State will permit it, and not before. But if we establish this provision in the Constitution it is fixed and unchanged.

The gentleman from Floyd, who is so exceedingly anxious to provide a perpetual existence for the probate court, and who also thinks it will be greatly improved by calling it a county court, told us the other day, that even his county could not pay such a judge a high salary. That the business will not justify it. Well, sir, I cannot perceive any better way than to leave the matter as provided in the present Constitution. The Legislature will continue the present system until the circumstances or necessities of the State require the organization of a different court. They can provide for a surrogate for each county, or make probate circuits, as circumstances may require. Some counties are large and populous, others are small, with but few inhabitants. Possibly, in the larger counties the business may pay a competent man, in each one, to devote his whole attention to it. Not so in the smaller ones; and in these it may be necessary to join two or three together and form a circuit. It is not a high salary that gives a man ability or legal knowledge. But to render a man skillful or capable of transacting any business readily, he must devote his attention to it. It must occupy the greater part of his time; or, in other words, it must become his business. To enable a man to be a competent probate judge, he must receive such a salary as will allow him to devote the principal part of his time and attention to the business of being judge. Unless the office be placed on such a footing as to reward a competent man for the employment of his time in the discharge of its duties, we can have no assurance that we shall have more efficient judges.

Mr. RISTINE. Mr. President: I have listened with much attention to this discussion, and am willing to acknowledge that, in many particulars, I have been much edified. Amid all the arguments advanced by the many speakers, but few, if any, defects are disclosed in our present circuit court system; the great assault has been made upon probate courts, or rather upon the judges of those courts, and the honorable gentleman from Dearborn in his sympathetic recital of the wrongs and oppressions endured by widows and orphans at the hands of ignorant and incompetent judges, has almost made us all, with universal accord, ready to exclaim "down with them!" But, sir, in all this discussion, in all the arguments used, it strikes me the speakers have generally missed the mark. I think, from my experience, and the knowledge which the members of this Convention have of the practical workings of this system, that we may all be very easily satisfied that the true, the greatest source of the evils complained of, remains almost if not wholly untouched. I will give, as briefly as I can, what I conceive to be the evil, and how that evil is to be remedied, and remedied effectually. It is a false philanthropy, inducing wrong legislation; it arises and grows out of that law which gives preference to the nearest of kin, or the largest creditor in the administration of decedent's estates, without any reference, whatever, to competency or qualification in the discharge of the duty required. How often, sir, is it that applications for administration are made, and granted, to persons who have not even the qualifications which enables them to write their own name? Our present statute makes it imperative that this grant should be made—the court cannot avoid it. What then follows as the consequence of such an appointment? This administrator or administratrix seeks the counsel of some person in their own vicinity, in whose knowledge of the business they have to transact they have confidence, but who, in fact, is just as ignorant of the duty as he or she. With such counsel, and with such is often the case, the duties are entered upon, and before the court is advised, the whole estate is reduced to an almost inexplicable mass of confusion, and delays and losses are the inevitable consequences which follow. Now, sir, this is no fancied picture. I would go into detail of the many cases that have occurred under my own observation since I have served as clerk of the circuit court of the county which I, in part, represent here. It is in the settlement of estates by such a class of administrators, that complaints are made; their business capacity does not permit them to come into fair and even competition with those with whom they have to deal. They have not that legal knowledge which enables them to distinguish, at all times, between a legitimate and an illegitimate claim; and thus situated, they are frequently made the instruments through, whom the more cunning extract sums which ought not to be paid. These unjust claims come before the court properly receipted, and are admitted as vouchers in the settlement. The delays consequent to all such cases accumulate costs which in the end are paid from the assets of the estate.

I believe the only true system—the only efficient remedy for this evil, is to give to the courts, or the clerks in vacation, (subject to confirmation by the court at the next term,) the power to grant letters of administration only to such persons as are deemed competent, and will give the required security; this mode adopted, and the administration of estates would soon be confined to a few men, and to those only whose business qualifications and experience had approved them competent. It is unjust, sir, it is untrue, that the defects and consequent complaints which are made under this system, arise from the incompetency of the judges. In all the avocations of life, experience proves to each member of this Convention, that nothing can be expected to be well done except a competent person be engaged to execute it. How then, sir, are we to expect a duty well performed, requiring in most cases, skillful, practical business qualifications, combined with a knowledge of legal duties and obligations, as long as your statutes yield a preference, indiscriminate of qualification. We all know that it is not practicable, at all times, for an administrator to have a lawyer at his elbow to counsel him on every occasion, nor is it necessary that every administrator should be a lawyer; but every administrator should be possessed of fair business qualifications, with a mind of sufficient capacity to comprehend those statutes which impose upon him defined duties. I care not what character of men you place upon the probate bench—how high their legal qualifications—until the Legislature does its duty by the enactment of such laws as will remedy the evils growing out of the present mode of appointing administrators, we shall not hear the end of these complaints. There is much connected with the present system which should be abolished—connected with the sale of real estate. There is too much form without substance, producing delay and attendant expenses in applications to sell lands by administrators.

In my county, and, so far as my knowledge extends, the people of other counties, have selected men for their Probate Judges, of good sound discriminating minds—men fully conscious of the responsibility resting upon them, and who, except in some of those “hair-splitting technicalities of the law,” are as competent to decide as any other men who scrutinize the conduct and examine with strictness the accounts of administrators, which we shall never be able to get from that class who have extracted from the books and condensed in their heads all the general principles and nice distinctions which many think are the only requisites for a competent judge. It is but seldom, sir, that widows and orphans have just cause to mourn over wrongs inflicted by illegal and “ignorant” decisions, made by Probate Judges; but I am willing to admit that it is too often the case that they have just cause to complain of those to whom the enactments of the Legislature have confided the trust, consisting of their all in the way of earthly goods. Sir, more is lost to this class, by the incompetency, than there is from the infidelity, of administrators.

To avoid delay, and assist in removing these complaints, the Legislature should clear away all those obstacles now in the way of administrators, for the collection of debts due decedents' estates, repeal all stay and appraisal laws, leaving out of the law every possible apology for administrators to delay their settlement. To me, Mr. President, it looks very difficult how this Convention is to insert in this Constitution that which will wholly remove these evils—how anything else than general principles, leaving the details to be made and carried into effect by the Legislature, (where it properly belongs,) from time to time, as defects may present themselves, or as necessity may demand.

Innovation is the order of all human affairs, and of all human institutions. Change is inscribed on all our works. Then shall we act most wisely, in providing for the correction of contingent and probable evils, as they may present themselves in our onward march, or assume for ourselves a knowledge competent to scan the future, and provide safely against those evils which the experience of the past proves to be incident to all the works of human origin?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Allen says that it is for the lay members to discuss this question. Well, sir, I am one of the lay members, and I wish to express my opinions, very briefly, in regard to it. This Convention, sir, has been in session for nearly four months, long past the ordinary period of incubation, and we have not been able to produce a chicken yet. I suppose the reason is, because most of the eggs are added.

This question in regard to the Probate Court was discussed in my county. The people were in favor of the election of judges, and they also supposed there was considerable defect in the probate system, which required to be remedied. Now the proposition is, to elect twenty Circuit Judges—the gentleman from Dearborn proposes twenty-four—and to give them probate jurisdiction. Under the present system, the expenses of the Probate Court are about twenty-eight thousand dollars. Now, if we establish twenty-four courts with twenty-four judges, and give each a salary of a thousand or twelve hundred dollars, their salaries will amount to about twenty-six thousand dollars, which is something less than the expenses of the present system. But it appears to me, that if we give probate jurisdiction to the Circuit Court, twenty judges will be quite sufficient. There are thirteen Circuit Judges now, and there is no difficulty, so far as I have ascertained, in transacting all the business that belongs to the Circuit Court. This will average not quite five counties to each judge. There are some counties in which there will be always more business than in others. The people are of the opinion that a system may be established, which will be less expensive than the present, and I concur in that opinion.

Mr. COOKERLY. With the view of getting a vote upon the section, I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Dearborn upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is in order for me to withdraw my amendment?

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman cannot now withdraw his amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Tippecanoe. I move that the gentleman have leave to withdraw his proposition.

Leave was granted by consent, and the proposition was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to amend so that the State should be divided into Circuits, leaving the number of Circuits to be fixed by the Legislature.

Mr. KELSO. I am sorry that the gentleman from Dearborn has withdrawn his amendment. However, when we cannot get what we ought to have, we must take the best we can get. His proposition would have cost the State less than the present system. The present system costs about $28,000 per annum, and the system proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman) would not cost over $26,000, and would have been furnished with a competent court for the transaction of probate business.

Now my friend from Fountain (Mr. Ristine) has taken a good deal of pains to prepare a speech, and he has delivered it in a very proper manner; though by-the-bye, it had more beauty than substance in it. I say, sir, it is useless to attempt to conceal the fact, that there are Probate Judges in Indiana who do not understand even the statute law, much less the general principles of the law. There are plenty of judges, sir, who, on the most simple questions of law, apply to the clerk to know what the law is, even the statutory provisions, and what their decisions ought to be. Through the hands of these County Judges, the whole real estate of the county passes, on a fair average, once in thirty-three years, and upon their decisions depends the stability of our landed estates in Indiana.

Now the gentleman from Wayne (Mr. Newman) proposes to leave the whole matter to the Legislature. Sir, we have left our present odious system to the Legislature for the last twenty years or more, and what have they done? What have they done for us in twenty years? The same system of laws regulating the proceedings of the Probate Court, would be well enough, if you put men upon the bench who are competent to discharge the duties incumbent upon them. But we have not got such men on the bench at present, in all the counties. In the county of Switzerland we have got good lawyers upon the bench, but in the county of Ohio this is not the case; the Judge is a first rate man, but no lawyer. Take the two counties together, then, it is a failure. It is as important we should have competent judges upon the Probate Bench, as on the bench of the Circuit Court. Quite as important cases come up before the Probate Court, as before the Circuit Court. It is true, the Probate Court does not try cases of murder, or cases in which the punishment to be inflicted is by imprisonment in the penitentiary. But that Court does try cases where the title to real estate is in question, and where the perpetuity of the estate depends upon the decision. Sir, the remarks of the gentleman from Dearborn, (Mr. Holman,) the other day, were appropriate, every word of them; and he had good cause to make them, for in the Probate Court of his own county, within less than three months past, a decision was made by the Probate Judge, that a step-father might come in, and he did come in, and charge one hundred dollars for the support of an infant that was born a few weeks before or after its father's death. And that Judge was a fair average Judge.

Mr. COOKERLY (in his seat). He must be a very honest Judge.

Mr. GIBSON (speaking to delegates near him). I can refer gentlemen to decisions of Probate Judges still more outrageous than that.

Mr. KELSO. Now, sir, is a man who would make such a decision, competent to discharge the duties of a judge, however honest he may be? He takes from the helpless, fatherless babe, who cannot speak for itself—from it he takes one hundred dollars, and gives it to a heartless step-father, and for what? Because that babe sucked the milk from its mother's breast twelve months. Is not that, I ask you sir, a glorious recommendation to our present probate system—that an infant shall be charged at the rate of two dollars, or nearly that, per week, for the nourishment it receives from its mother's breast the first year of its existence? Such a decision is no more or less than a judicial robbery of that unfortunate orphan to suit the covetous inclinations of an unprincipled step-father. I now say that any one who would do so ought to be sent to the penitentiary for it, except the plea of ignorance shall be considered a good and sufficient excuse for his conduct.

Now, sir, if we adopt the proposition as it now stands, if we provide for twenty Circuit Judges and transfer to them probate jurisdiction I am of opinion that the business will be better done.

I want to place it in the hands of competent men. It is the man who presides as judge who is to decide upon what terms the real estate shall be sold, and such men should be selected as are qualified from long experience and legal attainments. We want as competent men on one bench as on the other. I still think it would be better to adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Dearborn, but for the sake of compromise, I will vote for the proposition as it now is.

Mr. COOKERLY. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wabash will be adopted by the Convention. I am opposed to the increase of the circuits, and I am opposed to giving probate business to the Circuit Courts. It has been asserted here that the lawyers, clerks, and Probate Judges divide the greater part of the estate of persons dying intestate among themselves. I tell gentlemen that if the business is thrown into the Circuit Court it will be in a still worse plight. The lawyers and judges of that court will be very apt to take all that is left. I have always been opposed to giving the probate business to the Circuit Court. What the people want is that the man who is authorized to do probate business should live among them so that they may have access to him every day. They do not want to defer that kind of business until the Circuit Judge comes round once in three or six months.

The gentleman from Dearborn yesterday, backed by his friend from Ripley, asserted that if we create a County Court we shall have a pettifogging court. I tell the gentleman that if we adopt his proposition we shall have a pettifogging judiciary. I would rather have one pettifogging court than to have a whole pettifogging judiciary. My opinion is that if you change the system at all you should adopt a County Court. That is what we want. We want no increase of circuit. If a County Court be established, we may decrease the present number of circuits. Ten circuits will be quite sufficient; and we shall then have a well regulated judiciary.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion said: As nearly all the lawyers have spoken on this difficult subject, I presume that a few words from one of the "lay members" may be tolerated. The people have a very important interest in the regulation of the probate system of courts and laws. It affects a vast amount of the property of the community, and should be considered with a full understanding of the practical operation upon all classes of our citizens. In behalf of the people of Marion county, I can say that, at the present time, they are well provided with a Judge of Probate, fully able as to competency and integrity to discharge all the duties of the office, and well acquainted with the administration of the law. In this point of view, we are probably more fortunate than some of the other counties of the State, and we may, at another time, not be so fortunate as to have so good a judge.

But, sir, the well known defects of our present probate system have called forth much complaint among the people, and it is our duty to provide such a system as will hereafter be satisfactory to them. That it is liable to many objections no one will deny; but it is much easier to utter objections than to produce unobjectionable remedies.

The plan of the gentleman from Dearborn, to augment the number of Circuit Judges to as great a number as twenty, or even twenty-four, is, to my mind, quite objectionable. These judges will expect, each, to be paid a good large salary, and I am of opinion that we should pay our judges such a salary as would command the best talents of the State for judicial stations. If we have so many judges at high, or even fair salaries, the costs of the system will be burthensome upon the treasury. If we adopt the system of Circuit Probate Judges es, independent of the Circuit Court Judges, we also incur a very considerable amount of expense, and do not furnish such a court as will be acceptable to the people for the transaction of their probate business. The Judges of the Circuit Court will have so much regular business, at each term, other than probate business, that they cannot well attend to that branch of duty with that care and attention which it so loudly demands; neither can the people by their own proper selves, appear in those courts in term time, to settle estates, or to arrange the difficult questions connected with such settlements. In either the proper Circuit Court or the Circuit Probate Court, it will be always necessary for the parties to employ lawyers, and this would be a heavy charge against any estate.

The cost of twenty-four judges, at one thousand dollars each, which is quite as small a salary as I presume would be requisite, would make the sum of twenty-four thousand dollars. This would be the expense of the Circuit Court system, in connection with the probate system. The Circuit Probate system would probably cost every cent of the same sum. From unmistakable proofs, the associate judges are to be abolished, and their pay will be saved. Some persons are quite sure that the abolition of the associate judges is very right and proper. I think there is some room for doubt on this subject. The people have frequently looked to the associate judges as a very safe check upon the President Judge, and as being the branch of the court whose sympathies and feelings are with the populace, and who were frequently as good judges of the facts and the evidence as was his honor the President Judge. But they are doomed to be no more. Now, I would ask what are we to do in some peculiar cases, to supply their places? Suppose there should arise a necessity for a bill of injunction, a writ of habeas corpus, or the certificate of a judge, where and how are these things to be procured, if there be no judge of competent jurisdiction in the county at the time? Persons wishing a writ of habeas corpus, or a bill of injunction, must follow the Circuit Judge around the circuit, and wait until he can leave his court to go and attend to these special cases. Would not this create much trouble and great confusion? Courts should always be organized in such manner as will best suit the wants of the people.

I think, sir, that a plan may be adopted, if the Convention will take time to consider it, which would lessen expenses, and always give to the people a court at home, always open—a court where they could transact their business by themselves, or through their friends, without employing a lawyer, or paying for his services.

I could organize a court in each county, having full probate jurisdiction, and such other civil jurisdiction as the Legislature might from time to time confer upon it, which would be useful and safe to the people, and which would not cost a single dollar in the way of salary to the judge. I would make the judge his own clerk, and the fees of his office should be his only pay. If he should have the fees of the probate business, and also have civil jurisdiction so far as to decide all appeals from justices' dockets, the fees would be ample to enlist good legal and business talents, and the people would pay no more fees or costs than they now pay to the clerks of the Circuit Courts. As a further inducement to insure competent judges, a Common Pleas jurisdiction might be added, and all the fees be established and regulated by the Legislature. The term of office might be fixed at short periods, so that a frequent election would give the people an opportunity to hold the judge subject to a proper discharge of his duty, or to fill the place with a better one.

But there are some gentlemen who object to the principle that a judge shall be paid by the fees which shall arise in his own court. They instance the action of the Convention of New York, which, after a trial of the surrogate system, the surrogate being paid by the fees of his office, abolished that system, and from henceforth established the salary system. The cases are different. I propose a court which will require legal talent. The surrogate of New York might have only been a competent accountant. I propose short terms of office—say two years; and that the judge be elected by the people. The surrogate of New York held on a long term, and was appointed. The people of New York are rich, and able to pay large salaries. Ours are less wealthy, and desire economy, and cheap modes of doing business. Indeed, I am forced to say, the one system seems to me to be for the benefit of the lawyers, and the other for the good of the people. If we take away from the circuit courts the small cases, arising from appeals, and other trifling actions, we would give them much more time to devote to the criminal, and important suits in that court. More counties might be included in these circuits, and better salaries could be paid, them without imposing additional burdens upon the people. We could get the best lawyers for judges, and even if we paid each judge twelve hundred dollars a year, the State would be the gainer in the way of expense.

Twelve circuits, thus constituted, would be enough for the whole State. Twelve hundred dollars to each judge would amount to fourteen thousand four hundred dollars, thus saving nearly ten thousand dollars each year, in the way of salaries to judges. Every judge in the State would prefer to be diligently employed, if he were fairly paid for his services; and I, for one, am willing to pay according to the service.

The people desire some reform of the probate court system. The Convention should not hesitate to comply with their wishes. I regret to see a disposition to either make a system more suited to the lawyers than to the people, or else to leave it unattended to in the Constitution. The people expect the Convention to make this reform, and, in my opinion, they should take the responsibility, instead of throwing it forward upon the Legislature.

Mr. PETTIT. It seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, ought to prevail, under the present circumstances. This section was reported by me, as chairman of the committee, but it will be recollected by the Convention, that the first section of this article has been re-committed with instructions to insert a provision that we shall have county courts, and justices of the peace. That amendment is made, and the committee are ready to report whenever it is in order to do so. If the Convention concur in the report that they have instructed us to make, then you will have established, by constitutional provision, a supreme, circuit, and county court, and, in my judgment, you will not want twenty circuits, if you have county courts. The word "twenty" may, therefore, with all propriety, be stricken out, and leave it to the Legislature to say how many circuits there shall be, according to the exigencies of the country.

Mr. LOCKHART. I would merely suggest that we had better lay this section upon the table, and let the committee report.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "No, no;" "settle this question first."

The question being taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Wayne, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WOLFE moved to amend the section so as to make the term of office of the judges "four," instead of "six" years.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion to lay on the table was, upon a division—ayes 58, noes 43—decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley moved to amend so that the judges shall not be eligible to any other office during their term of service, and not eligible to the same office more than six years in every twelve.

Mr. MILLER of Gibson. I believe the section is about right as it is; I, therefore, move the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. PETTIT. I regard the amendment as being ruinous to the judiciary. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the amendment upon the table, and it was, upon a division—ayes 96, noes 27.

Mr. MARCH moved to amend so that judicial officers shall not be eligible to any other office during the time for which they are elected.

Mr. SHOUP moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to take from the table the amendment of the gentleman from Sullivan, fixing the term of office of circuit judges at four years, instead of six, and upon that motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and they were taken, with the following result—yeas 47, nays 73:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Bowlers, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Gootee, Haddon, Harbolt, Hawkins, Helm, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Prather, Sherrod, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Thornton, Wallace, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—47.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogan, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Maguire, March, Mather, May, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Steele, Stevenson, Tannehill, Thomas, Trimby, Watts, and Wheeler—73.

So the motion did not prevail.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ripley, to strike out the section, and insert in lieu thereof a provision to the effect that the State shall be divided into a suitable number of circuits; the judges to hold their office for four years, but to be only eligible eight years in any term of twelve years.

Mr. BORDEN. Does the gentleman suppose that a man who is competent to perform the duties of judge, will abandon his practice for the purpose of holding the office of judge for four years? It does seem to me that the proposition ought to be laid upon the table.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I have always heard it urged as an objection against an elective judiciary, that the judiciary ought to be entirely independent. I desire to place them in that attitude, and I say that, if we get a bad judge, four years is too long to keep him in office, and if we get a good judge, eight years is long enough. For, sir, there are men enough in the State who are competent to fill the office of judge with credit to themselves and advantage to the public; so that it is quite unnecessary that the same judge should continue to hold office for more than eight years. Is it the intention of gentlemen that a judge shall be continued in office perpetually? I apprehend not. I ask the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. The Convention has twice resolved already that the judges shall be elected for six years. I move that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and they were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 66, nays 49—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anthony, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Colfax, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Maguire, Mather, May, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Murray, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Shannon, Shoup, Sims, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Thomas, Trimble, Wallace, Watts, and Wheeler—66.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Bowers, Bracken, Carter, Chapman, Coats, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Gootee, Haddon, Harbott, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hogan, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Lockhart, Logan, March, Mathis, McClelland, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Washington, Prather, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—49.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. EDMONSTON. It seems to me that the section comprehends all that is necessary, and all that the Convention desire. For the purpose of getting a direct vote upon it, I move the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

It was decided in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. HOLMAN,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY,

The first business being on section two of report number thirty,

Mr. BORDEN. Is it in order to propose an additional section to the preceding report, before this report is taken up?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order.

JUDGES OF SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BORDEN. I hold in my hand an additional section, to which I believe there is no objection. It simply provides that the Judges of the Supreme Court shall go out of office by rotation. It is as follows:

“Provision shall be made by law for classifying the Judges of the Supreme Court, so that not more than one of them shall go out in one year.”

In explanation of the reasons which induce me to offer this amendment, I will simply say that, should the Judges of the Supreme Court all go out of office together, under some great excitement, a party bench might be elected without, perhaps, any view of effecting a party object; and however much it is to be desired that party politics should form no part of the consideration on which a judicial officer is to be elected, we all know that, when party spirit runs high, we could have no kind of guarantee that in such case your Supreme Judges might not be thus elected, if they were all to go out of office together. There are other reasons, Mr. President, which might be urged why this section should be adopted, and I hope it will not be voted down without due reflection.

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). I hope that section will not be adopted. I see no need for it whatever.

Mr. NEWMAN moved to amend the amendment by providing that not more than two of the Supreme Court Judges should go out of office at any one time. Mr. N. said that the reason why he offered this amendment was, that there would probably be five Supreme Judges, and that, as they were to hold their office for six years, it might be so arranged that two of them should go out every second year.

Mr. PETTIT moved to lay the section and amendments on the table.

A division being called for on the motion, there were yeas 33, nays 40.

So the section and amendments were not laid upon the table.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. It appears to me, Mr. President, that the section proposed by the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) if it be amended in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Wayne, (Mr. Newman,) will have a very beneficial effect. If we have but three Judges, one can be elected every second year; and if the Legislature should increase the number to five, then, their term of office being six years, necessarily two of them can go out of office at one time, and in that way, as the gentleman says, it would avoid the inconvenience of the Supreme Court going into office all at one time.

Mr. WALPOLE. I object to this amendment, because I think it is altogether unnecessary. If there were only to be one Judge elected, he might, it is true, be elected upon party considerations. But, sir, the case is very different where four or five have to be elected. In that case, the parties will split, and they will take the best men they can find of both parties. There is no reason, therefore, that I can perceive, why they should go out one in one year and another in another year. Such an arrangement may do well enough in a legislative body, such as the Senate. I say let them all go out together. I hope the amendment will not be entertained by the Convention.

Mr. BORDEN. One word of explanation in reference to what was said by the gentleman from Jefferson? The section, as I have offered it, accomplishes the object of the gentleman from Wayne, just as well as his amendment will do. If the Legislature should determine that there shall be five Judges, then one of them can go out in each year.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. NEWMAN, and it was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on adopting the section proposed by the gentleman from Allen (Mr. Borden).

The question being taken, the section was rejected.

Mr. PETTIT. There was a section of this report of the committee on the judiciary, which was laid upon the table, and which I wish should be now taken up. It was section number eight, and it is necessary that we should take it up to make it correspond with section number seven, in which the words "at least twenty" were stricken out. The presumption is, from a vote that was taken yesterday, that we shall have a small number of circuits. The object is, to take it up, so as to strike out the number of terms, leaving it to the Legislature to say what number of terms shall be held.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would observe that the section belongs to another article.

Mr. PETTIT. We had this under consideration this forenoon, when the Convention adjourned on the motion of the gentleman from Dearborn (Mr. Holman).

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know what may be the rule of order in such a case, but a motion was made to take up section No. 8 from the table with the pending amendment, before we adjourned this forenoon; and, pending that motion, a motion was made to adjourn, which was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary says not.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. "Yes, yes," and "that is so," and "the motion was made to take up the section."

Mr. PETTIT. Well, is it in order to move to take it up now?

The PRESIDENT. I suppose the motion to take up the section would be in order, but it is out of the usual practice altogether; it cuts the bill now under consideration in two. There is another section of this bill, and perhaps it would be better to dispose of that before proceeding to other business, as the bill is now before us.

PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

The remaining section of report No. 30 was then read as follows:

"There shall be elected in each judicial circuit by the electors thereof, a prosecuting attorney, who shall hold his office for two years, and until his successors are elected and qualified."

Mr. McCLELLAND. I move to strike out the words, "judicial circuit" and insert the word "county."

Mr. KENT. I move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Randolph on the table.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THORNTON. Although I aided my friend from Randolph in calling for the yeas and nays, I must say that I cannot vote for his proposition.

Mr. NEWMAN. Is it in order to move to lay the section and amendments on the table?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. There is already a motion pending to lay the amendment on the table; and when a motion to lay on the table is made, it has precedence over any other motion to lay on the table that may be offered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the amendment of Mr. McClelland on the table, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 24—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Carter, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hamilton, Harbolt, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, Logan, Mather, Mathis, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Nave, Newman, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—93.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Borden, Bowers, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dick, Duzan, Elliott, Hogin, Kinley, Maguire, March, McClelland, McLean, Murray, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Spann, Tannehill, Wiley, and Work—24.

Mr. MARCH. I propose to amend the section in the following manner: Strike out of the fifth line the words "each judicial circuit," and insert, "in such districts as shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. NEWMAN. I move to lay the section and amendment on the table.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FISHER moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was decided in the affirmative, and,

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ORGANIZATION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. PETTIT. I move now to take up section 8 in report 29, and the pending amendment, for the purpose of amending the section so as to make it correspond with the seventh section.

The motion was agreed to by consent.

The section was read as follows:

"The circuit court shall be composed of one judge only, who shall hold at least three terms every year in each county in his circuit, and shall have such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law."

The amendment proposed by Mr. Holman was also read as follows:

"The circuit court shall be composed of one judge only, who shall hold in every year at least three terms of the circuit court, and three terms of probate court, in each county of his circuit."

Mr. HOVEY moved to amend the amendment by providing that the circuit and probate courts shall be kept separate.

Mr. PETTIT. I believe, sir, that it is in order to move to perfect the section before a motion can be made to strike out. Now I want to perfect it so as to make it correspond with the preceding section. It will be remembered that the committee on the organization of courts recommended the establishment of county courts. Now the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn cannot possibly hitch with this.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not propose occupying the attention of the Convention, or discussing the amendment proposed to the section. I do not propose to enter into any argument as to the propriety of this amendment. The whole subject taken together has been discussed; and if it is to be understood by the remark of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) that the county court system has been adopted, or that it will be adopted, [A voice—"It never will,"] I undertake to say that so far as that goes he is mistaken.

Mr. PETTIT (interrupting). I only say that the Convention ordered the committee to bring in that provision, and the committee is ready to report it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only have to say that the gentleman from Tippecanoe, having explained that so decisive a vote has been taken by the Convention, since the section was referred back, as to leave no doubt upon the mind of any member of this Convention, that the provision as reported back, will not be adopted by this Convention. Between seventy-five and eighty of the members of this Convention have said that the county court system is not the system that we will adopt. Then, Mr. President, but two state of things now remain for the action of this Convention. The first is the adoption of the proposition which I have offered, and which is embodied in the amendment, and the second to leave the judicial system standing now where it has stood for thirty-four years.

And now, sir, it behooves us, as the delegates and representatives of an intelligent people, to determine whether the people expect us to remedy the judicial system or not. If the people have been satisfied with the present probate system, it is the duty of this body to support it. If, on the other hand, they have condemned the system as fraught with evil, then every member of the Convention is called upon by the oath he has taken, to discharge his duty to the State of Indiana, to adopt some other system that will produce better fruits.

Mr. President, what gentleman has occupied this floor in vindication of the probate system, or what gentleman has offered a satisfactory argument against the system which has been proposed and embodied in the amendment? Will any gentleman rise to his feet and state that the probate system now in practice, is better than the one contemplated, or that for the purpose of administering justice, the probate system is as well adapted to that end as the circuit or Supreme Court of your State? Why do we adopt a circuit system at all? Why do we not leave this matter open to legislation? Why adopt a Supreme Court? That is a matter which can be managed by the Legislature as well as any other feature of our judiciary system. Why not then leave it to the Legislature? Is it of more importance to the country that there should be a Supreme or Circuit Courts, than courts in which the whole body of the people are interested? I admit that the wealth of the country is more interested in the Supreme or Circuit system than the poverty of the country—more interested than widows and orphans are. But, sir, there is a large portion of the community who are interested in these humble courts—made humble through the action of the Legislature; and the question now is—"Is it proper for us to attempt to remedy that system so as to produce better results in future?"

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Convention to one fact stated by the gentleman from Posey, this morning. The Legislature of the State of Indiana, have said to the State—"We recognize the probate court as so incompetent for its jurisdiction, as not to risk any of our school or other funds upon real estate, the title of which is derived through an executor's or administrator's sale." Now, what is the result of the argument on this subject? It is this—that while the Legislature perpetuates a system in the State, that says that the titles conveyed by that court, for want of sufficient capacity in its presiding officer, are so defective that they cannot be received by the State as security for the funds that may be loaned to our people.

Now, sir, it is proposed by the system which I have presented to the Convention, that there shall be two terms of the circuit court held in each year, and three terms of the probate court, which are to be held separate. Will any one say that a judge of a county court, even with a salary of $500 a year, will be as competent to transact this business as a judge of a circuit court with whom you trust your property and your lives? That judge will be competent; the people will take care of that, because they invest him with jurisdiction over everything that is dear in life.

The gentlemen from Tippecanoe will offer his amendment. All that I ask is a direct vote on the proposition I have made. If the Convention deems it its duty to leave this matter where it has stood for thirty-four years, of course they will do it; but if gentlemen believe that there should be a reform in the system, then their duty to their constituents requires that that reform should be made. All I ask is a direct vote upon the amendment.

Mr. HOVEY proposed the following amendment to the amendment:

"The General Assembly may, after the year 1860, abolish the probate court, as organized in this article, and confer the jurisdiction thereof on such other courts as may be organized."

Mr. H. said that this would give a fair opportunity of testing the plan proposed by the gentleman from Dearborn; and that if it should be found to be inconvenient or not to produce the results anticipated, the Legislature would have power to transfer the business to other hands.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion. I hope the Convention will not conclude itself in regard to its action on this matter without having submitted to it in detail something like another system. I understand the gentleman from Dearborn to wish to force upon the Convention directly either the one system or the other—that inasmuch as the Convention has rejected the proposed County Court system they will have no other. Now I believe that the Convention are willing to look round and see if there is not some system that may be made applicable to the case. I object most strenuously to the idea that nothing but a Circuit Court is to suit the people with regard to this probate business. If you adopt that court you will compel every individual to employ a lawyer in order to make his appearance there. ["Consent."]

Mr. HOLMAN. In other words the gentleman means to say that no man can appear before a learned man without having a lawyer with him; but that he may appear before a blockhead with impunity. [A laugh.]

Mr. MORRISON. We all know that the rules of court are such as to prohibit a common man from appearing even in his own case.

Mr. SHERROD. I move to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The yeas and nays were demanded, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Dearborn.

Mr. WOLFE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. WALPOLE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, they resulted as follows—yeas 78, nays 47:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Bicknell, Biddle, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Celfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Howe, Huff, Johnson, of D., Jones, Kent, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimby, Wiley, Wolte, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—78.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Bascom, Blythe, Borden, Carter, Clements, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Johnson of O., Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, McFarland, Milroy, Morgan, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Steele, Thomas, Toda, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, and Work—47.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. PETTIT. I now offer the following as a substitute for the section.

"The Circuit Courts shall consist of one judge only, and shall have such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law."

It seems to me that it must be plain that we should make that amendment. The section as reported by the committee, provides that there shall be three terms in a year. We have stricken out the twenty Circuit Courts and left the number to be determined by the Legislature; but they may make so few of them that it would be impossible to hold three terms in each circuit. I think therefore that we should leave the number of the terms to be held, to be fixed by the Legislature, who will no doubt arrange it so as to harmonize with the number of courts that they may decide upon.

Mr. BASCOM moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word "only."

Mr. KENT moved to lay the amendment to the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN proposed to amend the amendment by striking out and inserting the following:

"The State shall be divided into a suitable number of circuits for the decision of causes relating to the probate of last wills and testaments, and the settlement of decedents' estates, and also into a suitable number of circuits for the transaction of other business."

Mr. SHERROD. I move to lay that amendment on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, with the following result—yeas 86, nays 36:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Badger, Barbour, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenowith, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Edmonston, Elliott, Fisher, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Goozee, Gordon, Haddon, Hall, Helm, Hendricks, Huff, Johnson of O., Jones, Kent, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Sherrod, Smiley, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Wiley, Wolfe, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—86.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Ballingall, Blythe, Borden, Carter, Dunn of Perry, Farrow, Foley, Frisbie, Graham of Miami, Gregg, Hamilton, Harboit, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Johnson of D., Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, Milroy, Morgan, Prather, Shannon, Sims, Snook, Steele, Thomas, Todd, Walpole, Watts, Wheeler, and Work—36.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. WOLFE. I am quite satisfied with the expressions of opinion which the Convention has given in regard to this matter. I am also satisfied that we have spent time enough about it, and that the Convention are content to remain where they are. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. WALPOLE. I hope the gentleman from Sullivan will withdraw the call for the previous question. The gentleman from Parke had an amendment to offer. I believe he had it ready.

The question was taken on sustaining the call for the previous question, and a division being asked, there were—ayes 62, noes 54.

So the previous question was sustained, and the main question was, by consent, ordered to be now put.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the section be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. PETTIT. No it is not; it is on my proposition to strike out.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Tippecanoe is right. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tippecanoe to strike out the section and insert what was read.

The question was then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Pettit, and it was agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it in order now, Mr. President, to move an additional section?

The PRESIDENT. No sir.

REPORT 31—NEGRO SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in the orders of the day is report No. 31, on its second reading.

The report was read as follows: "No negro, or mulatto, shall have the right of suffrage."

Mr. THORNTON. I move to indefinitely postpone the section, because we have already provided that none but white male citizens shall vote. [Loud cries of "No, no, no," and "Let it pass," "It can do no harm," &c.]

Mr. THORNTON. Well, I will withdraw the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

The article was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in the orders of the day is article No. 32, on its second reading.

The article was read by the Secretary as follows:

"There shall be no imprisonment for debt except in case of fraud."

The question being taken, the article was adopted, and, by consent, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DUELLING.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is article No. 33, on its second reading.

The article was read as follows:

"Every person who shall give or accept a challenge to fight a duel, or who shall knowingly carry to another person a challenge to fight a duel, or who shall agree to go out of the State to fight a duel, shall be ineligible to hold any office of trust or profit."

Mr. MILROY. I move to lay the article on the table. [Cries of "No, no, no," and "Consent, consent."]

The question being taken on the motion to lay the article on the table, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the article be indefinitely postponed. ["No, no, no."]

The motion to postpone indefinitely was not agreed to.

The section was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LAW REFORM.

The PRESIDENT. The next business in order is article No. 34.

The article was read by the Secretary as follows:

"The General Assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall provide for the appointment of three Commissioners, whose duty it shall be to revise, reform, simplify, and abridge, the rules and practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings, both civil and criminal, of the Courts in this State. And they shall provide for the abolition of the distinct forms of action at law now in use; and that justice may be administered in a uniform mode of pleading, without reference to any distinction between law and equity. And the General Assembly may also make it the duty of said Commissioners to reduce into a SYSTEMATIC CODE, the General Statute Law of this State; and said Commissioners shall, from time to time, report the result of their labors to the General Assembly, with such recommendations and suggestions as to abridgement and amendment, as to said Commissioners may seem necessary. Provision shall be made by law, for filling vacancies, regulating the tenure of office, and the compensation of said Commissioners."

Mr. WALPOLE. Mr. President, I am entirely opposed to this proposition. I want the law-making power of the State to be vested in the General Assembly, and not to be conferred upon three irresponsible Commissioners. We have already had a little experience, in Indiana, in arranging our statutes, which cost the State from five to ten thousand dollars; and no two lawyers can agree as to the interpretation of the statutes, as thus revised. If you go back prior to 1843, you will find that every statute is understood by lawyers. But since that time, your statutes, as revised, have been an unintelligible mass of confusion.

Sir, this is a mere measure to give employment to three men, from year to year, at a stated salary—a measure from which no practical good can result to the people. Sir, I want none of your Connecticut, nor New York, nor Yankee modes of improving our law practice. It may answer well enough for the people of the East, who are determined to try experiments, at all hazards and at whatever cost, but I think it will hardly suit the tastes of the people of Indiana. I move to lay the article upon the table.

Mr. WATTS. Will the gentleman from Hancock withdraw that motion for a moment? I have an amendment I would like to offer.

Mr. WALPOLE. Most certainly, if the gentleman from Dearborn thinks he can amend it.

Mr. WATTS. I propose to amend the article by adding the following:

"And hereafter, every legal voter of good moral standing shall be allowed to practice law."

A VOICE. Did the gentleman from Dearborn say "every negro voter"? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATTS. Yes, if the gentleman can find any.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to indefinitely postpone the article and the proposed amendment.

A MEMBER. No sir-ee; you can't do it. [A laugh.]

Mr. COOKERLY. This is a very important matter, and it does seem to me that the Convention should not hurry over it in this way. I do not wonder at some gentlemen here being very anxious to hurry over this matter, for it contemplates a great reformation; and there are many gentlemen on this floor, I am sorry to say, who are not only unwilling to reform that which needs reformation, but who would even go back from the position we now occupy. Sir, this article contemplates what I regard as a very desirable reform in the practice of the law. So far as the codification is concerned, I care nothing about that; but so far as regards a reform in the practice, I am decidedly in favor of it. When, however, I consider the quarter from which this opposition emanates, I am not surprised to see one gentleman get up and make a long and windy speech against this reformation, and another gentleman, also a member of the bar, get up and propose an amendment, with the view of turning the proposition into ridicule. It is only members of the bar, who desire to stick to the old mode of practice that are opposed to all reformation.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I offer the following amendment—

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to offer any amendment. The question is to indefinitely postpone the article and the pending amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. I am very sorry, Mr. President, that the client of my friend over the way was so unfortunate as to employ a lawyer who was not capable of distinguishing whether his remedy was at law or in chancery. [Great laughter.]

My object in making the motion for the indefinite postponement of this article is because there is nothing in it. The Legislature has the power to do everything which we ask to be done in this article. I am willing to leave the question with them, and if the people desire that this reform should be made, it will unquestionably be done by the Legislature, under the instructions of the people. Sir, if it were necessary to have anything in the fundamental law in regard to this subject, three lines are all that is necessary, either to abolish the distinction between the different forms of action, or the distinction between law and equity. And yet, sir, by this section, three commissioners are to be appointed, at a compensation, no doubt, which will be an exorbitant tax upon the people, for doing that which the Legislature ought to do themselves, and which they might do by one simple act.

If the motion to indefinitely postpone should fail, then gentlemen can offer their amendments; or if the amendment of my friend from Randolph is to strike out the article, I will withdraw my motion to indefinitely postpone.

The motion to indefinitely postpone was withdrawn.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. President, if there be any one thing more than another, in which our people are interested, it is in this question of law reform. And I must here be allowed to say that they and I are very much obliged to the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) for the very talented manner in which he has discussed this question in favor of the popular side. And, sir, I now appeal to the lay members of this Convention to come forward and sustain us in this movement, for I assure them it is one of vast importance to the interests of every man in the State.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, and you can have the clergy with you, too.

Mr. BLYTHE. I offer the following amendment—

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, unless the gentleman from Vanderburgh wishes to amend the amendment.

Mr. BLYTHE. I will explain the object of my amendment, Mr. President, and offer it at the proper time, if it is not now in order.

Mr. WATTS. I will withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. BLYTHE. The gentleman from Dearborn having withdrawn his amendment, I will offer one which I hope may meet with the approbation of the Convention. I propose to amend by striking out, in the second line, all after the word "shall," to the word "revise" in the third line, and also all the residue of the section after the word "equity" in the seventh line. The section, as I propose to amend it, will then read:

"The General Assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall reform, simplify, and abridge the rules and practice, pleading, forms, and proceeding, both civil and criminal, of the courts of this State. And they shall provide for the abolition of the distinct forms of action at law, now in use; and that justice may be administered in a uniform mode of pleading, without reference to any distinction between law and equity."

Mr. President, there is no gentleman in this Convention who is willing to go further than I am willing to go, in order to bring about a salutary, and what we all conceive to be a necessary reform in the practice of law. Sir, the evils complained of exist in the separation of the several forms of action, and in the establishment of two different tribunals—one a court of law, and the other a court of equity. There is no necessity whatever for these distinctions, and the amendment which I offer abolishes forever the distinction between law and equity, as well as the distinction between the several forms of action at law.

The only natural distinction is that which is now recognized by the law between actions which are founded upon contracts, and those which are founded upon torts. This distinction is the only one necessary to enable us to administer justice in the mode in which it ought to be administered.

I regret, sir, that it should be thought, and charged, that so many members of the bar stand in the way of these reforms. Sir, I do not believe that one solitary legal man in this Convention has any such disposition. You may review the course of the Convention, from the day of its organization to the present time, and you cannot point to one instance in which the members of the bar have held back upon any salutary and proper reform. We are willing to go as far as any men can rationally be expected to go in these reforms. We are willing to break down forever the absurd distinctions between the several forms of action, and the distinction between courts of law and equity, and in these alone are found the evils complained of. But as the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) has said, I am unwilling that commissioners should be appointed for the purpose of doing that which any committee of intelligent lawyers in the Legislature can do in three days, and for the additional purpose of revising our laws. The last revision of our statutes was by commissioners, and so miserably was the work done, that scarcely a lawyer can now tell what the law is.

Mr. BORDEN. That is the very reason why our statutes should be again revised.

Mr. BLYTHE. That is the very reason why they should not be revised by commissioners. Now if you will not provide commissioners for this purpose, why provide them for the purpose of abolishing the several forms of action. Sir, a common sense Legislature, in a session of five lines, can accomplish every thing which we propose. We want no commissioner or salaried officer to do that; we want no set of men, other than those who compose the Legislature, to get together and revise the laws of the State for us.

But, Mr. President, if I mistake not, this section reported by the committee goes further than this. It looks beyond the revision of the statutes; it looks beyond the abolition of the distinct forms of action, and provides in the future for the complete codification of your laws. Sir, that is a point to which I hope we will never go. There is no necessity for it. All that we can seek to accomplish—all that we can desire should be accomplished—can be effected by the amendment which I have offered. Commence your work of codification, complete it, and you yourselves will live to curse the hour when it was undertaken.

Mr. PETTIT. With the indulgence of the Convention, I would like to address them for a few moments on this subject. I am in favor of the principle proposed here, and in favor of the best mode of carrying it into operation; and I will say, that in my opinion, the best way to do so, is to appoint commissioners for the purpose. And now, if the Convention will indulge me, I will say why. Mr. President, I not only concur in all that has been said by the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) but I would if possible, use even stronger language than he has used, in condemnation of the absurdities found in our present system of legal practice. I do not undertake to repudiate the pure principles of the common law. I am not for abrogating that law which is a protection to us all. It is not the spirit nor the policy of the law, which is our security while awake and asleep—which is our safeguard, whether at the hymeneal altar or in the bridal bed, whether at our firesides or at our daily avocations—that I would seek to change. I would not touch one scintilla of that law; but I would make the road to the court of justice open and plain, through which all may see the object before them, and upon which all may travel with unerring certainty and safety.

A more ridiculous system for the administration of justice never was devised by man or men, than the system of the practice of the common law of England, and of the United States. [Applause.] Sir, let me give this Convention one single illustration. It is one that was often put by my colleague, to the people of our county, during the canvass. Having it in a book, he read it with much more effect than I shall be able to relate it. The case was something like this: A. shall go to B. and steal his watch from under his pillow, or take it out of his pocket, and run away with it. All of you would say that he had stolen the watch; but the common law says that B may waive the tort, and sue A in an action of assumpsit. In such a case, his declaration would be to this effect: "I, B, complain of A, that I sold him a watch of the value of a hundred dollars, and he refuses to pay for it, and I want a judgment," &c. This is the practice, and B may recover in such a suit. But what does A say in reply? He comes into court and pleads "non-assumpsit"—that is, that he did not undertake to pay for the watch. Now look at the position in which our mode of practice places these parties. Everything that the thief has said is true, while everything that the plaintiff has said is a lie. That is the fact. The plaintiff is compelled to tell a lie, and the man who has committed the felony tells the truth. That, sir, is the practice, and many such cases have I tried.

Mr. THORNTON. Action of trover.

Mr. PETTIT. Yes, action of trover; and, in fact, the whole round of actions. I might show the absurdity of the practice in the whole of them, but I will not trouble the Convention. Sir, there are too many hedges to climb over, in order to get into your courts. Look, for example, at your action of ejectment. Say that my friend from Floyd has rented me his farm for three years, and I keep it the fourth, and will not give it up. He brings an action of ejectment, and, instead of saying A complains of B, that he has got his farm, and refuses to give up possession, he goes and complains that John Doe has the farm of Richard Roe [laughter]. Why, sir, I never tried an action of ejectment yet, but it took me half an hour or more to make the jury understand that these are fictitious names. Sir, the whole thing is perfectly ridiculous. There is no necessity for this at all; and I would swap the whole of these absurdities away, and open the road to the pure fountains of justice so plain, that "a way-faring man, though a fool, need not err therein."

Now, one word more. I want to say to the laymen of this Convention, what, in my judgment, is the best way to accomplish this great and desirable object—an object which we all wish to accomplish, and which ought to be accomplished. How shall we do it? By leaving it to the Legislature, or by appointing a commissioner. Now, sir, while I candidly admit that I am unwilling to create more offices than are necessary, I am quite willing to create as many as are necessary. The question is, can your Legislature do this, or will you leave it to be done by them, and thus defeat the object you have in view—for defeated it most certainly would be. Look at the matter; you have fixed the term during which your Legislature shall sit to sixty days in every other year; and I say to you that no Legislature nor any commission can make the necessary revision and reform, either in four or in six months. I do not desire that a commission should be appointed to enter into a general revision of the law, but merely a revision of the practice of the law. I seek not to destroy the law, but to improve the way to get at it. Now, ask yourselves the question, whether your Legislature can do the work, limited, as they are, to sixty days in every other year? In every other State of the Union, where this reform has been made, it has been found necessary to appoint a commission to do it. It has taken them some months to accomplish it. And, sir, let me say that this is a work which never can be done by your Legislature; and more than that, the whole project will be defeated unless you pass the section requiring the appointment of these commissioners. How can men, who know nothing of the old practice, remedy the defects in it? The members of the Legislature most certainly cannot do it; they have not time to do it; and I will assert further, that there is not a member of the legal profession in this Convention, who will say that it can be done by any other means than by that of a commission. As for the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Blythe,) if you adopt it, you might just as well strike out the whole section.

Mr. HALL. I was in the committee on the practice of law and law reform, when this report was adopted, and I must say that it was one which was well matured by the committee. They had this report under consideration at some four or five successive meetings, for the purpose of putting it in such a form as would be most likely to meet the wishes of the Convention, and effect the object designed. The majority of the committee adopted this section, and I was one of that majority. I have no hesitation in saying that this is the very section the Convention ought to adopt, if they wish to carry out this object of law reform. I know, indeed, that the chairman of that committee did not concur in this report, and presented a minority report to the Convention. In that minority report, I could not, of course, concur. I thought it was wrong, and I still think it wrong; and I now express my opinion, that, if gentlemen desire a thorough reform in this respect, they ought to pass the section as it is, for I fear that if we undertake to amend it, we will only make it worse. If the Convention should refuse to determine that this work shall be done by commissioners, I am pretty well satisfied that it will never be accomplished at all. Sir, it is utterly impossible for the Legislature to make such changes as are contemplated by this section, and such as the people call for.

Mr. KELSO. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Vanderburgh, (Mr. Blythe,) because it leaves this matter discretionary with the Legislature.

Whenever any proposition is made here, with the view of securing the rights of the widow and the orphan, then gentlemen say that this is a subject with which the Convention has nothing to do, but it is to be left to the Legislature. I am in favor of leaving this matter to the Legislature. I do not care how much they simplify the practice; I do not care how soon they break down the distinction between actions, or between law and equity; there is nothing that can be done in the way of change in any of these respects, that will not result in making more money for the lawyers, than they now make. But, sir, if we are to trust to the judgment of Legislatures that are to follow us, in regard to such matters as the settlement of decedents' estates, why may we not also leave this matter to the Legislature?

Now, sir, I deny the propriety of appointing a commission, as contemplated by that section—a commission that will be appointed from year to year, without limit, and at a salary, if we may judge of the future by the past, of at least six thousand dollars for the three. Sir, we once had commissioners, and we have had the fruits of their labors, and let me ask gentlemen whether those fruits are worth one-tenth of the price we paid for them. And what reason have we to hope that we will get any better commissioners now, than we had before? Undoubtedly the best men were selected that could be found to do the work.

Now, in regard to the difference in the forms of action, the gentleman from Tippecanoe has put a case which he has by no means put fairly. In the very case that he puts, I say that the plaintiff tells the truth, and the defendant the falsehood.

A DELEGATE. I cannot see how you make that out.

Mr. KELSO. I make it out very easily, only you do not understand it. Now, if I go to my neighbor and say I would like to have his horse, and I ask him what he is worth, and he replies that he is worth $50, and I say "very well, I am satisfied that he is worth fifty dollars," and I then take him home with me; have I made any promise to pay the man for the horse? No, sir, I have not promised to pay one cent. Yet the law raises the presumption that I made the promise, because I was told the price of the horse, and I did not object to it. I knew it was his property, and I take it, knowing what he asked for it.

Now, if the gentleman's proposition is correct, I never did promise to pay, and shall I cheat the man out of his horse? I think the law is right in raising the presumption that I made the promise. The positions of the parties are the very reverse of that stated by the gentleman from Tippecanoe; and if that gentleman's colleague read the case from a book, and presented it to his constituents in a stronger light than the gentleman himself has presented it here, all I have to say, is, that I should very much like to see the case. Why, sir, the common sense of the matter is with the position that the man promised to pay. Then, sir, how would you change it for the better? You cannot do it. You cannot make such a code of law as will make every man bind himself to do certain things. You must take the common sense meaning of the thing. You must take the action of the man, and, by force of law, raise the presumption of a promise. That is the only way by which you can arrive at a just mode of practice. I care not how far the Convention or the Legislature may reform this matter; for there is very little doubt, in my estimation, that, when this new scheme has been tried for twelve months, there will be a most anxious desire, on the part of all parties, to retrace their steps.

The gentleman from Floyd says that the people in his county were very anxious to have the change. I will venture to assert, Mr. President, if we could only get at the truth, that that gentleman and his worthy colleague, were the first that put the idea into their heads. It has been said that it is dangerous to become wise above the law, and yet, in seeking to adopt this new fangled system, we are running into that very danger.

Now, with regard to admitting every man to practice at the bar, I have no objection to that whatever. I say admit every man, and every woman, too, if you please. The more pettifoggers we can get into our courts, the more money your good lawyers will make. I am quite willing that every man should practice law. And if there are not men enough to break down the bar by their practice, let the women have a chance at it, too.

But, sir, in all seriousness, it occurs to me that this is a matter which ought to be left to the Legislature, for them to exercise their wisdom and judgment upon. And let me here remark, that, if it is the practice only that is to be remedied, the Legislature can do it in one week, at any time. Let it, then, be left to them, and not force them with the "shall" in your Constitution, to establish three salaried officers, to remain in the State for six, eight, or ten years, at a cost of some six thousand dollars a year.

Mr. FLOYD. I am not a lawyer, nor did I originate the term "lay delegates," as used here. The phrase came from another gentleman.

My worthy friend from Switzerland is very cunning. He says that the members of the bar will make money by their practice, if the present mode of practice be reformed. Now how does he propose to do this? Why he suggests that it should be left to the Legislature. And who will the Legislature be? Why, sir, undoubtedly the majority of them will be lawyers, and will not do it. Now if we want this reform to be done, we reformers must come right up to the work at once ["consent."] There is a great deal of ingenuity in this cry of "leave it to the Legislature." Gentlemen are very willing now to leave a good deal to the Legislature, whereas some time ago they were scarcely willing to leave them a single vestige of legislative authority. This, Mr. President, is a reform which the people most urgently want, and I hope it will be adopted. I therefore move to lay the amendment of the gentleman from Vandenburg on the table.

Mr. KELSO. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Badger, Bascom, Beard, Berry, Biddle, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Clark of Hamilton, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Edmonston, Elliott, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbott, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, May, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Niles, Owen, Pettit, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—90.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beeson, Blythe, Brookbank, Bryant, Chenowith, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Davis of Madison, Dunn of Jefferson, Duzan, Foster, Frisbie, Helmer, Hendricks, Hitt, Holman, Hovey, Kelso, Kilgore, Kinley, Lockhart, McClelland, McLean, Milligan, Morgan, Nave, Newman, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Read of Clark, Ritchey, Shannon, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Walpole, and Watts—41.

So the amendment was laid upon the table.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. I move to amend the article by striking out all after the word "equity," and inserting:

"The said commissioners shall report from time to time the result of their labors, and provision shall be made by law for filling vacancies in, and regulating the tenure of the office, and the compensation of the said commissioners."

Mr. SHOUP moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HOVEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. NAVE. Before the vote is taken upon the proposition, I wish to give the reasons why I shall vote against it. I am utterly opposed to making innovations upon the long established principles and practice of the law by which justice has been administered from century to century, to the inhabitants of the country, not because I expect to lose anything by such change, but because this innovation would, in my opinion, work much evil to the country, as I could show beyond question, if the Convention would give me its attention for a short time. [Much confusion and impatience.] I will not detain the Convention; I merely rose to contrast the workings of the system proposed in other States, with our present mode of practice. Look at Kentucky, which once stood high in the opinion of every legal gentleman of the nation. Where does she stand now? Certainly far behind the State of Indiana in reference to the decisions of her supreme court. Look again at New York, which once stood higher than any State in the Confederacy, whose opinions were the law in every court in this country, and in Kentucky, and elsewhere. And what is she now, in regard to this matter, compared to what she was a few years ago? Why, sir, their decisions are mere things that no lawyer dare refer to as a legal decision by which a court should be governed. I hope, sir, this "reform," as it is called, will not be effected. This eternal tinkering with the administration of justice will work an evil to the State if persisted in.

Sir, what do we propose to do? We were called here to amend the Constitution, and the Legislature appropriated forty thousand dollars for that purpose. And where do we stand now? If you create these three commissioners for the purpose of revising and codifying the law, I ask you when they will get through with their work, and what the Legislature will say about their pay? The people, sir, are not prepared to incur such an expense. Sir, we have had commissioners before, and I then had the honor of voting against the appointments for that purpose. And what is that revision now that we have got it? Why, sir, it is a perfect thing—a disgrace to the State—and if you appoint the commissioners as proposed in this section, have we any evidence that the thing will be any better? [Uproar.]

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Convention adjourn.

The Convention then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JAN. 21, 1851.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MEYERS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SUPREME COURTS.

Mr. PETTIT, from the committee on the organization of courts of justices, reported back the section (amended as directed by the Convention) which provides for the election of not less than three, nor more than five, judges of the supreme court, a majority of whom to form a quorum, and to hold their offices for six years, if they shall so long behave well, to reside in districts to be formed by the Legislature, and to be elected by the people of the whole State.

The question being, Shall the section pass?

Mr. COLFAX moved to re-commit the same with instructions to amend so that the judges shall be elected in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. COLFAX. The proposition I have offered may not be in favor with a majority of the Convention. The gentleman from Tippecanoe yesterday set us the example of an honorable compromise on the subject of the Grand Jury system. I desire to follow in his footsteps. The committee on the organization of courts of justice, or a majority of them, originally reported a section providing that the judges shall reside in separate districts, and be elected by a majority of the electors of the district. This House on one day affirmed the report of the committee by the apparently decisive majority of twenty-eight; but, on a subsequent day, by a majority of nine, that vote was changed, and a provision adopted, that, although they should reside in districts, they should be elected by the votes of the whole State. It appears to me there might be cases when it would be improper to require the whole State to elect a judge—when it became necessary, for instance, to fill a vacancy for a single year, occasioned by death or resignation. It would be entailing upon the State a needless expense, to call out the whole State to elect a judge for the fragment of a term, who must, by the Constitution, reside in a certain district, and who might as well be elected by the voters thereof. It seems to me it would be better to leave this matter to the Legislature, with full powers to dispose of it as we have decided that they might dispose of the Grand Jury question. I move that the section be re-committed, with instructions to strike out that part of the section which declares positively that the judges shall be elected by the whole State, and insert in lieu thereof that they shall be elected in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

Mr. COOKERLY suggested to the gentleman from St. Joseph to amend his instructions so that the judges shall not be positively required to live in separate districts. If this was done, he said he would vote for the proposition, if not, he could not possibly vote for it.

Mr. PETTIT. I have a word to say in reference to this matter, if no other gentleman desires to address the Convention.

Sir, if this were not a principle of paramount consideration with me, I should yield to the proposition of the gentleman, but it is neither more nor less than abandoning the idea of the people choosing their own officers. Are those over whom their jurisdiction is extended to be debarred from the right of electing them? The jurisdiction of the Supreme Judges extends all over the State. It extends to Lawrence county as well as to Tippecanoe and Randolph, or elsewhere, and each citizen should have a voice in their selection. You never can give satisfaction to the people of the State by placing officers over them in whose selection they have no voice.

The gentleman from St. Joseph says, if it should become necessary to elect a judge to fill a vacancy, you must call the people out all over the State, and put them to great inconvenience. Let me say to the gentleman and to the Convention, that labor and perpetual watchfulness are the price of liberty, and without these, liberty cannot be secured and preserved. The people expect every year to go to the polls and elect their officers. Sir, a republican government is the most expensive of all governments, and it may well be so, for it imparts a million-fold more advantages and blessings than all others; and those who receive these advantages ought not to find fault at a little additional expense.

If you would avoid the trouble and expense of electing your rulers, why, instead of electing a President of the United States, let Queen Victoria, or the Emperor Nicholas of Russia, rule over you. I ask the Convention if it is right that the people over whom authority is extended should elect the officer who exercises the authority. If it be right, let us do it; if it be wrong, let us give up our right to select our officers to somebody else. But it is what the people have claimed of us—to give them the opportunity to select their judges. I hope the session will not be re-committed, but that it will pass.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. The gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit) seems to think it would be a great outrage, if every elector in the State should not have the right to vote for all the judges of the Supreme Court. I would ask him which is the more important right, that of voting for those who create the laws, or for those who interpret the laws? If the gentleman will follow his argument to its legitimate conclusions, consistency will require him to insist upon the election of members of the General Assembly by general ticket. What is the duty of the Supreme Court? It is simply to decide what is the law. If, then, it is indispensable to the safety of the citizen, that he should have a vote in the election of each of the judges of the Supreme Court, how much more important is it that he should have the right of voting for each and all of the members of that department of the Government whose enactments affect his enjoyments of life, liberty, and property.

I am somewhat curious to know, moreover, how the gentleman reconciles his vote for the election of the circuit judges by the electors of their respective circuits, with his argument for the election of the judges of the Supreme Court by general ticket. Does he intend that no citizen shall be required to answer to any action, except before the judge of his own circuit? If he does not, then what becomes of the important right of the citizen to have a voice in the election of the judge who is to decide upon his rights?

But, sir, I have not arisen to debate this question, for that is useless. I know this Convention will sustain the views of the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and will decide in favor of the election of the judges of the Supreme Court by general ticket; and I take this as the most convenient mode of entering my protest against that decision. I believe it will degrade the highest tribunal in the State, and make it a mere convenient place for retiring, broken down politicians. If the judges are elected by general ticket, they will be made by caucus nominations at the capital. These places, like all the other important offices in the State, will constitute a part of the stock of trading politicians, and will become a matter of bargain and sale. You will have a Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Auditor, Treasurer, and Secretary of State, and other officers, to elect at the same time you elect your supreme judges. The nominations of these various officers will be made in this city, and in the general scramble for place, qualifications will not be of so much consideration as the number of votes in the nominating caucus—the candidates for judges may be able to control for or against candidates for other nominations. It is not hard to predict who will win at this game. It will be those whom long experience has made familiar with the appliances that can be successfully employed on such occasions. The wily politicians will bear off the offices, if not the honors. The lawyer, who has devoted his life to the laborious study and practice of his profession, who has stood aloof from the excitement and dissipation of party politics, and is, therefore eminently qualified for a place on the Supreme bench of the State, will be oversloughed by men who never had a respectable circuit court practice. But, sir, if the judges are elected by districts not corresponding with any other political divisions in the State, and the candidates are known to the people of the district, I do not doubt but that the people will endeavor to make judicious selections. There will not, in such a case, be so much opportunity for political combinations and caucus dictation. Men will, I trust, be selected with a reference to their qualifications to discharge the duties of that high station. The people will not willingly and knowingly place upon the Supreme bench, a man to whose care, as a lawyer, they would not confide an important suit. But how can the people in one part of the State be acquainted with the character of lawyers in a remote part of the State? Lawyers do not become generally known to the people of the State, like politicians.

And, sir, I very much fear another evil will result from the election of the judges by general ticket, and all at the same time. I fear that great questions of law will be decided at the ballot box—that the popular side of legal questions will be mounted as hobbies, to carry the riders to the Supreme bench. Heretofore we have had just occasion to be proud of the high reputation of our Supreme Court. I am afraid the Supreme Court, under the new organization, will have a reputation, both at home and abroad, that will afford us but little occasion of congratulation.

Mr. EDMONDSTON. I did not intend to say a single word to-day, in reference to the subject, and would not but for the remark of the gentleman from Jefferson, that if your Supreme Judges are elected by the State at large, you will have politicians elected to preside in the Supreme Court, but if you elect by districts, politicians will not be elected. According to the gentleman's argument, there is no political excitement except at the holding of State elections. There must be a source somewhere from which all the political influence and excitement of the State emanates. Now, sir, I can say and I think I shall be borne out in the assertion, that there is as much political excitement in proportion to numbers, in each and every one of the districts, as there is in the whole State, on the occasion of an election. I ask the gentleman whether the Supreme Court, which he is about to organize, is amenable to the district only, or to the whole State, whether it adjudicates upon matters belonging to the districts only, or whether its decisions affect the entire State, without regard to subdivisions. He must admit that the judges are amenable to the State at large, and that their decisions affect the whole community. Are the members of this Convention willing that a man shall exercise authority over them, shall adjudicate upon their persons and property, whom they have no voice in choosing. I appeal to the gentleman's own judgment and ask him if he is willing that a court shall have power over him and his, that he has no agency either directly or indirectly in creating.

Mr. DUNN. Every citizen will have a voice inasmuch as he will be called upon to vote for some one of the judges.

Mr. EDMONSTON. Well, sir, there are five judges to be elected. The voter will have then, one-fifth part of the rights of a freeman in this particular. Is the gentleman willing to take that? If he is he has not the spirit that I believe he has. I do contend that as the Supreme Court of the State is amenable to, and exercises authority over the whole State at large, every individual in the State, who has a right to cast a vote, should have a right to cast that vote for those who present themselves for election to the Supreme Bench. The districting system is only proposed for the purpose of distributing these officers among the various sections of the State, that they shall not all reside in one part of the State. This is a principle that I will support, and I insist that it is a principle that should be permanently established, and it is a right which, in my judgment, the people of the State will never surrender. It is a matter which is to affect not only this generation, but generations to come, and you say to the voters of the State, you shall not vote for the judge who is to administer the laws unless he resides in your district, and then you shall be permitted to exercise one-fifth part of the rights of a freeman. I ask the gentleman if he is willing to district the State for the election of Governor and Lieutenant Governor? No man, I apprehend, would presume to propose anything so absurd. Then, sir, I for one, the whole people of the State being interested in a Supreme Court, maintain that the whole people should have the right to choose the judges who are to preside over that court.

Mr. COOKERLY moved to amend the instructions, so as to strike out all that requires the judges to live in separate districts.

It seems to me, sir, said Mr. C., very strange and very inconsistent that we should require the judges to live in certain portions of the State, and yet that they should be elected by the whole State. I can see no consistency in this. Gentlemen all admit that it is a State court; and if their arguments are correct in this respect, as I believe, that being a State court, they should be elected by the whole people. Why do they require that each judge shall live in one particular district, in one particular portion of the State? Now, I ask the gentleman from Tippecanoe, and all who advocate his proposition, why is it necessary that the judges should live in a certain district?

Mr. PETTIT. I stated the reasons the other day.

Mr. COOKERLY. I can see no reason why they should be confined to districts if they are to be elected by the whole people. If my amendment should be voted down, and the proposition requiring the judges to live in certain districts be retained, I shall be in favor of their being elected by those districts. If I had understood the question the other day, I should have voted against the re-commitment. The gentleman says the reason why this proposition is made is, that these judges shall be distributed over the State. If so, why not permit them to be elected by those portions of the State where they reside? I wish to be distinctly understood in regard to this question. I say I am in favor of electing the judges by the whole people; but I tell you now, that if you do not strike out that part which requires that the judges shall reside in certain districts, I shall be compelled to vote against the proposition.

Mr. McCLELLAND. Is it in order to amend?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. There is an amendment already pending to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Vigo.

Mr. WALPOLE. I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from St. Joseph. He proposes that the judges shall be elected in the manner prescribed by the General Assembly. If it be made a subject for the action of the Legislature, they may change the mode of election from time to time, as parties change.

One party will establish one mode and when another party comes in they will change it to another mode, and after a little while it will be changed back again, and so on. It is a thing that I cannot consent to. I want the mode and manner of electing judges unalterably fixed. I can never consent that the people of one district shall elect one judge, and the people of another district shall elect another. As has been remarked by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, their decisions are the law of the land, and men living in one part of the State are as much interested in them as those living in another. The administration of the laws should be uniform, and every individual who is bound by the decision of these judges should have a voice in their selection.

Mr. COLFAX. A few words, sir, in reply to the gentlemen from Tippecanoe. This section, in its present form, as reported back from the committee, provides that the Legislature SHALL elect the State. This is made the imperative duty of the Legislature. When they perform that duty, if my amendment should prevail, they could then decide according to the will of the people, whether the judges shall be elected by the vote of the people of the whole State or not. When it is conceded, as appears to be generally conceded here, that judges should reside in separate districts, what wrong could there be in providing that those who know him best—who can best judge of his qualifications and merits—his talents and worth, should decide, which one of the rival candidates residing in that district should be elected. And if they are to be elected by the whole State, why do not gentlemen, to be consistent, provide that the electors of the State shall have privilege of choosing their bench from the best judicial talent of the State, without being confined to electing them from separate districts? When gentlemen concede that they shall reside in districts, it seems to me that they give up the argument.

But the instructions that I have offered virtually submits the matter to the decision of the people. If they wish the bench elected by the votes of the whole State, the Legislature can so enact.

We see that there is a diversity of opinion here in regard to this matter, and it may be that the conclusion to which we shall come, will not be that which shall meet the approbation of a majority of the people. There is another advantage I think in leaving the matter to the Legislature. If they do provide for the election of judges by the whole State, and afterwards find that it is not the most desirable mode, it will be in their power to change the mode of election. A few years ago, (and only a few,) it was deemed the highest policy to elect Congressmen by general ticket. But what a change there is in public opinion on this subject. They are now elected by the district system all over the Union, and you could not induce the people to go back to the old system. Yet if we had had the revision of the system at that time, we probably would have inserted such a provision as the one now proposed in reference to the judges.

Now, if it is proper to refer the grand jury system to the Legislature, giving them the power to continue, amend, or abolish the same, I ask why the representatives of the people should not have the power to declare whether the judges of the Supreme Court shall be elected by the whole people of the State, or whether they shall be elected by districts. It does appear to me that this should be left an open question. The section, if passed as it is worded now, forever ties up the power of the people. But, if left open, the people, in the discussion they will have upon the Constitution we are framing, before they adopt it, will undoubtedly express their opinion on this question, whether they desire their Supreme Bench elected by districts or the whole vote of the State. If they decide in favor of the latter, their representatives in the Legislature can carry out their wishes. But if the majority of the people are in favor, as I think they are, of electing every officer by single districts, from County Commissioner up to Supreme Judge, the Legislature will then have the power to comply with their behests.

Mr. PETTIT. There is no comparison between the compromise which I offered yesterday, and that which is now sought to be imposed on the State. The compromise which I offered yesterday, was no compromise of principle. I never did nor never will I compromise principle. It was not a question of principle but a question of policy and expediency in reference to the manner of conducting criminal prosecutions. Was there anything in that proposition which was in the slightest degree connected with a sacrifice of the citizens of Indiana to choose their own officers? In what respect—in what particular is there an analogy between the cases? Sir, as well compare a fiend of hell with an angel of heaven, as to compare that proposition with this. This is neither more nor less than to enable a little despicable clique north or south, to impose upon the necessities of the State, in order to control the election of the judges of the Supreme Court. The gentleman from Jefferson says, that if the judges of the Supreme Court are elected in the districts where they are best known, the best men will be selected. Just so long as political feelings and political animosities and excitement prevail in the State, so long will they divide and agitate every district of the State. Political excitement will prevail in districts as much as it will prevail all over the State. You have ten Congressional districts and in every one of these, political excitement rages at the time of election, as much as it would within that limit, if it were a State election. But if the gentleman's argument was worth a straw—if it had one ounce of solid principle in it, I say you have only to go down to the county where the candidate lives to know him. The argument is that he must be elected by the people who know him best. You must then elect him by a single county, in order that he may be elected by those to whom he is best known. A man is best known where his business may have led him. If it has led him out of the county in which he resides, he may be best known out of the county. If the people shall have a knowledge of the man whom they elect, the people of one district may elect a man who would not suit the people of another district. Sir, it is a base prostitution of principle.

Now one word in answer to the gentleman from Vigo. Terre Haute, I suppose, is abundantly able to furnish all the Judges for the Supreme Court. There are two Supreme Judges living in this town, both of whom, no doubt, desire to be continued on the bench. You talk about politicians being elected. Have you ever elected a Circuit Judge that was not elected upon a political basis? No, sir. It is useless to tell me that you can get along without political feeling. It is entirely out of the question. There are men in every section of the State who will certainly not unfavorably compare with our present Supreme Judges. Sir, this section is right as it stands. It contains a principle that is correct in itself; and it ought to be retained precisely as it is.

Mr. President, there is another reason why the Judges of the Supreme Court should be elected by the voters of the whole State; and that is, that there would not be any ground upon which to charge the Judge with partiality and favoritism to members of the bar. This charge would be very likely to be made against a Judge elected by a district, if he should decide a cause in favor of a lawyer who resided in his district, and against one who lived in another district. This charge would be avoided (which is very desirable) if each Judge's district is co-extensive with the State.

Mr. KILGORE. The reasons given by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) why the Convention should concur in the report, is one of the strongest reasons, in my opinion, why we should not concur. The gentleman refers to the election which went off in the Legislature but a few days since, as an evidence that the best man would be selected to fill these offices, irrespective of party. He referred to the liberality with which the dominant party voted for the election of a Whig. I ask the gentleman whether a single Democratic vote could have been obtained for that Whig, had not the Democratic members of the Circuit came up in a solid mass and urged the election of that man upon their brother Democrats outside of the Circuit?

Mr. PETTIT (in his seat). Did not the Senator from Henry oppose it?

Mr. KILGORE. The Senator from Henry belongs to the old abolition party, and is not recognized by the Democracy.

Yes, sir, every Democrat within that Circuit said he was the choice of a large majority of both political parties. Yet bitter denunciations are daily thrown out, because the Democratic party, by mere force of party drill, could not be forced to elect a man to the bench whom the people of the Circuit did not want.

If the gentleman's plan be carried out, it is clear to me that it cannot tend to promote the great interests of the people, or to elevate the character and dignity of the Supreme Bench. It may subserve party purposes, as it will prove to be nothing more nor less than a well arranged political organization.

Mr. PETTIT was here understood to remark, that the Judge was not to be a district officer, but a State officer, and as such should be elected by the whole people.

Mr. KILGORE. Then, sir, we might with the same propriety say, that the Circuit Judges are not district officers, but officers for the State at large. They have jurisdiction and power over the personal liberty of all the citizens of the State who may violate our penal laws. They can bring an offender from the county of Tippecanoe to the Marion Circuit Court for trial. They have jurisdiction of the various matters of litigation between man and man—no matter where he may reside, provided he is found in the Circuit long enough to be served with process. Thus it will be seen, Mr. President, that the Circuit Judges may, to some extent, be deemed State officers, and their election by general ticket might be urged with as much force and propriety, as that of the Supreme Judges.

This, Mr. President, is a political movement which I regret to see. The Judges of our Courts of Justice, so far as it is possible to do so, should be placed beyond and above mere party. The scales of justice should be held even, and with a hand too steady and firm to be moved by local excitement or party prejudice. And, sir, in order to secure this, it is our duty to keep them without the influence of party bickerings or political strife, and to remove from them every inducement to become political managers.

But according to the plan and arguments of the gentleman, (Mr. Pettit,) he would make our judicial system a stupendous political machine; the aspirants to the Bench to become political squabblers, to mingle with, and partake of, all the excitements, to take sides, and publicly discuss political questions on the stump, in order to enable the people to determine as to their legal attainments, their moral worth, and inflexible integrity. He, sir, would have the party candidate for the bench become a political leader of the particular district in which he is located—to marshal the party and bring them into the field whenever required; and any dereliction from the duties of his leadership would doubtless prove fatal to his success.

Adopt the general ticket system, as proposed, and a party caucus will furnish all the candidates for the bench, and all the people will know about them will be that they are the nominees of their political party, and, as a general thing, as such they will support them, without ever troubling themselves about the qualifications of the men. As illustrative of this, if the Convention will indulge me, I will relate a circumstance which occurred a short time after the nomination of the lamented Polk for President. Mr. Polk, as it is well known, was not at that time of world-wide fame, and many good men had never heard of him before. I met one of those honest souls on the road, and happening to get into conversation with him on the subject of politics, amongst other things, the nomination for the Presidency was referred to. "And who is this James K. Polk?" asked the old gentleman. I replied, "He lives down in Tennessee, and they say he is a pretty good kind of a Duck river lawyer—was once Speaker in Congress, and is now the nominee of the Democratic National Convention for President." "Oh well," said the old man, "although I never heard of him before, I will go for him, because he must be the very best man they have, or they would not have nominated him." [A laugh.] Just so it would be with the nominees for Judge, under the proposed plan; one-half of their support would be from men who knew nothing about them, and cared as little, so they were the nominees of their party.

But, sir, if we confine the election of each Judge to the district in which he resides, we may hope to see our Supreme Bench filled by men of acknowledged ability and moral worth; men whose conduct has secured the confidence of their neighbors and given them a hold upon those of their acquaintances too strong and powerful to be broken by the hand of party. This, sir, has been recently demonstrated in the re-election of Judge Elliott to the Circuit Bench. He came before the Legislature backed and sustained by the representatives of all parties; whig and democrat alike urged his claims, because they knew the man; and knowing him, for the sake of justice and truth, were willing to forgo their party prejudices and place upon the Bench a man in whom the people were willing to confide. But were the democrat members from other portions of the State willing to yield to the will of the circuit, were they willing to forego their party prejudices even for the public good? No, sir, no; a large majority of them were willing and anxious to thrust upon the people of that circuit a mere partizan Judge without regard to his qualifications; and they are daily cursing and denouncing the honest and independent democrats who voted for Elliott as recreant to their party, sir, with such men the gentleman from Tippecanoe is willing to trust the election of all our Supreme Judges, against which I protest most solemnly.

The gentleman from Vigo (Mr. Cookerly) is right, sir, in the views he has expressed upon this subject. If we abolish the district system of electing, let us not confine the Judge to any particular district. If we do not retain both, then I am in favor of striking out both; and leaving the people at liberty to select Judges from any portion of the State they may choose, and thus destroy the gentleman from Tippecanoe's favorite system of political organization and leadership, about which he manifests so much solicitude.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I should like to know the state of the question at present.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Vigo.

Mr. SMITH of Ripley. I find we have broken in upon a very fruitful subject this morning. I find gentlemen too, getting very eloquent; they could talk forever on the subject, and in order to bring the subject to a close, I call the previous question.

The demand for the previous question was sustained.

The question being,

Shall the main question be now put?

It was ordered by consent.

The question was first taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Vigo, to the instructions proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph—to strike out all that part of the section which provides that the Judges shall reside in their respective districts.

The question was decided in the negative.

The question recurred upon the motion to re-commit with instructions as proposed by the gentleman from St. Joseph, to strike out the words "of the whole State," and insert the words "in the manner prescribed by law."

The yeas and nays being demanded, and ordered, were taken, and resulted yeas—50, nays 84, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beach, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Frisbie, Hall, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Hitt, Hogin, Howe, Huff, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Maguire, Mather, Morgan, Murray, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Sims, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Todd, Watts, Yocum, and Zenor—50.

YAYS.—Messrs. So the Section was not re-committed.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is: Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were then taken, and the Secretary reported yeas 82, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Anthony, Bascom, Beeson, Berry, Borden, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Harbolt, Hardin, Hovey, Huff, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Jones, Kent, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Owen, Pepper, of Ohio, Pettit, Read of Clarke, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimby, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—82.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Parbour, Beach, Beard, Blythe, Bourne, Bowers, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Davis of Madison, Davis of Parke, Dunn of Jefferson, Frisbie, Hamilton, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Kinley, May, Morgan, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Crawford, Prather, Sims, Spann, Steele, Thomas, Todd, Walpole, Watts, and Yocum—49.

So the section was passed, and under the rule referred to the committee on revision.

Mr. PETTIT. I have a further report from the same committee.

The Secretary read the report; it was in effect that the committee on the organization of courts of justice had complied with the instructions given them by the Convention by inserting at the proper place in section twenty-nine of same article the words "County Courts and Justice's of the Peace."

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson moved to re-commit the section with instructions to strike out the words "County Courts and Justice's of the Peace."

The question being upon recommitting with instructions,

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. We have already I think a section providing for justices of the peace; if not we can have a distinct section on the subject. If this matter proposed to be stricken out, is stricken out, the section will then stand as it was reported by the committee, that is, "the judiciary shall be vested in a Supreme, Circuit Courts, and such other Courts as may be established by law." That is just the way in which it should be.

Mr. KILGORE moved to amend the instructions so that an additional section should be reported authorizing the Legislature to provide for the organization of a certain number of probate circuits with one Judge, &c.

Mr. BASCOM moved that the amendment to the instructions be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

So the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. MORRISON of Marion moved to amend the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson by striking them out and inserting, "that the people of each county shall elect a Judge of Probate and Common Pleas, the fees of the office to be fixed by law, &c."

Mr. KILGORE moved that the amendment be laid upon the table.

The question being on laying the amendment on the table, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 71, noes not counted.

The question was declared to be carried.

So the amendment of the gentleman from Marion was laid upon the table.

The question was then taken upon

Mr. DUNN'S motion to recommit with instructions, and was decided in the negative—ayes 47, noes 50.

So the section was not re-committed with instructions.

The PRESIDENT. The question is:

Shall the section pass?

Mr. KELSO. It appears to me a rather useless thing to leave the Legislature the power to make courts inferior to that of a justice of the peace.

Mr. PETTIT (interposing and Mr. K. giving way). I suppose every lawyer understands that the terms "superior," and "inferior courts," are known as technicalities. It does not follow that the "inferior courts" mentioned in this section must be inferior to a justice's of the peace court. A County Court is an inferior court; that is, it is inferior in jurisdiction to another court, the Supreme Court for instance, which is a superior court. It is proposed that the Legislature may create inferior courts, such as city courts for criminal adjudication. I do not see that there is anything in the language to prevent the Legislature from establishing a city court for the punishment of crimes in your cities.

Mr. KELSO. If we are going to take the responsibility of fixing a judiciary system, we ought to take it to a complete extent. You have failed to make provision in reference to one of the most important branches of the jurisprudence of the State; I refer to the administration of the estates of decedents. When the question came up whether the Legislature or the people should be intrusted with the power to regulate a few miles of county lines, or change a few sections from one county to another, the people were incapable of being trusted—the Legislature was unfit to act in the matter. But, this all-important Convention must do all that—they must place these things irrevocably beyond the control of the Legislature or the people? Why not take the responsibility now in a far more important matter—why not establish a court for the transaction of that all-important branch of adjudication—the probate business of the State?

Sir, there is not a more important court in the State than the Court of Probate. The title to all the real estate of a county either directly or indirectly, passes the ordeal of that court, and upon the correctness of the decisions of that court does and must depend to a great extent the stability of the title to real estate in the community. Sir, there is not a tribunal in the State which demands higher legal qualifications for judge than does the Probate Court. If you leave it thus at loose ends, it will be worse than a one horse court—it will be a half horse team—it will be such a court as will be a disgrace to the State. I ask all the friends of fair play, of a sound judiciary, and of the equal administration of justice to leave us at liberty to introduce a court that will meet the wants and exigencies of the case. But the rule now is, the more important the matter, the more certain the previous question must be moved, and we are choked down by a direct party vote.

Upon the dictation of a few leaders, debate is forbidden—no explanation is allowed—no one seems to feel any interest for the widow and orphan—great care is taken to protect the living—his property is cared for. But, sir, when the icy arm of death has prostrated the husband and the father—when the disconsolate widow and helpless orphan are left to struggle with the adversities of a cold and unfeeling world—then, sir, there seems to be a perfect indifference as to their fate. It seems to make little or no difference whether the court whose business it is to protect their interest be competent or incompetent. Sir, I insist that it is our duty to provide for the creation of a competent court to discharge that high and responsible duty.

They talk to us about leaving this matter to the Legislature. Sir, it has been left to the Legislature ever since 1829—over twenty years—and what have they done? Nothing, sir; just nothing at all. The representatives of the people in the General Assembly are no more competent than we are, and they are, like a majority of this Convention, afraid to do what they know they should do. And indeed, sir, this morning we learned for the first time that the election of judges is to be made a political question. Sir, when this question was before the people it was the only one upon which their jealousy was excited, they fearing that politics might get into the construction of this part of our government, and thereby greatly weaken it. We did not then find any one willing to take the ground that the question should be mingled with politics. But now we are told that the candidates for the Supreme Bench should take the stump—that there should be a general ticket for the purpose of so compelling these candidates to stump it all over the State. The people did not expect that; and I, for one, am prepared to vote against it. My vote is all that I have to give that can be of any value: and I know that will not be sufficient.

I hope, however, that there are a sufficient number of friends of a sound judiciary in this Convention to vote the section down.

Mr. DOBSON. I wish to learn from the gentleman who reported the section, what he intends by the "County Court?" Is it to do, as it does now, the common business of the county held by commissioners—such as the people now understand the County Court to be?

Mr. PETTIT. I explained my idea the other day. If the gentleman had been here he would have heard what I said. I will now say to the gentleman that it was not upon my motion that the section was re-committed. The first section of the article was re-committed to the committee with instructions, on the motion of the gentleman from Floyd (Mr. Thornton). Under the instructions of the Convention to amend the section as it is now reported; I have done so. The gentleman should ask the Convention what they meant by it.

Mr. DOBSON. Then I will put the question to the Convention. The section was re-committed when I was absent unwell. I did not hear the discussion in regard to the instructions. But the instructions were indefinite, and the section itself is indefinite. Do you mean to establish by constitutional provision, a common commissioners' court, or a Probate Court? What does it mean? I think, sir, that it is an indefinite section, and ought not to be passed—at least the part of it to which I have alluded.

Mr. NILES. I hope that this section will not pass in its present form. I should greatly prefer the section in the old Constitution which reads thus:

"The judiciary power of this State both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, in Circuit Courts, and in such other inferior courts as the General Assembly may from time to time appoint."

The section now pending contemplates a County Court inferior to the Circuit Court in every county in the State. In some of the larger counties, such as Jefferson, Marion, and Floyd, containing commercial cities, a county court may be organized under the present Constitution, and may be useful and necessary, while in the smaller and less commercial counties it would be an oppressive and useless burthen.

There have been great complaints—merited to some extent—against the present probate system. That it is defective all will admit. But the Legislature has the power at any moment, to apply the remedy by modifying the present Probate Court, or by transferring the probate business to the Circuit Courts, or by adopting any other plan which time and experience may suggest. What do gentlemen now propose? Why, sir, to fix permanently upon the country a system still more objectionable. The proposed County Court would be invested with some common law jurisdiction, and would probably be made to supersede the present probate system. There is no man who has been accustomed to observe the proceedings before justices of the peace, who does not know that a plain common sense man, with no pretensions to a knowledge of the law, and who decides according to his own sense of right, makes a better justice of the peace than any half baked lawyer. [Laughter.] Fasten upon the country the system now proposed, and you only make places for third-rate lawyers in a large majority of the counties.

I would not complain so much of this proposed County Court, were it a mere experiment which could be abandoned at any moment, but you propose to make it permanent in the Constitution, however useless and burthensome it may prove to be. Were our counties all large and wealthy, it would be different, but the whole scheme seems to me unsuited to the condition of the country at the present time. One motive in calling this Convention was to diminish the public burthens, but this measure would require increased taxation in the smaller counties without any adequate benefits.

I am ready to admit that I am not prepared at this moment to say what kind of a probate system should be adopted, but it does seem to me that after we have established the organization of the higher courts, we may leave something to the Legislature—at all events, that we may do it with more safety to the public interests than to assume the province of fastening this County Court hopelessly upon our contemporaries and their children.

Mr. BADGER. Is it in order to move additional instructions?

The PRESIDENT. It is, sir.

Mr. BADGER. Then I move the following instructions:

To re-commit with instructions to strike out the section and insert—

"The judicial powers of the State shall consist of a Supreme Court, Circuit Courts, and such other inferior courts as may be established by law."

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I am sorry the venerable delegate from Floyd is so beset both before and behind. I hope, however, that notwithstanding the remarks of his adversaries, he will escape without harm to life or limb. If I, or others differ from that honorable delegate, on this subject of County Courts, which he appears to have taken under his especial guardianship, I think we ought to be permitted to advocate our views without being charged with personal hostility to that gentleman. I am opposed to inserting in the Constitution a provision establishing County Courts. The Legislature will possess the power to establish such courts, if we retain the provisions on this subject contained in the old Constitution. The instructions moved by the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) are not exactly the words of the old Constitution, but embody the same idea. I hope, therefore, that the motion to refer with these instructions, will prevail. But, sir, if by your constitution you establish County Courts, what jurisdiction do you propose to give those courts? As I understand the object of the friends of this measure, they do not expect the courts to perform the duties of your boards of County Commissioners, generally styled County Courts, but the County Court is to have certain civil and criminal jurisdiction. To these courts will also no doubt, be given probate jurisdiction, and there you will have all the evils of the present probate system fastened upon the State.

The friends of legal reform have been earnestly exhorted to rally to the support of County Courts and establish them by a constitutional provision. I take the liberty of saying to those gentlemen who are desirous of putting everything they believe to be right into the Constitution, and who talk so long and so loud about reforms, that by inserting so many provisions in the Constitution, they will effectually prevent useful reforms hereafter. They wish to bind the legislative power hand and foot, and when this is accomplished, what opportunity will there be for progress and reforms? As I understand the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) it provides that the judicial power of this State shall be vested in a Supreme Court, Circuit Courts, County Courts, justices of the peace, and such inferior courts as may be prescribed by law.

What are these "inferior courts" to be inferior to? I would understand the section to mean that these courts must be inferior to the courts of justices of the peace. I would be glad, then, to know what kind of courts they are to be. Something like the ancient British courts of pie-powder perhaps. I hope, sir, we shall adopt a provision corresponding with the one on this subject contained in the old Constitution, leaving it to the Legislature to establish County Courts or not, as the future welfare of the State may require.

Mr. KELSO. When I made a few remarks some short time since, I did not attack this gentleman's scheme. I had a different opinion of him, and any man who would introduce this plan ought to be ashamed of it. I said then, and repeat it now, that this section made no provision for one very important branch of the jurisprudence of the State—for a court to administer the estates of deceased persons, without saying a word about a one horse court in connection with the section.

We at present have a county court, consisting of three commissioners, and the people have been so long accustomed to them that they would be better pleased with them than with any other court we could give them as a county court. I apprehend the gentleman from Floyd, (Mr. Thornton,) with all his warmth and sagacity, does not suppose we would be right in committing the probate business to this county court. His plan, I understand, is to have one judge in each court. Well, that court must be so insignificant, so trivial in its character, and so regarded in its judicial reputation, that no lawyer would accept of the office. The gentleman went on to say that the opposition to the proposition came from members of the bar entirely—and by implication conveying the idea that the opposition to the provision was dictated by interested motives. What would they have to lose? Does the gentleman suppose that if a lawyer were offered a fee to plead a case in that court he would not accept of it? And I am free to confess that I believe the bar in Floyd county could, perhaps, get as much business in the probate court in that county as the gentleman himself. The gentleman is a practical lawyer—who brags sometimes that he is a lawyer of 30 years standing—and he comes here and presents a proposition, and then gratuitously abuses the whole bar; not because they have opposed him, but because he thinks he can raise himself a little in the public estimation by such a course. Now, to whom do the people of this State, or of any State within the limits of this great government, look for a sound exposition of the laws, and all constitutional questions, unless it be to the lawyers of the country? Who has always been the great expounder of the Constitution of the United States but one of the best lawyers in the Union—Daniel Webster—and after him a hundred others scarcely inferior to himself? Who is the safe guard of the law but the judiciary, and the members of the legal profession? So far am I from being ashamed that I am a lawyer, I am proud of belonging to the profession.

I have no desire to waste time by answering, at length, the paltry little sneer which was thrown at me in regard to politics—"he has been on all sides, and, therefore, can accommodate himself to circumstances," &c. In that the gentleman is different from me. It has been wisely said that "It is the part of a wise man to change his course when he learns that he is wrong, but that the fool never changes," and as the saying goes, "of all fools, an old fool is the worst" [laughter]. Yes, sir, the gentleman may throw out his sneers as he pleases; conscious of the honesty of the motives which have ever influenced my actions, I feel impervious to the thrusts which the gentleman has made. I have had the moral courage to change my politics when I became conscientiously convinced they were wrong. I did not persevere in error for the sake of appearing what politicians call "consistent." Nor, sir, did I come here to truckle to any party; neither did I obtain a seat in this Convention upon party grounds. I came here to act untrammelled by any party influences. And, sir, I hold to this, that if there be anything which is especially low and degraded, it is to attempt to carry a measure in this Convention by mere "party;" it is the last consideration that should be put forward by any one. And, sir, the more especially should not a gentleman of one party truckle to those of the opposite, offering them a sort of salvo, saying "if you vote for my proposition there will be a chance of your getting an appointment." I trust in God that there is no man—not even a decent pettifogging lawyer, who would take the office of county court judge, or come in competition with any man who desired to take it. It is just such a judgeship as no decent lawyer, able to earn his bread by his profession, would accept. Yet gentlemen talk about lawyers rising like "gemii," as if we were evil spirits, besetting him and his baunting on all sides. [Laughter]. Sir, there are as honest men at the bar as in any other walk of life, and of as correct principles. I shall be governed in this Convention by no consideration except by that of justice and propriety. Unless I think a measure right, I will not give it my support, small as that may be. But I care not from what party a proposition comes, if a principle embodied in it be correct, I will go for it. I say, as was well remarked by the gentleman from Owen (Mr. Johnson) that this is an indefinite court. What is to be its character? what duties is it to perform? There is not even jurisdiction left to the Legislature to establish any other court, unless courts inferior to that of justices of the peace. I say the proper course is to vote this section down, and put a proper one in its place.

The question being upon the motion of the gentleman from Putnam (Mr. Badger) to recommit with instructions.

It was decided in the affirmative—ayes 50, noes 46.

So the section was re-committed with instructions.

Mr. SMILEY. Would it be now in order to offer an additional section?

The PRESIDENT. No sir, it would not; the subject is not before the Convention.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the committee on Banking and Currency, reported back the 6th section of article No. 24, amended agreeable to the instructions of the Convention, by adding after the word "payment," in the 3d line, these words: "And all collateral securities required under a general banking law, shall be readily convertible."

The question being Shall the section be passed?

Mr. HAMILTON. One word, before the question is taken. It will be recollected that positive instructions were given the committee to amend this section. In accordance with those instructions the committee have amended the section as reported. As this subject has been fully discussed, I hope the friends of either system will allow it to rest until the article, as amended, shall have been printed, and laid before us.

Mr. PETTIT. It seems to me that the section requires the word "specie" to be added after the word "convertible," in order to carry out the meaning.

Mr. WALPOLE (in his seat). Say "gold and silver."

Mr. PETTIT. The word "specie" will cover what is required.

Mr. WALPOLE. Oh! well.

The section was so amended by consent.

Mr. PEPPER of Ohio moved to suspend the rule requiring the yeas and nays to be taken on the passage of the section.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being taken upon the passage of the section as amended.

The yeas and nays were taken with the following result—yeas 113, nays 14:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Bowers, Bryant, Butler, Chapman, Chenoweth, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Farrow, Fisher, Foley, Foster, Frisbie, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Graham of Warrick, Haddon, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson of D., Johnson of O., Kelso, Kent, Kinley, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, March, Mather, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Mowrer, Newman, Niles, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Shoup, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Stevenson, Tague, Tannehill, Thomas, Thornton, Todd, Trimby, Wallace, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—114.

NAYS.—Messrs. Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Berry, Brookbank, Clark of Hamilton, Davis of Madison, Helmer, Kilgore, Morgan, Nave, Walpole, and Watts—14.

So the section was passed, and the rule referred to the committee on revision.

NEW COUNTIES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions, reported a section providing that the citizens of Perry and Spencer may lay out a new county; and if a majority of the people of each of said counties shall assent to it, then the new county may be formed.

The section was read a first time and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

Mr. WALPOLE, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions, reported several sections, providing "that after 1880 the Legislature should have power to revoke all charters which have not then expired—no corporation hereafter to exist over twenty-five years, except those of political and municipal character—statistics of population, agriculture, manufactures, &c., to be collected in 1855, and every tenth year after—bank charters and laws to be repealable, &c."

The sections were severally read a first time, and passed to a second reading to-morrow.

REPORTS FROM SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. BIDDLE, from a majority of the select committee to whom had been referred a resolution of inquiry relative to the expediency of dividing the University Fund amongst the various colleges and common schools in the State, reported against diverting the fund from its original destination. The committee thought that a diversion of the fund for that or any other than the original purpose, would be doing an injustice to the trust. The committee recommended the indefinite postponement of the resolution, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. A detailed argument accompanied the report in support of the position taken by the committee.

The committee were discharged by consent.

The question being on concurring in the report of the committee,

Mr. WALPOLE moved that the report be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

So the report was laid on the table.

Mr. BORDEN, from a minority of the committee, reported a section, providing that the University Fund may be divided amongst the different incorporated colleges in the State, in proportion to the number of students in each.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington moved that the report be laid on the table.

The question being upon laying the minority report on the table,

It was decided in the affirmative.

So the report was laid upon the table.

NOTICE.

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson gave notice that he would, to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, move to strike out the thirty-seventh rule.

A DELEGATE. What is the rule?

Mr. DUNN of Jefferson. I will say, in explanation, that the thirty-seventh rule requires all resolutions of an imperative character directed to any of the standing committees, to lie over one day, if any objections be made.

The rule was then read by the PRESIDENT.

STATE LITIGATION.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Convention a communication in reply to a resolution of inquiry relative to the amount of fees paid attorneys, in suits brought by or against the State during the last five years. The communication stated that the sum of $1,960 had been paid as fees during this period.

Mr. WATTS. The resolution was amended so that the inquiry would go back ten years.

Mr. BASCOM. The gentleman is correct. I offered the resolution, saying five years; he moved to insert ten years, and I accepted the amendment.

Mr. DUNN of Perry. I move that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was not sustained.

Convention refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT. What disposition will the Convention make of the communication?

Mr. PETTIT. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

So the communication was laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. The next thing in order are the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Mr. OWEN. I ask of the Convention a suspension of its rules, for the purpose of introducing a resolution of some importance, and which, if we are to adopt it at all, should be passed now.

SEVERAL VOICES. Read! read!

Mr. OWEN. It is as follows:

"That a committee of one from each Congressional district be appointed by the Chair, to prepare an address to the electors of the State, embodying a brief statement of the changes proposed in the amended Constitution, and such other matters in connection therewith as may aid in securing its adoption."

I move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of introducing this resolution.

The question being on suspending the rules, It was decided in the affirmative.

So the rules were suspended.

And the question being on the passage of the resolution,

Mr. OWEN said—

Mr. PRESIDENT: We have been in session here for three months and a half, and shall have to remain in session two or three weeks longer to complete our work, making an entire session of some four months. Its expense, including reporting and publishing debates and journal, may reach from eighty to a hundred thousand dollars.

It is of the greatest importance to the State, to say nothing of our own reputations, that the new Constitution, the result of all this labor and expense, should not be rejected by the people. And it is our duty to take proper and reasonable means towards securing its adoption. What are those means? One of the most efficient is, to prepare, and place before the people, in condensed form, a statement, showing distinctly what the principal changes are which are proposed in the new Constitution, as compared with the provisions of the old. The changes are numerous. Even we who have made them would be somewhat puzzled to sit down and enumerate them. Many persons, especially farmers living in remote and secluded spots, may not have the old Constitution by them when they receive a copy of that amended by us. And even if they have, it will be a work of considerable labor to collate and compare every one of its hundred and fifty sections.

I do not propose, sir, to introduce into this address anything like special pleading in defence of our work. Let it stand on its own merits. Let those who would examine arguments for or against any provision, look for these in our debates. Now and then, it might not be out of place very briefly to give the reasons for a change, and to State the effects to result from it.

It has been customary to talk of the changes the people expected in this new Constitution; and some, out of this body and not specially charged with the duty, have undertaken to say what were the specific amendments demanded. Sir, there was, in strictness, but one instruction, given without a dissenting voice, imposed equally upon us all, when we took the oath to discharge our duty as delegates. It was, to make a good Constitution; such an one as the people might feel satisfied to live under for half a century to come. All other instructions are, to a great extent, imaginary; the result of personal and local predilections: coming to us in one shape from the North, in a different one from the South; in one from the East, in another from the West. When we shall have framed a Constitution as perfect in all its parts as our combined judgment and experience enable us to frame it, then, and not till then, shall we have performed our whole duty here.

I know that many things have been touched by us, which may not have occurred, in advance to the people generally as necessary amendments. That is natural; and could not, indeed, well be otherwise. Did you ever, sir, undertake the thorough repair of an old house which had stood some thirty or forty years, untouched by the workman's hand? If you ever did, as I have, doubtless acquired some experience in the progress of the work. Perhaps you had a carpenter, in the first place; to examine the building, and report to you what repairs were essential, and at what probable expense? He might tell you of one or two sills evidently decayed; of a portion of the flooring to be renewed, or of a worn out, weather beaten roof which must be replaced by a new one. He would suggest, it may be, that the whole expense could not exceed a couple hundred dollars. But then he would add, that, until the floors were taken up and the joists and frame work of the building exposed, it was impossible to determine, with any certainty, what was necessary to be done. You bid him commence the work; and before a few weeks are over, it becomes apparent to you, that to make the job thorough and permanent, first one additional repair and then another must be undertaken. You perceive clearly, that, unless you do the thing effectually what money you do spend is but so much thrown away. While you are about it, you resolve to do, what, sooner or later, must evidently be done. You regard this as true economy; as costing less, in the end, than continual patching and daily expedients. You did not, indeed, expect such a task when you first undertook it. You had no idea that your bill would run up, as you soon discover that it will, to some five or six hundred dollars. But not the less do you see and know, that you could wisely do but one of two things; either to refrain from the repair altogether, or to make it what it should be, effectual and enduring at once.

So it is with the task—an incalculably important one, which we were sent here to perform. Let men outside say what they please, it was our bounden duty, after once commencing our work, to do it thoroughly. I know that allusion has been made, in another place, to the time that has been consumed in our labors; and to the fact that our present Constitution was completed by its original framers in three weeks. Sir, much as I honor the memory of these men, truly as I believe the Constitution they gave us was, for its day, an excellent one, the best that, till then, had ever been framed; yet, cannot I shut my eyes to the fact, that if they had remained sitting in Convention for three years instead of three weeks, and had been paid throughout these three years, each one of them ten dollars a day; and if, during that entire session, they had, in addition to their three week's labor, done but one act, namely, to add to the Constitution we have been living under, six lines—six lines which find a place in the Constitution as amended by us, providing that the Legislature shall not have power to contract a public debt, nor to engage the State as stockholder in any corporation, nor to loan its credit to any individual or association; if, I say, during a session thus protracted and expensive, they had made but that single amendment, the expense incurred by their labors would have been the best money ever expended by the State, or paid by the people. [Enthusiastic applause.] The omission of these six lines has cost us six millions of dollars. We are paying, in consequence of the omission of these six lines, every year we live, three hundred thousand dollars; eight hundred dollars a day forever; a sum more than sufficient to maintain, in perpetual session, year after year, from the first of January to the thirty-first of December, such a Convention as this, with its hundred and fifty delegates, and all its expenses for rent, officers, journal and debates. [Renewed applause.] And this vast sum is paid yearly, not to our own citizens, to be again disbursed among us, but to those foreign bondholders who figured so largely in the recent bank discussion; an annual drain on our capital; tribute imposed by our own improvidence, and sent out of the State, never to return.

Thus, though it be our unquestionable duty to close our business here with all convenient despatch, it is not the less true, that the value of our labors cannot be measured by time, nor estimated in dollars.

Some things have been said that had much better have been left unsaid, about the pay of the members of the Convention. If I had been a member of the General Assembly last winter, I should not have voted, as per diem for the delegates, a higher rate than that to which we are entitled. For a State, deeply in debt as Indiana is, must husband her resources. But yet, if men were always paid according to the importance of the work they perform, our members of Congress would receive three dollars a day, and we eight. [Applause.]

I speak of that which I know; having been a member of Congress for four years: four eventful and exciting years. I was in the House when the great questions of Oregon, Texas, Tariff, and the Mexican War were debated and decided. And yet, put all these questions momentous as they were, together; estimate their effects, present and future, upon the people of Indiana, and they do not even remotely compare in importance with the effects to be produced upon our people by the amended Constitution, if the popular vote should decide its adoption.

In such an address as that proposed by the resolution, a few words might be introduced as to time and expense. It might not be inappropriate very briefly to allude to the fact, that we had no voice in deciding the number of delegates of which this body is composed; a matter which has mainly determined both the time consumed and the cost incurred by the Convention. We cannot, and should not, debar delegates from the right of speech; and in a numerous body the debates become almost necessarily tedious.

Nor was the reporting of our debates a matter of choice with us. That was decided in advance of our meeting here, by the Legislature of last winter. In defence of that decision it might be said, perhaps, that when these debates come to be printed and circulated all over the State, containing as they do, arguments for and against every important change that has been made, or has been rejected—the benefit they will effect may out-pay the cost at which they are published. I cannot say whether the people of Indiana sent here the best talent among them. I know they ought to have done so. I believe they intended to do so. And if the best talent in the State is to be found in this Convention, its debates in spite of their checkered character, must, as matters of future reference and materials for future construction, be of great and permanent value. But be this as it may, it should be borne in mind, that the expense of reporting did not originate with us.

As to the time already spent here, and the two or three weeks which may still be necessary to complete our labors, I am much more apprehensive that we shall overhurry matters, than that we shall unduly protract our session.

There is a great temptation to the former course. I feel it myself. Our inclination points one way, our duty another. Then too, I am aware there are professional men in this body who would rather pay ten dollars a day than to remain here any portion of the coming month. I know there are farmers here, who ought to be at this moment at home, preparing for their spring work. But yet I hope, sir, for the sake alike of the interest at stake and our own future reputations, that we will not precipitate the disposal of the business yet to be done. A four months session is not one of unusual length for a Constitutional Convention. It is seldom that a task similar to that entrusted to us has been completed in less time, even by a Convention of less unwieldy numbers than ours.

The Convention of New York, consisting of a hundred and twenty-eight members, sat nearly four months and a half. That of Ohio, consisting of a hundred and eight delegates, has already been in session more than four months, and does not seem yet to have approached the termination of its labors. The Kentucky Constitution, it is true, was amended in about three months; but the number of delegates reached a hundred only. While on the other hand, in Louisiana, more than double that time was employed. This is not to be wondered at. More important discussions have taken place, and more varied and substantial business has been done here since we met, than in a dozen ordinary sessions of your Legislature. [Loud applause.] That fact may be easily decided by any dispassionate man who will take up the proceedings of this body, and compare them with those of the General Assembly, during the last six or eight years. There are single sections in the Constitution we are about to submit to the people—not one, but several of them—each one of which is worth to the State more than the entire cost of this Convention. As one of the tax payers of the State, I would prefer to pay my share of that sum for each one of them, rather than to have them stricken out again.

In conclusion I remark, that it is not an unusual thing to adopt a resolution similar to that now offered. It was adopted in New York, in Kentucky, and I believe in other States. If this thing be well done, it will, I think, go far to obtain for the amended Constitution many votes, which, for lack of a distinct understanding of the character and effects of the chief changes proposed in it, might otherwise be cast against that instrument.

Mr. WALPOLE moved that the Convention adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER hoped the resolution would be adopted. Although the public anticipated that the Convention would not be in session longer than a few weeks, yet his constituents approved of what the Convention had so far done; and they recommended that the body should not pursue the course which the Legislature had been in the habit of leading, viz: doing the greater part of their business during the last week of the session. A few dollars more or less would be but a drop in the bucket.

Mr. WALPOLE observed that this was a most extraordinary time to introduce a resolution of this kind. The gentleman knew that there were many articles yet undecided, and the decision of which the gentleman (Mr. Owen) could not anticipate. Could it be said now who would be the advocates or the opponents of the Constitution? The gentleman took time by the forelock that he, as chairman of the committee, might have an opportunity of addressing a hundred and eighty thousand freemen upon a subject not yet matured.

There was once a party in this State called the "thunderers;" an organization which employed its powers in stumping for or against such measures as found favor with them. The gentleman appeared, with his other twelve associates, to have become a "thunderer" for the Constitution, before it was yet completed. A few men had been active in proposing amendments to the Constitution. The gentleman, with some others, appeared upon the journals as the constructors of the Constitution, while the rest of the Convention appeared as lame members. [Laughter.]

If he (Mr. W.) were the representative of serfs, he might be in favor of this proposition; but as the representative of freemen, he should most solemnly protest against this measure. He would never consent to say that the people of Indiana had not sufficient intelligence to enable them to examine the Constitution, and perceive what was right and what was wrong in the instrument. What he especially wanted was, that the Constitution be left to make its own address. Let the people take up the Constitution, section after section, and thus judge as to what improvements had been made upon the old organic law. He wanted no Robert Dale Owen to address the people of Indiana, and tell them they were not capable of judging as to the merits or demerits of the Constitution. He did not want—he had almost said, the gentleman from Tippecanoe, (Mr. Pettit,) the gentleman from Allen, (Mr. Borden,) or other "thunderers" to tell the people they ought to adopt the new instrument. He considered that any man who voted for this proposition, virtually told the people that they were not intelligent enough to understand this new Constitution. It was a libel upon the judgment and understanding of the people.

The gentleman was not contented with seven hundred and fifty copies of the debates—to be circulated in every school district—in which both sides of every question would be given; but in addition to that, he must have a one-sided statement, or address. These debates had cost near $10,000. Were they to be set aside, at the ipse dixit of the gentleman, and this committee from the "Congressional Districts" to act as god-fathers to the deliberations of the Convention?

He feared the influence of the gentleman's eloquence and warmth, upon the people, when brought to bear in favor of the new Constitution. Especially did he fear it, recollecting the effect which the gentleman's address in relation to the Board for the equalization of taxation, produced in this State, some years ago.

He opposed this resolution, because it was an insult to the intelligence of the people—because it was an apology, as it were, for the work of the Convention, and because the Constitution would not be the kind of a one which the people had expected. It says that the Convention, after having been four months in session, should delegate to 13 men the office of advocating the adoption of the Constitution—in fact, asking the people not to reject the result of their labors. It appeared to him, to say the least of it, absurd, when there was a published volume of the debates in every school district in the State, to do that office. He was opposed to the resolution, because it was an attempt to justify their own acts, and because it said that the people could not understand the provisions of the Constitution, and that the Convention alone could.

There was one other reason why he would oppose this resolution, and that was on account of the expense attending the publishing and circulating of this address. The Convention already had cost the State some $80,000—this would cost at least a thousand dollars more.

One gentleman was to write the address, and that was the gentleman from Posey [Mr. Owen]. The others would merely put their "marks" to it, like so many Cherokee chiefs, placing their "marks" to a treaty on a piece of wampum. [Laughter.]

Mr. OWEN. If it be the desire of the gentleman from Hancock (Mr. Walpole) to smother, at its birth, what he is pleased to call "this four months bantling;" if he seek to defeat the adoption of the instrument which has so long occupied our time and thoughts, he is consistent enough in opposing this address. But there are few among his colleagues who share with him such intentions as these. We believe the work of our hands, imperfect as it must be, still well worthy of adoption. And, because we propose to place before our fellow-citizens a brief statement, distinctly setting forth the changes we have made, are we to be told that we offer an "insult to the intelligence of the people." Sir, as well might it be said that when the author, or publisher, of a book appends to it a table of contents, for the convenience of ready reference, he thereby insults his readers. (Applause.)

The gentleman referred to the article of expense, and supposed the publication of the address might cost a thousand dollars. I see not why it should cost us a cent. Every newspaper in the State that can spare room enough to give its readers a condensed view of the results of the labors of this Convention will be likely to publish it; and, certainly, without any charge to us.

But the gentleman seems greatly disturbed by the possibility, or probability, that I should have the writing of this address. It must be written by some one. If there is to be a child, somebody must be its father. (Laughter and applause). I am very anxious it should be written, but have not the slightest desire to write it. I moved the resolution because it did not seem to occur to any one else. I disclaim all right, whatever, to chairmanship on that account. The committee will, I hope, choose its own chairman, when it meets.

Mr. WALPOLE. I would as soon the gentleman from Posey wrote the address as any other gentleman on this floor.

Mr. OWEN. Indeed. The gentleman surprises me. I understood his chief cause of alarm to be, that the gentleman from Posey might, by his usual wily pleading, unduly influence the electors of the State in favor of the new Constitution.

Sir, I disclaim, once for all, any intention to put forth an argumentative defense, but only an explanatory synopsis. As such, I propose this address. As such, I trust the Convention will adopt the resolution.

Mr. KELSO. I will ask the gentleman to modify his resolution in this way: to let the delegates from each district appoint their own committee-man. [Cries of "no, no, no."]

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would be very well pleased to be relieved from the duty.

Mr. KELSO. I make a motion to amend the resolution as I have suggested.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the resolution, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution,

It was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. SHERROD,

The Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The PRESIDENT. The first business in order is the following section of article 20, on its third reading:

"No person arrested or confined in jail shall be treated with unnecessary rigor. The Legislature may continue, modify, or abolish the Grand Jury system."

Mr. PEPPER of Crawford. I move to recommit with the following instructions:

"Strike out all after the word 'rigor' in the 13th line, and insert the following:

"No person shall be held to answer for any criminal charge except in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

Sir, on yesterday I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe (Mr. Pettit), because I considered it better than the section as originally reported by the committee on rights and privileges. The section as reported by that committee proposes to change, radically change, the administration of the criminal law, which has stood as now administered for a period of time, it is said, "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." To subvert a principle of the common law, which is said, by a learned jurist, to be "the perfection of reason and the combined wisdom of ages;" to utterly uproot a system which the corroding touch of time has in no wise effaced; a system that was transplanted by our puritan fathers as a republican feature into the laws of this country, which has since "grown with its growth and strengthened with its strength," and at this moment finds a prominent place either in the Constitution or the laws of every State in the Union.

Before the Grand Jury system is stricken out perpetually by Constitutional enactment, gentlemen should weigh well the consequences, be sure they have another system that will fill its place.

The amendment that I propose leaves the whole matter in the hands of the law making power, where it can with propriety be left. It more properly belongs to the practice act than to the organic law. If left to the former it can be modified, changed, or abolished at pleasure, as may best subserve the interests of the country; if engrafted in the latter, there it must remain unchanged, so long as the Constitution continues in force.

And, whilst I am opposed to abolishing the system by Constitutional enactment, so that it cannot be re-enacted should it become necessary, I am equally opposed to retaining it in the Constitution for the reason that then it cannot be abolished though its abolition may be imperatively demanded, but am in favor of leaving it an open question for the Legislature to settle and adjust, from time to time, as in their wisdom shall seem right. In this manner public sentiment will more certainly be attained, and justice as satisfactorily administered.

But, if the Grand Jury is to be continued in any shape, I hope it will be for passing upon the higher grades of crime only. I am anxious to see some reforms in the punishment of small offences. The present mode of punishing defendants for petty misdemeanors is unnecessarily expensive both to the public and the accused.

Give to justices of the peace exclusive jurisdiction over all the smaller offences, allowing the defendant the right to appeal. Make this change and there will be no necessity in a majority of the counties in this State for the Grand jury, if it be continued, to sit more than one day at each term of court; three-fourths of the riding bailiffs could be dispensed with, and the whole expense need not be quarter what it now is.

MR. CLEMENTS. I can see but little difference between the amendment now offered and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tippecanoe. I propose to amend the amendment as follows:

The PRESIDENT. A motion to re-commit is pending already.

MR. CLEMENTS. But I desire to re-commit with instructions to report the section as follows:

"No person shall be put upon trial for any criminal charge which amounts to a felony, except by presentment or indictment; and all crimes or misdemeanors less than felonies shall be tried in such manner as shall be prescribed by law."

MR. PETTIT. It seems to me that we have had enough of this matter. The section leaves it entirely discretionary with the Legislature either to abolish, or modify, or continue the present Grand Jury system, and I think it is altogether unnecessary to waste further time upon the subject. Yesterday the section was ordered to be engrossed by an overwhelming majority, showing in the most decided manner what are the feelings of the Convention, and, in my judgment, I think we had better pass the section as it is.

MR. CLEMENTS. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Convention more than a single moment on this question. What, let me ask gentlemen, has been the great cause of complaint against the present Grand Jury system? Simply, I believe, that too many offences have been left to them to investigate; that parties have been dragged from their homes before Grand Juries, on the most trivial occasions.

Now what does the amendment of the gentleman from Tippecanoe propose? It proposes to leave it to the Legislature to say whether our Grand Jury system shall be abolished or not. One Legislature at one session may abolish it, and another at the very next session may re-enact it, and thus we may go on abolishing and re-enacting, having no certainty as to the mode by which offences shall be tried. Did any body ever hear it complained of because a horse-thief, or burglar, or murderer was indicted? Never, sir. Nor, sir, do I believe that we should ever hear a single word of complaint if the system were amended in the manner in which I propose. It cannot be possible that any one can ever complain of a Grand Jury having a right to indict for a high crime. The amendment I have offered proposes to take from their jurisdiction all crimes except felonies. I do hope the amendment will not be laid upon the table.

MR. OWEN. A single word as to what fell from the gentleman from Crawford (Mr. Pepper) in regard to the incongruity of the section. The committee on revision and praseology will make all these amendments; and if it should be found that any section should contain incongruous matter, they will break it up into two or three sections, if necessary to do so.

MR. DUNN of Perry moved the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question being first on amending the instructions as proposed by the gentleman from Daviess (Mr. Clements),

MR. CLARK of Tippecanoe demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Barbour, Beard, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Crawford, Davis of Parke, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Foster, Frisbie, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Hall, Hawkins, Helm, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Kelso, Kendall of White, Kilgore, Lockhart, Maguire, March, Morgan, Newman, Rariden, Read of Monroe, Ritchey, Smith of Ripley, Spann, Stevenson, Thomas, Walpole, Watts, Wolfe, Wunderlich, Zenor, and Mr. President—54.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bascom, Beach, Beeson, Berry, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenowith, Coats, Colfax, Cookerly, Crumbacker, Dick, Dunn of P., Duzan, Edmonston, Fisher, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Harbolt, Hardin, Hendricks, Huff, Johnson of Orange, Jones, Kent, Kinley, Logan, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Ristine, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Steele, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Wheeler, Wiley, Work, and Yocum—67.

So the amendment was rejected.

The section then recurring on the amendment proposed by Mr. Pepper, it was rejected—ages 35, noes not counted.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the section pass?

The yeas and nays were demanded, ordered, and taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Badger, Ballingall, Bascom, Beach, Beard, Beeson, Berry, Bicknell, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Chenoweth, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Cookerly, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Parke, Dick, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Edmonston, Foley, Garvin, Gibson, Gootee, Gordon, Graham of Miami, Hall, Hamilton, Harbolt, Hardin, Hawkins, Helm, Hendricks, Holman, Huff, Johnson of Dearborn, Johnson of Orange, Jones, Kent, Kendall of White, Kinley, Logan, Maguire, Mathis, McClelland, McFarland, McLean, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Ohio, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Prather, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Ritchey, Shannon, Sherrod, Sims, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Scott, Spann, Steele, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimby, Walpole, Wheeler, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Davis of Vermillion, Dobson, Dunn of Jefferson, Farrow, Fisher, Foster, Frisbie, Haddon, Helmer, Hitt, Hogin, Hovey, Howe, Kelso, Kilgore, Lockhart, March, Morgan, Rariden, Smith of Ripley, Stevenson, Tague, Thomas, and Watts—33.

So the section was passed

DIVISION OF THE STATE INTO CIRCUITS.

The PRESIDENT. The next business is section 7 of article 29, on its third reading.

"The State shall be divided into a suitable number of Circuits, and a Circuit Judge shall be elected by the electors in each Circuit, and shall reside therein; and shall hold his office six years, if he shall so long behave well; and no person elected to any office in this State shall be eligible to any other office of trust or profit in the State, during the term for which he was elected."

Mr. McCLELLAND moved to re-commit the section, with instructions to strike out the word "six" in the 24th line, and insert the word "four," so as to reduce the term of holding office by the circuit judges to four years, instead of six. He thought that a majority of the Convention, after considering the matter, would be disposed to make that change.

Mr. PETTIT. I wanted time to have prepared an additional instruction, so as to strike out that part which renders a judge ineligible for re-election during the term for which he was elected, and which will render it necessary that he should resign his office on the bench before he can be re-elected to any other. Now what is the difficulty here? Take it even in the case of a justice of the peace. He is declared a judicial officer, and if you elect him in that capacity for four years, he cannot be elected as a county commissioner, or even as a representative in your legislature. Thus it may happen, too, that a vacancy may occur in the supreme bench, to which the people might desire to elect some man already on your circuit, and although he might be the best possible man that could be found, with such a provision as that he could not be elected.

Mr. MARCH. For one, I hope the principle contained in that part of the section which it is proposed should be stricken out, may be retained. I am in no way particular about the phraseology, but if there be any one place which ought, more than another, to be kept pure from the polluting presence of the habitual and professed office-seeker, it is that of the judiciary, and I trust that this provision will be preserved in the Constitution. For one, I should be willing to make every officer holding an important office ineligible to re-election to any other office during the term for which he is elected—and I would do so on the principle that when a man has sought an office and obtained it, or when it is conferred upon him without being sought, and he accepts it, he should make it a public duty to fill it well, and not make one office a ladder by which to climb into notoriety or to get into another. Sir, I cannot subscribe to the doctrine advanced in this Convention, and that, too, by high authority, that offices are the mere rewards of talent and public service. They are public trusts, instituted for the public good, and their duties ought to be discharged with faithfulness, to the end, by those who hold them. [Applause.]

Mr. RARIDEN. I understand that we are now to have a supreme bench, professedly elected by the people, but in reality to be elected by a junta at the capital composed of both parties. The people are to elect the circuit judges, and they will have some opportunity of becoming acquainted with the proper men to select on whom to confer this honor. But they will have no means of judging of the men— [Here Mr. R. was interrupted by a loud stamping of feet and thumping on the benches, and a variety of other noises. When the confusion had in part subsided, he proceeded to say:—] I have not been troublesome to the Convention for three or four days, and I assure gentlemen that it is not for the gratification of hearing myself speak that I offer a remark or two on this subject; but I say that the plan proposed must always result in our having a circuit bench superior to our supreme bench. It is important that we should have men of talent and intelligence; but if the circuit courts are to be the courts in which you will have the most intelligence, which I cannot but think will be so, why not let appeals and writs of error come from the supreme court to the circuit courts, and thus reverse— [The noise again became so uproarious that Mr. R. took his seat without finishing the sentence.]

Mr. BORDEN. The section, as it stands, really prohibits a judge from being a candidate for re-election. Surely that can not be contemplated by the Convention?

Mr. MARCH. I think the gentleman from Allen is mistaken as to the meaning of the section.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit the section with instructions, and the yeas and nays having been demanded and ordered, they were taken, with the following result:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Bascom, Beach, Berry, Butler, Carter, Chapman, Cookerly, Davis of Parke, Dobson, Dunn of Perry, Duzan, Fisher, Foley, Frisbie, Gootee, Graham of Miami, Haddon, Harbott, Hardin, Hawkins, Hitt, Johnson of Dearborn, Kinley, March, Mathis, McClelland, McLean, Milligan, Milroy, Mooney, Moore, Pepper of Ohio, Ritchey, Shannon, Smiley, Snook, Smith of Ripley, Smith of Scott, Spann, Tague, Tannehill, Thornton, Trimble, Walpole, Wiley, Wolfe, Work, Wunderlich, Yocum, Zenor, and Mr. President—53.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Anthony, Barbour, Beard, Beeson, Biddle, Blythe, Borden, Bourne, Brookbank, Bryant, Clark of Hamilton, Clark of Tippecanoe, Clements, Coats, Cole, Colfax, Crawford, Crumbacker, Davis of Madison, Davis of Vermillion, Dick, Dunn of Jefferson, Edmonston, Farrow, Foster, Garvin, Gibson, Gordon, Hall, Hamilton, Helmer, Hendricks, Hugin, Holman, Hovey, Howe, Huff, Johnson of Orange, Jones, Kelso, Kent, Kendall of White, Lockhart, Logan, Maguire, McFarland, Miller of Clinton, Miller of Fulton, Miller of Gibson, Morgan, Morrison of Marion, Morrison of Washington, Murray, Nave, Newman, Niles, Owen, Pepper of Crawford, Pettit, Rariden, Read of Clark, Read of Monroe, Ristine, Sherrod, Sims, Steele, Stevenson, Thomas, Watts, and Wheeler—72.

So the motion to re-commit did not prevail.

Mr. RITCHEY. I move to re-commit the section with the following instructions: to add after the words "State, or United States," the words "except to a judicial office." I think these instructions are proper. As the section now stands, it provides that a judicial officer shall not be eligible to any other office to which he may be elected within the State. It now provides that he shall not be eligible to any office of the State or of the United States. Now, let me ask you how common is it for judges to be riding through counties and electioneering for a seat in Congress, or in the Senate. While I would regard it as highly improper to allow judges, holding the high stations which they are called to fill, to be electioneering for other stations, while filling the one to which they are elected, especially those to which I have referred, I can see no propriety in seeking to prevent them from ascending in the judicial scale. I hope that the section will be re-committed, and that the instructions I have suggested will be adopted.

Mr. PETTIT. I desire to know of the gentleman from Johnson if he contemplates that the State shall put restrictions upon the qualifications of a man to hold office under the general government? Is that the idea?

Mr. RITCHEY. Yes.

Mr. PETTIT. Now, let me say to that gentleman, and to the Convention, that, to my mind, beyond all question, we cannot do any thing of the kind. I suppose that if you make a man a judge of the Supreme Court, or a justice of the peace, the people of the whole United States would have a right to make him President. The qualifications in such a case are made by the whole people, and no State in the United States can prevent the people of the United States from electing whom they please. Now, sir, if we do this, it would not only be absurd in itself, but it would look as if we did not know the difference between the general and the State government. Such a provision will be of no force whatever. You may take up a simple justice of the peace, and make him President of the United States, or the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, may make him a foreign Minister, for anything that you can do. The Constitution of the United States has fixed their qualifications, and you cannot alter them.

Mr. RITCHEY (amid much confusion) rose and said: He simply wished to state to the gentleman from Tippecanoe that he supposed the Convention could provide in the Constitution that a man should not be eligible to any other office, while he held a seat on the judicial bench. He was quite aware that the Constitution of the United States prescribed the qualifications of Congressmen and Senators, but he thought the Convention might say—[The remainder of the sentence was not heard by the Reporter, owing to the confusion which prevailed in the Hall.]

Mr. EDMONSTON. I never like to move the previous question, but it appears to me that this has gone far enough. I move the previous question.

Mr. PETTIT. If the call for the previous question is sustained, will that prohibit any further proposition to re-commit with instructions?

The PRESIDENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIT. Then I hope it will be voted down.

The question being taken on the call for the previous question, it was sustained—ayes 51, noes 33—and the main question was then ordered, by consent, to be put.

The question was then taken on the motion to re-commit with instructions, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the passage of the section, and the yeas and nays being ordered and taken, resulted as follows—yeas 86, nays 39:
